"The name of James Cummins, late of Company E, Eighty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Page 25, strike out lines 4 to 7, inclusive, as follows:

"The name of George W. Thompson, late of Company G, Eighteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Page 33, lines 22 to 25, inclusive, strike out the following:
"The name of George L. Danforth, late of Company C, Eighth Regiment Vermont Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 12211.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12211) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to offer an amendment to this bill, and I would like to have 10 minutes in which to explain it. Will the gentleman agree to let me have 10 minutes?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I will not object to the gentleman having five minutes, but I will certainly object to amending the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I asked the gentleman to give me 10 minutes. I want to explain the case.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I have no objection to the gentleman being given 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no control of the time when the bill is considered in the House. He has not any time to dispose of.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to insist on going into the Committee of the Whole. I thought perhaps I could arrange it satisfactorily in the way I have suggested.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman have an hour at his disposal?

The SPEAKER. He does not. If this bill is to be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, he has five minutes; and nobody else has any more, either.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] objects. Will the gentleman from Ohio make his motion to go into the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, my objection was, knowing that the House was soon to have a recess, that I did not care to make that motion. I wanted to have the bill considered in the House. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12211) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and widows of such soldiers and sailors, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12211, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The bill will have to be read.

Mr. RAKER. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The bill has not been read yet by the Clerk. The first reading can not be dispensed with until the title has been read. The title has not yet been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12211) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, this bill comes at a time when the House is crowded and when there may not be fair consideration given to amendments that may be offered. I understand other amendments will be offered. I want to know if the gentleman from Ohio will agree to give me 10 minutes? He will have enough time before the arrival of the President to give me 10 minutes.

Mr. KEATING rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. KEATING. I want to make a suggestion that I think will solve the problem. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions is anxious to dispose of the bill before the arrival of the President. Suppose we read the bill and the gentleman from Pennsylvania can offer his amendment at the end of the reading. If we have time then, I have no doubt the gentleman from Pennsylvania will have opportunity to offer an amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we did that, the "gentleman from Pennsylvania" would be wiped off the limb.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Even if the President should arrive before the completion of the bill, the bill can come up at another time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will have a great advantage in forcing this bill now, just as the President is expected to arrive.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent has been asked. The bill has been read by title. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will be recognized to offer an amendment at the close of the reading.

Mr. WALSH. There is no difficulty in getting such unanimous consent as that. When the time comes the gentleman can offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to renew my request that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. That will give the gentleman from Pennsylvania a chance.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is an important bill, as all pension bills are, and it is one that ought to be discussed where there is reason for discussion. I desire to ask the Chairman whether I am not entitled to discuss this bill in general debate?

Mr. RAKER. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There having been debate upon it, I ask whether or not I am not entitled to an hour to discuss this bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The bill not having been read, the gentleman would not be entitled to his hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] had the floor, pending the request to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania having been recognized to open the discussion, is he not entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was not recognized for that purpose. He was recognized to reserve an objection to dispensing with the first reading of the bill. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. That is not in order. This bill is being read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Florence Marquis, widow of Fred S. Marquis, late captain of Company M, Eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is proper at this point in the proceedings to offer an amendment to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is not being read for amendment, and therefore it is not in order to offer amendments at this time. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Edith L. Morgan, widow of Altie M. Morgan, late of Company G, Twenty-second Regiment United States Infantry, War with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month, and $2 per month additional on account of each of the two minor children of the said Altie M. Morgan until they reach the age of 16 years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WALSH. We are in the committee now.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is a quorum present. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of George C. Rimes, late of Company E, Thirty-fifth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Clerk has been reading the bill in a tone of voice that is not distinct in the House. It is not the fault of the Clerk, but it is due to the fact that the House is not in order. I desire to make the point of order that the committee is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to make a parliamentary inquiry or to make a point of order?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A point of order, since the Chair has ruled on the question. I make the point of order that the House is not in order.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12211) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RECESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 5 minutes to 1 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 5 minutes to 1 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

At the expiration of the recess the House resumed its session and was called to order by the Speaker.

JOINT MEETING OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE.

At 12 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m. the Doorkeeper, J. J. Sinnott, announced the Vice President of the United States and the Members of the United States Senate.

The Members of the House rose.

The Senate, preceded by the Vice President, and by their Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, entered the Chamber.

The Vice President took the chair at the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. On the part of the House the Speaker announces the following committee to conduct the President into the Chamber: Messrs. KITCHIN, SHERLEY, FLOOD, WEBB, GILLETT, CANNON, and MOORE of Pennsylvania.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the part of the Senate the Vice President announces as a like committee Senators MARTIN, SIMMONS, CHAMBERLAIN, SAULSBURY, PENROSE, COLT, and KENYON.

At 1 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m. the President of the United States, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House and stood at the Clerk's desk amid prolonged applause.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the Sixty-fifth Congress, I present the President of the United States. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 1141).

Gentlemen of the Congress, it is with unaffected reluctance that I come to ask you to prolong your session long enough to provide more adequate resources for the Treasury for the conduct of the war. I have reason to appreciate as fully as you do how arduous the session has been. Your labours have been severe and protracted. You have passed a long series of measures which required the debate of many doubtful questions of judgment and many exceedingly difficult questions of principle as well as of practice. The summer is upon us in which labour and counsel are twice arduous and are constantly apt to be impaired by lassitude and fatigue. The elections are at hand and we ought as soon as possible to go and render an intimate account of our trusteeship to the people who delegated us to act for them in the weighty and anxious matters that crowd upon us in these days of critical choice and action. But we dare not go to the elections until we have done our duty to the full. These are days when duty stands stark and naked and even with closed eyes we know it is there. Excuses are unavailing. We have either done our duty or we have not. The fact will be as gross and plain as the duty itself. In such a case lassitude and fatigue seem negligible enough. The facts are tonic and suffice to freshen the labour.

And the facts are these: Additional revenues must manifestly be provided for. It would be a most unsound policy to raise too large a proportion of them by loan, and it is evident that the four billions now provided for by taxation will not of themselves sustain the greatly enlarged budget to which we must immediately look forward. We can not in fairness wait until the end of the fiscal year is at hand to apprise our people of the taxes they must pay on their earnings of the present calendar year, whose accountings and expenditures will then be closed. We can not get increased taxes unless the country knows what they are to be and practices the necessary economy to make them available. Definiteness, early definiteness, as to what its tasks are to be is absolutely necessary for the successful administration of the Treasury; it can not frame fair and workable regulations in haste; and it must frame its regulations in haste if it is not to know its exact task until the very eve of its performance. The present tax laws are marred, moreover, by inequities which ought to be remedied. Indisputable facts, every one; and we can not alter or blink them. To state them is argument enough.

And yet perhaps you will permit me to dwell for a moment upon the situation they disclose. Enormous loans freely spent in the stimulation of industry of almost every sort produce inflations and extravagances which presently make the whole economic structure questionable and insecure and the very basis of credit is cut away. Only fair, equitably distributed taxation, of the widest incidence and drawing chiefly from the sources which would be likely to demoralize credit by their very abundance, can prevent inflation and keep our industrial system free of speculation and waste. We shall naturally turn, therefore, I suppose, to war profits and incomes and luxuries for the additional taxes. [Applause.] But the war profits and incomes upon which the increased taxes will be levied will be the profits and incomes of the calendar year 1918. It would be manifestly unfair to wait until the early months of 1919 to say what they are to be. It might be difficult, I should imagine, to run the mill with water that had already gone over the wheel.

Moreover, taxes of that sort will not be paid until the June of next year, and the Treasury must anticipate them. It must use the money they are to produce before it is due. It must sell short-time certificates of indebtedness. In the autumn a much larger sale of long-time bonds must be effected than has yet been attempted. What are the bankers to think of the certificates if they do not certainly know where the money is to come from which is to take them up? And how are investors to approach the purchase of bonds with any sort of confidence of knowledge of their own affairs if they do not know what taxes they are to pay and what economies and adjustments of their business they must effect? I can not assure the country of a successful administration of the Treasury in 1918 if the question of further taxation is to be left undecided until 1919.

The consideration that dominates every other now, and makes every other seem trivial and negligible, is the winning of the war. [Applause.] We are not only in the midst of the war, we are at the very peak and crisis of it. Hundreds of thousands of our men, carrying our hearts with them and our fortunes, are in the field, and ships are crowding faster and faster to the ports of France and England with regiment after regiment, thousand after thousand, to join them until the enemy shall be beaten and brought to a reckoning with mankind. [Applause.] There can be no pause or intermission. The great enterprise must, on the contrary, be pushed with greater and greater energy. The volume of our might must steadily and rapidly be augmented until there can be no question of resisting it. If that is to be accomplished, gentlemen, money must sustain it to the utmost. Our financial programme must no more be left in doubt or suffered to lag than our ordnance programme or our ship programme or our munitions programme or our programme for making millions of men ready. These others are not programmes, indeed, but mere plans upon paper, unless there is to be an unquestionable supply of money.

That is the situation, and it is the situation which creates the duty, no choice or preference of ours. There is only one way to meet that duty. We must meet it without selfishness or fear of consequences. Politics is adjourned. The elections will go to those who think least of it; to those who go to the constituencies without explanations or excuses, with a plain record of duty faithfully and disinterestedly performed. I, for one, am always confident that the people of this country will give a just verdict upon the service of the men who act for them when the facts are such that no man can disguise or conceal them. There is no danger of deceit now. An intense and pitiless light beats upon every man and every action in this tragic plot of war that is now upon the stage. If lobbyists hurry to Washington to attempt to turn what you do in the matter of taxation to their protection or advantage, the light will beat also upon them. There is abundant fuel for the light in the records of the Treasury with regard to profits of every sort. The profiteering that can not be got at by the restraints of conscience and love of country can be got at by taxation. [Applause.] There is such profiteering now and the information with regard to it is available and indisputable.

I am advising you to act upon this matter of taxation now, gentlemen, not because I do not know that you can see and interpret the facts and the duty they impose just as well and with as clear a perception of the obligations involved as I can, but because there is a certain solemn satisfaction in sharing with you the responsibilities of such a time. The world never stood in such case before. Men never before had so clear or so moving a vision of duty. I know that you will begrudge the work to be done here by us no more than the men begrude us theirs who lie in the trenches and sally forth to their death. There is a stimulating comradeship knitting us all together. And this task to which I invite your immediate consideration will be performed under favorable influences if we will look to what the country is thinking and expecting and care nothing at all for what is being said and believed in the lobbies of Washington hotels, where the atmosphere seems to make it possible to believe what is believed nowhere else. [Applause.]

Have you not felt the spirit of the Nation rise and its thought become a single and common thought since these eventful days came in which we have been sending our boys to the other side? I think you must read that thought, as I do, to mean this, that the people of this country are not only united in the resolute purpose to win this war but are ready and willing to bear any burden and undergo any sacrifice that it may be necessary for them to bear in order to win it. [Applause.] We need not be afraid to tax them, if we lay taxes justly. They know that the war must be paid for and that it is they who must pay for it, and if the burden is justly distributed and the sacrifice made a common sacrifice from which none escapes who can bear it at all, they will carry it cheerfully and with a sort of solemn pride.

I have always been proud to be an American, and was never more proud than now, when all that we have said and all that we have foreseen about our people is coming true. The great days have come when the only thing that they ask for or admire is duty greatly and adequately done; when their only wish for America is that she may share the freedom she enjoys; when a great, compelling sympathy wells up in their hearts for men everywhere who suffer and are oppressed; and when they see at last the high uses for which their wealth has been piled up and their mighty power accumulated and, counting neither blood nor treasure now that their final day of opportunity has come, rejoice to spend and to be spent through a long night of suffering and terror in order that they and men everywhere may see the dawn of a day of righteousness and justice and peace. Shall we grow weary when they bid us act? [Applause.]

May I add this word, gentlemen? Just as I was leaving the White House I was told that the expected drive on the western front had apparently begun. You can realize how that solemnized my feeling as I came to you, and how it seemed to strengthen the purpose which I have tried to express in these lines.

I have admired the work of this session. The way in which the two Houses of the Congress have cooperated with the Executive has been generous and admirable, and it is not in any spirit of suggesting duty neglected, but only to remind you of the common cause and the common obligation that I have ventured to come to you to-day. [Applause.]

At 1 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m. the President retired from the Hall of the House.

At 1 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m. the Speaker announced that the joint session was dissolved.

Thereupon the Vice President and the Members of the Senate returned to their Chamber.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12211, the pension bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment? It is my understanding that the gentleman intends to finish the bill by a quarter of 2 o'clock, and, failing in that, will not further press it to-day.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to stand in the way of the chairman of a big committee who has an important bill up, but at the same time we had a distinct agreement that we could proceed with pension bills after the oil bill was out of the way. In view of the fact that the bill will not take more than 10 minutes to finish, we ought to be able to get through before a quarter of 2 o'clock, but I do not want to be tied up.

Mr. SHERLEY. And I do not want to tie the House up, which is more important than tying the gentleman up. If the gentleman will agree to move that the committee rise at a quarter of 2 if the bill is not finished, I shall not insist on a division.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the Chair to the unanimous-consent agreement by which the pension bills have the right of way. Saturday's RECORD shows this colloquy:

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire also to submit an inquiry, and that is whether the order which was entered by unanimous consent to consider pension bills would not make those pension bills in order on Monday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that it would.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is my impression that there was unanimous-consent agreement in respect to taking up the pension bills.

Mr. RUSSELL. There was a unanimous-consent agreement to take up the pension bills following the disposition of the oil bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that the order was that the pension bills were to follow the disposition of the oil bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. And if we adjourn now those bills will be in order on Monday.

The SPEAKER. They would.

Mr. SHERLEY. Pension bills are in order, but the House has a right to determine whether it wants to go into Committee of the Whole on the pension bills. If the day is to be taken up with pension bills, I am going to give the House a chance to determine whether it is more important to pass pension bills than it is an important deficiency bill for the prosecution of the war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman will save time to let the pension bills go through.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If I have the right to yield.

Mr. CANNON. This is a private pension bill. Has the gentleman any reason to believe that there will not be ample time within 10 days or 2 weeks to pass all these pension bills, and does not he think it is more important to consider the deficiency bill and the Army bill, in order that they may get to the Senate, with a view of hastening as early an adjournment as possible?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think the pension bill will take more than 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, there is only one amendment to be offered—the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, with the understanding that at the end of the reading of the bill for amendment the gentleman from Pennsylvania be given 10 minutes in which to explain his amendment and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] be given 5 minutes in which to reply. That will dispose of the whole matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, that it shall be read through for amendment, and at the end of the reading the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] shall have the right to offer an amendment and have 10 minutes in which to advocate and explain it, and at the end of his 10 minutes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] shall have 5 minutes, and that that shall be the end of it.

Mr. WALSH. Does that comprehend the disposition of the further reading of the bill?

Mr. KEATING. And that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] suggests that we agree to end the entire proceeding by 2 o'clock. If we can get through by that time, I am willing that that should be put in.

The SPEAKER. And the further condition that the whole thing shall be ended by 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object to the last provision; we will probably get through anyway.

Mr. KEATING. Then I withdraw the latter part of the request, that we finish by 2 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill through for amendment.

An act (H. R. 12211) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following committee amendment, with the report accompanying it, which I ask to be printed in the RECORD. This amendment is a bill inadvertently left out of the omnibus bill. It has been considered by a subcommittee and by the whole committee, and I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

At the end of the bill insert a new paragraph as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Wesley H. Crockett, late of United States Navy, Regular Establishment, and pay him a pension at the rate of $17 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The report is as follows:

H. R. 4059. Wesley H. Crockett, Reed City, Mich., served in the Regular Establishment, United States Navy, on board S. S. Minneapolis from July 30, 1903, until October 26, 1903, when honorably discharged on account of disability. (I. O. 50808.)

The records of the Navy Department show that during service this man was admitted to the hospital for treatment October 10, 1903, for a disease diagnosed as neuresthenia and for disease of nervous system.

He was treated for this and it was pronounced chronic and he was discharged on account of said disease, which was officially held to have existed prior to his enlistment, three months before, and therefore not due to service.

He filed claim for pension in 1904, in which he alleged neuresthenia and claimed that same was due to service in the United States Navy, which was rejected on the ground the records of the Navy Department show that said disease existed prior to enlistment.

On appeal this adverse action was sustained. He filed no evidence other than the testimony of two lay witnesses to the effect that prior to his enlistment he was free from any disease or disability, but that since discharge he has suffered constantly from nervous disorder of a chronic character and is unable to perform manual labor. He also files testimony of a physician showing that since his discharge he has suffered from this disease.

The only board of surgeons which ever examined him reported in 1904 that he suffers from disease of heart and deranged stomach and trouble with the nervous system, evidently neuresthenia, and that there is no evidence of venereal disease or results.

With the bill the petitioner files an affidavit in which he states he is unable to perform labor on account of disease of the nervous system, stomach, and heart, and that the only property he owns is a small lot worth $100 in Reed City. The Member who introduces the bill assures the committee that his statement as to property is correct. A physician testifies that he suffers from chronic disordered nervous system, with disease of stomach, liver, and spleen.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Page 2, line 11, after the word "receiving," insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"The name of Thomas John Parker, late of the United States Marine Corps, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have asked special consideration for this case for reasons which I shall endeavor to make clear. The Committee on Pensions has a series of rules. They are not rules of the House but are rules of the committee. One of them, rule 3, is as follows:

Rule 3: In no instance will a bill be considered by this committee in connection with which the records of the War or Navy Departments show medical treatment for syphilis, or other venereal disease of an aggravated character, unless the Bureau of Pensions has specifically waived same as a factor in present disabilities, or cause of death.

I have no objection to the enforcement of that rule by the committee, if it did not in some instances work a hardship upon soldiers and sailors; but, due to some agitation in the House heretofore, the committee has felt bound, as I am informed, to adhere strictly to this rule, and to make no exceptions so far as applications for pensions are concerned. Of course, I am in favor of the passage of the bill as reported by the committee. I have asked consideration for the amendment only because I believe there is merit in it and because in this particular instance I think the rule of the committee should be waived. I think it ought to be waived in the interest of fairness, in the interest of actual justice to the applicant, Thomas J. Parker.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I just want to suggest that this committee has the power to waive the rule in a particular case, and in particular cases we do waive it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is all the more reason why the House in which we are now considering this bill should act sympathetically in a case of this kind. Before introducing this bill—and I have very few pension bills and give the committee little trouble—I took pains to find out what was the real reason for the application, and ascertained that the applicant, Parker, who lives in my district and is now 71 years old, a United States marine in the earlier part of his life, was being supported by his wife, who maintains a small tobacco store, from which, I understand, she is now to be ousted. For 40 years this woman has lived with Thomas J. Parker and has maintained him out of the proceeds of her little tobacco store, which, I understand, has not amounted to more than $10 a week. I was satisfied there was great need in this case before introducing the bill; so careful, in fact, that I had my secretary personally investigate the case and report the conditions. He found the old couple living together in a small home, the husband crippled and blind and the wife doing the best she could to maintain him. She provided for him and attended him, and while both of them are aged and had been living together for 40 years there was nothing in their home life or physical condition apparently to warrant the suggestion that the husband had been afflicted as indicated. Moreover, they had two healthy children living, one with a family and another contributing somewhat to their support.

Mr. KNUTSON. What do the records of the War Department show as to the cause of this blindness?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I looked into that when I found that the committee felt it had to stand by its rule in this case, and learned that although this same condition was charged against the man when his original application was made, he was granted a pension of $12 per month. Bear in mind he is now 71 years old. He was granted a pension of $12 because it was a disputed question among the physicians as to whether the blindness which he suffered was due to rheumatism that he contracted while attending the Boston fire or due to this other disease concerning which the committee held out against him and which he was said to have incurred in 1868. I found on looking it up that the whole matter had been thoroughly thrashed over in the Sixty-first Congress, second session, by the committee in charge at that time and that the following record had been made. Upon this record the pension of $12 a month was granted him:

The sailor was one of a detachment from the marine barracks who performed arduous and hazardous duty during the Boston fire of 1872, being on duty in the streets for 10 days without relief. There is both medical and lay testimony as to continuance of rheumatism fairly covering the whole period between discharge and the date of application for pension. Of these physicians, some five in number, who testified for the claimant, two were emphatic in their statements that no syphilitic symptoms were to be found, and the others failed to mention same. It is in evidence that sailor entered the Wills Eye Hospital, Philadelphia, October 10, 1881, and that the cause for which he was treated there by Dr. W. W. McClure during the ensuing six months and at intervals thereafter was rheumatic iritis. The sole question in the case is whether the blindness had its origin in the venereal disease of 1868.

Think of it! Whatever the offense was occurred in 1868. Subsequently the man married and subsequently became blind. During all these 40 years this good woman, who is healthy, but aging, has cared for and supported her blind sailor husband. If there was anything wrong with him, why did the Sixty-first Congress grant him a pension of $12? The testimony does not seem to bear out the suggestion that blindness was due to what occurred before his marriage away back in 1868. The later testimony bears out the statement that his eye trouble was due to the rheumatic affliction resulting from his service at the Boston fire in 1872. Let the committee stand by its rule in ordinary cases, I have no objection; but let the committee see the justice of making an exception in this. I have asked in this instance that the pension be raised from $12 to $50. If that is too much I am willing to accept $30, but I believe the issue might just as well be upon $50 as $30. The facts are that the man is blind and helpless; that he has to rely upon an aged woman to maintain him. For her sake, who has borne this charge for 40 years, the committee should be just. If this old misfortune had not arisen, if this red herring, as it were, had not been drawn across the path of this pensioner, I suppose the committee would cheerfully on the known facts, the man being blind and helpless and needing a nurse, have given a pension of $50 a month. I understand the committee has granted as high as $75 a month, but in this instance they might grant $50 since the facts seem so clearly to warrant it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Chair will permit that to be done, although it is contrary to the rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple case. The Committee on Pensions has applied exactly the same rule in this case that it has in scores of other cases. If you reverse the committee in this case, in all fairness you should go back and in some way reverse the committee in a score of cases where during the last several years we have applied this rule. Now, the rule is that where the Pension Bureau makes a definite finding that a man's disabilities are directly traceable to syphilis not incurred in the service he shall not be granted a pension. That is all there is to the rule——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, of course, challenges the finding of the Pension Bureau; but I submit that the physicians employed in the bureau have no object in doing an injustice to a claimant for a pension. They make such an investigation as is quite impossible for your committee or the Members of this House or the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make, and those physicians found that the man's blindness was due to syphilis, which of course was not contracted in the service——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In 1868.

Mr. KEATING. In 1868; I do not care what the date may be. That is the finding, and now the gentleman comes in here and tells you a pathetic story about the man, about the excellent reputation he bears, that his wife bears, and that his children bear; but I submit all that has nothing to do with the case. This is a question of whether this House in all seriousness is going on record now as reversing a committee which adheres to a rule that a man who incurs disabilities through loose living and not because of something that he did for his country shall be placed on the honor roll of his country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And he is already there.

Mr. KEATING. He is, by a special act adopted during the Sixty-first Congress, put through here probably before this rule was adopted by the Pension Committee.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. It was.

Mr. KEATING. The Pension Committee adopted the rule because of discussion had on the floor of this House in which the committee was criticized for passing just such bills as the gentleman is endeavoring to insert in this omnibus measure, and the committee felt it ought to adopt such a rule to protect itself, to protect this House, and to protect the pension roll of his Nation. I hope the Members of this House are not prepared to place on this bill such a claim as the gentleman presents even in response to so affecting an appeal as he makes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 16, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KEY of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12280, a bill making appropriations for urgent deficiencies, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent pending the motion, that general debate be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have application for 10 minutes and I would like about 5 minutes myself.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and 15 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 30 minutes, one-half of that time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12280, the urgent deficiency bill, with Mr. HOUSTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12280, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12280) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest the gentleman from Illinois use some of his time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to take up much time upon this bill in general debate. What little I shall have to say will be touching the bill. The gentleman from Kentucky, who, no doubt, is more familiar with the bill than I am, will explain it in his 15 minutes, or as the bill is reached under the five-minute rule.

I just want to call attention to the bill. It carries in round numbers $123,000,000; it recommends appropriations and authorizations, and as I recollect it, in round numbers about $5,000,000 less than estimated for. It was prepared after very considerable hearings and after much of consideration. I will not attempt to analyze it in my time.

The appropriations through this fiscal year, since the commencement of the war, amount to $18,892,027.56, and contracts have been authorized in addition to the amount of $2,511,562,925.50, adding the amount the deficiency carried in this bill, $123,674,906.25, and the amount appropriated by act of March 28, $1,151,000,000, making a total for the current fiscal year of $22,678,507,127.79

The House has done its duty according to its best judgment and ability. I think both the House and Senate have freely and liberally cooperated in giving legislation that will enable the war to be conducted efficiently for the first year, and I pray at an early date it will be a successful close for our country as well as for our allies and the world.

Now, I want to say that you do not know and I do not know how the most of this money is to be spent. Oh, it is to be spent for the support of the Army, support of the Navy, the building of ships, advances to the allies. The money is to be expended by the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President of the United States.

Now, no great amount like the sum we have appropriated this year can be expended without waste. There must be some waste. God alone could make the expenditure of this vast sum without something of waste. We are entitled, however, to believe and demand that we will have the minimum of waste. All that human patriotism can do, all of knowledge that can be commanded, all of integrity that can be brought to the front, shall be brought to the front, and there will be as little waste as possible. But whether it be little or more, we must wait and see.

I am not here to prophesy that there will be undue waste. If we are to have reckless waste or wicked graft at all, it will be bad enough at the close of the war for us to realize it. But in the meantime, as the expenditures are being made, we should inquire to the best of our ability, without blocking the wheels for carrying on the war, what can be done to prevent waste and prevent graft.

Of course, we are all for the winning of the war. There can not be a speech made by anybody, hardly, but that it closes with "the flag," "the Republic," "humanity," "the winning of the war," "righteousness." Well, we are fighting for all those things. Sometimes it is on the tip of my tongue to fall in and make language avowing my patriotic support of the Government in this great emergency. Words are cheap unless action is wise—

Not everyone that sayeth "Lord, Lord," shall enter into the kingdom, but he that doeth the will of the Father.

And we have got to do it—not the will of the Father from day to day, because He does not send us special messages—but we have got to act to the best of our ability according to the aspirations and the hope of the people in order to win the war. And whoever fails in doing his duty, whether he is legislator or whether he is in the Army or the Navy, no matter where he is, must answer for patriotic and intelligent effort. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in appropriations by Congress. And I was very much interested in what the President stated to us only a few moments ago. I do not recall the exact language the President used, but in substance, as I remember, it was that we could go home or in some way render an account of our stewardship to the people.

Now, I do not know what account of stewardship I can render. When I go home, my people ask me, "What are you doing with the billions and billions of dollars that Congress is appropriating?" I have to answer that I do not know. They can not understand that.

Now, the former distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Fitzgerald, last December estimated, as I recall, that the Government would need $12,000,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919. From what information I now can get, the Committee on Military Affairs of the House will ask for that amount alone. It seems to me that at the rate we are going, by June 30, 1919, if war continues that long, we shall probably be called upon to authorize expenditures aggregating $40,000,000,000.

Now, there is no question about the temperament of the American people. They are willing to contribute the last cent they have to carry on this war and win it. But they want to know where their money is going—what you are doing with it.

I remember on a former occasion here, when the present distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations criticized the late Maj. Gardner of Massachusetts because, as I recall, that distinguished hero had stated in some public utterance "that Congress was spending money like a lot of drunken sailors." I do not wish to speak in a spirit of criticism or in a spirit of partisanship. I have voted for every war measure demanded by the Executive for the successful prosecution of the war since I have been a Member of the House. There has not been any spirit of partisanship in my actions or in my statements. But I must say, to speak the way I feel about it, that the expression "that we spend money like a lot of drunken sailors" is a mild one. We vote and spend money like a lot of rubber stamps, and we never ask one question as to what is being done with it. I remember that here about a year ago we appropriated with a whoop one morning, with hardly any discussion—I think without any debate—some $640,000,000 for aircraft work.

Where has that money gone? I do not know, and you do not know. Now and then we get a sniff from Hog Island, Muscle Shoals, or the Arlington Hotel property. I do not know what the character of that sniff is, but I do not believe I am performing my constitutional duty under my oath of office without making an attempt to find out. Do you think that you perform your duty, your responsibility as Members of the House, in voting away billions and billions of money without making any effort to see whether those moneys are expended lawfully and wisely and economically? If you feel that way about it, I do not. But you do not concern yourselves about it.

Under the Constitution all revenue legislation must originate in the House, yet you never say a word or lift your voice as to the proper expenditure of the public funds. The Senate has done much more than we have, and yet it seems to me there is not as much obligation upon the Senate as rests upon Members of the House. It will lead to a public scandal if you do not move.

I introduced a resolution here on April 6, No. 305, to provide for a committee on public accounts, in order that we might have some body that could properly investigate and make a report to the House as to the expenditure of public funds. I do not suppose anything will be done about it. It looks to me as if Members of Congress are impervious to everything except office and death. As to office they are very sensitive, and death they can not escape.

It does not seem to me that the financial resources of this country are inexhaustible. You have not got a bottomless well. We owe it to ourselves and to our country to husband our financial resources, in my judgment, if we are going to win this war, with the same care that we conserve the food products of this country. I call upon you again to take some means—I do not care whether you take my means or not—in order that the House and the country may know what is being done with the people's money. They are willing to give all they have if they know that it will be properly expended.

Why, there is not a subdivision of any State, like a municipality, that does not have an expert accountant go over the expenditures of that municipality and render a report to the legislative body thereof. Yet we sit here in the House like a lot of mummies and are willing to vote perhaps $40,000,000,000 away without any care or concern as to how those moneys will be expended. We are willing, I guess, to vote away all the power we have and say nothing about it.

Sometimes I wonder what has become of the Sage of Monticello. Has he turned over in his grave, with his face toward the melting pot of the earth, while his professed followers wantonly abandon the great principles he advocated, for which he fought, and to the maintenance of which he dedicated his life? It seems to me that we owe it to ourselves and to the country to do business in a businesslike way. You go upon your knees and beg the people to give to the Red Cross, to the war chest, to buy liberty bonds and thrift stamps, and all that sort of thing, and yet you refuse on the part of the Government to set any example of any degree of thrift yourselves. I tell you it is high time that the Government showed some disposition to exercise a little thrift and economy in public expenditures, and I warn you again and call upon you for action—affirmative action—before it is too late. [Applause.]

We are informed that additional revenue will be raised by increasing taxes upon incomes and excess profits and upon luxuries. It seems to me that we need to exercise some caution to avoid killing the goose that lays the golden egg. As to luxuries, of course we can tax them until the people no longer indulge in them.

As New York State pays between 30 and 40 per cent of all Federal taxes, the people of that State are vitally interested in the question of taxation. We would like to know why a portion of the increased revenues can not be raised from a protective tariff. It has been estimated that $300,000,000 a year can reasonably be raised by such means, thus relieving our own taxpayers to that extent; and then there is cotton. What about that? But perhaps that is too sacred a commodity for the extraordinarily nonpartisan majority to tax. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to delay the committee by any reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat. I am always glad to commend and never in any way hinder, by criticism or otherwise, newly aroused desire for economy on the part of any Member of the House. But I suggest in passing, in a not unkindly spirit, that a good deal of the ignorance to which the gentleman confesses and about which I am not prepared to dispute, could be dissipated by his reading some of the hearings in connection with some of the bills that are brought out. Of course, many of those of us who work more than eight hours a day for many days each month and take testimony running into the thousands of pages are not to be blamed if gentlemen decline to make the effort to read and digest such testimony and if by virtue of that failure, not being in possession of all of the information they would like to have, they prefer to take the course of criticism rather than of affirmative action.

Mr. Chairman, the present bill before the House carries a total of direct appropriations and authorizations of $123,674,906.25, and while the aggregate is large, the reasons for the amounts recommended can be stated, I think, fully and briefly. Sixty million dollars of it is in compliance with the direct order of the Congress recently given in passing the housing bill, which authorized an expenditure of $60,000,000 for housing purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman tell us of the special advantage he thinks there is in the organization of a corporation to take charge of this work?

Mr. SHERLEY. I had hoped to reach that under the five-minute rule, rather than in the midst of a brief statement.

Mr. MADDEN. The reason I asked that now is because the gentleman has just mentioned the housing matter.

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason is this, and I think it will appeal to the gentleman: It is perfectly manifest that this housing problem does not consist merely in the building of houses by the Government. For my part I hope it will consist least in that. But it consists in part in house building and in operating those houses after they are built. Now, of necessity there is a rigidity and, for want of a better term, a red tape in connection with Government operation which makes it very difficult to carry on efficiently such a continuing business. So much so that the gentleman will recall that in connection with the building of the Panama Canal practically all of the business connected with certain lines of work, such as the maintenance and running of the hotels, the ice plant, and other things, were effected through the medium of the Panama Railroad corporation. Gentlemen will also recall that in connection with the Shipping Board and its activities it was thought that for the purpose of operating the ships and conducting the business that was incident to them it was desirable to have a corporation, Government owned, and accordingly the Emergency Fleet Corporation was created.

This is not made mandatory. It is simply given to the President as an option, because of the belief on the part of the committee that there might be the need of such a medium for successfully carrying out the objects of the original legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. In other words, the committee believes that it will be more likely to be conducted as a strictly business proposition under this plan?

Mr. SHERLEY. Very much so, more economically, and with less approach to socialism by virtue of it.

Now, continuing the statement touching the items in the bill, the other large item in the way of cash is $25,907,000 for the Navy. This represents a number of items, all of which are set out in some detail in the report. Pay, miscellaneous, $1,250,000. The gentleman who spoke a few minutes ago [Mr. MAGEE] wanted to know where a good deal of money is going. Some of it is going in the same way that this item of a million and a quarter goes, to the increased size of the Navy. Transportation of enlisted personnel, $1,000,000. The same statement applies to that. Ordnance and ordnance stores, $4,500,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman advised as to whether any effort will be made to build a nitrate plant out of this?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but I should say to the gentleman that if it were necessary to get powder and to get nitrates, and they did not take steps to do it, he and I would be the first men on this floor to criticize the failure properly to furnish the most essential thing in connection with the prosecution of the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, assuredly, I entirely agree with the gentleman; but the gentleman will recall that out of a similar bill reported and passed under the gentleman's direction not very long ago, more than $50,000,000 was taken without a word of hearing——

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and the answer to that lies, not in the fact that it was taken but whether it was taken and spent wisely; and about that fact the Committee on Appropriations hope to be able to give to the House further information.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would be very glad if the committee would.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know the gentleman will be glad, and I am quite sure that I will be glad to give the gentleman the information.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for another question? I do not want to embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly. The gentleman never embarrasses me. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. It occurs to me, and perhaps there is no way to remedy it, but I thought it might be wise to call the gentleman's attention to it, so that in investigating deficiencies he might care to look into it, or he might not think it worth while to look into it. For example, transferring men in the Army 8, 10, or 15 times from one place to another before they are finally located—whether some system ought not to be put into effect that would prevent the wasteful extravagance brought about in these transfers.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman that there can be, and ought to be, a reformation in the matter of travel expense for both the services, and I have taken occasion, not once but a number of times, to express to men having the matter in charge the hope that they would very carefully guard against such abuses. But in response to the gentleman's inquiry I want to say that it is perfectly manifest that no man, no matter what his capacity, can hope to undertake to go into a review of expenditures that total billions of dollars without such delay as to preclude his appropriating other moneys that are needed at the time when needed. If the committee may be allowed to say it fairly and modestly, I believe that it has made as full inquiry, not only touching this bill but every other bill that it has reported, as is possible in the time at its disposal. And may I repeat again that if gentlemen would sometimes read our hearings they would have a better appreciation of what the committee has endeavored to do in arriving at the facts.

Mr. MADDEN. I am sure the committee is doing everything that it can do. The question I asked has no bearing on this bill at all——

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand that.

Mr. MADDEN. But I have noticed that sometimes whole units will be ordered, say, to Fort Dodge, and then to Fort Sam Houston, and then to Fort Hancock, and then to some other port before they are finally located. It seems to me that there ought to be some way to reach that.

Mr. SHERLEY. The real way to reach it, and the only way to reach it, is through the efficiency of the military organization itself. I had occasion a week or so ago to call attention to a report recently made by a select committee of the House of Commons of the British Parliament in connection with the munitions portfolio. There was in that report a statement that was strikingly familiar in sound. That was, in substance, that the only thing that stood between the English taxpayer and the extravagant expenditure of money was the wisdom and the efficiency of the administrative officers who were charged with the expenditure, and that statement is just as true of America as it is of England, and it is true of both, not by virtue of the existence or the absence of any legislative machinery but by virtue of the facts that are inherent in the case. When a war is going on time is so important that investigation to prevent extravagance, if undertaken at the time of the appropriation, results in such delay as to be unjustifiable, and all you can do is when you find specific abuses to correct them as well as you can, and to impress, as I have endeavored to impress upon every administrative officer who has come before the committee, the solemn responsibility that rests upon him at this time to protect the Government against useless expenditure of money.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to ask the gentleman a question of detail merely. About two years ago certain fire insurance companies in the country got into a controversy with the Treasury Department as to the tax that they should pay under the revenue act. Of course, they paid the amount assessed by the Treasury Department and then brought proceedings for a rebate. These proceedings were decided in their favor, and in many cases agreements were entered into in their favor about a year ago. I have inquired of the Treasury Department a number of times about the payment of the claim, and they said that they had no money available for the purpose and have been inclined to suggest that Congress was derelict in not making the appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Their suggestion was gratuitous and unwarranted. When they certify the claims to Congress, if they are proper and just claims, regularly audited, they will be carried in the general deficiency bill.

Mr. ROGERS. The Treasury Department has never certified them to Congress?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am informed by the clerk that they have not come to the Committee on Appropriations and I have no knowledge that they ever have been certified.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is an addition to the large sums I have mentioned—$33,000,000 authorized for the Medical Corps. That $33,000,000 embraces a number of items—supplies, drugs, gas masks, motor ambulances, and various and sundry things. We gave an authorization because it was perfectly apparent from the financial statement made by the medical officers that they had on hand more money than they would actually expend between now and the 1st of July. But that money was obligated and was therefore held to meet obligations that would accrue from time to time, and unless they stopped the supplies—and this was particularly true as to the manufacture of gas masks—it was necessary that they be authorized, either by voting the cash or an authorization to continue the flow. The committee realized that the Military Affairs Committee would carry appropriations in the Army bill for this purpose and felt it was better to make the authorization than to give them the cash, due to the fact that if in the future it developed that the moneys that were given were not entirely needed they would be able to take care of the authorization without having the temptation of expending $33,000,000 additional.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky what effect this item will have on our appropriation bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. It will have simply this effect: The Military Affairs Committee will appropriate a good many times more than $33,000,000, and they will take up this authorization out of those moneys, and if these moneys are not sufficient they will come for additional money. The gentleman need not worry; the Medical Corps, with all of its virtues, has not failed in modesty of requests touching appropriations.

Mr. McKENZIE. That was one thing in my mind; I could not understand why they should come to the Appropriations Committee and ask an authorization of this character.

Mr. SHERLEY. To prevent laches. I will give the gentleman a concrete illustration. For instance, the Government is engaged in the manufacture of gas masks. Now, that manufacture must continue, and to continue many things must be ordered in advance. If they were to be denied, this money and have to wait until the 1st of July, that would leave a hiatus or stoppage in the flow of supplies and in the work carried on in the Government assembly plants and would greatly interfere with the manufacture of the gas masks at the rate they are seeking to furnish them.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the Army appropriation bill had had the right of way in preference to this bill, there would have been no necessity for this authorization, would there?

Mr. SHERLEY. It would depend upon whether the items in the Army appropriation bill were immediately available. It would also depend upon whether there was an actual deficiency in these cases. Where there is an actual deficiency the Military Committee can not undertake within its jurisdiction to deal with it.

These, Mr. Chairman, constitute the large items that go to make up the total of $123,000,000. There are a number of pieces of legislation proposed, all of it administrative in character, because the committee has very carefully refrained from attempting to usurp the jurisdiction of legislative committees by carrying legislation in the bill. They will be found set out, as is the uniform practice of the Committee on Appropriations, in the report submitted to the House, printed in italics, so that every Member of the House who wants to exercise ordinary diligence can advise himself in detail of any proposed legislation. They are found on pages 3 and 4 of the report.

There is a request of considerable size for additional personal service in the War Department. The committee has never in the past allowed the full amount asked by the War Department for additional personal help. It has felt that it was well to give to the War Department the need to constantly reexamine its estimates as to the need of additional service in order that there might be taken up the slack that is inevitable in a bureau that has had the great and sudden expansion that this has had. The committee is glad to say to the House that it believes that there is a more keen appreciation and realization on the part of the War Department of the need of further carefully scrutinizing the demand in the way of additional clerks, and that steps have been taken and are now on the way for a careful inspection of the bureaus of that department looking to the elimination of unnecessary employees. The committee has met the situation by an appropriation which it believes is sufficient for the department to the 1st of July.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is the $900,000 mentioned on page 6 of the bill to take care of deficiencies between now and the 1st of July?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is to carry their existing organizations to the 1st of July, and to allow not what they estimated for the increase between now and then, but for what the committee estimate ought to be the increase between now and then. Most of it is to take care of the existing personnel. The gentleman will also notice that there is a provision which limits to five people the number that can be employed under this fund at salaries as high as $5,000 each. The department urged that the amount be placed at $7,500, and that they be not limited as to the number, and the Secretary himself presented rather strong reasons in favor of that. In view of the well-known sentiment of the House the committee did not feel justified in going that far, but it did feel that it was warranted in permitting five men to be employed at not more than $5,000 each. Mr. Chairman, this Government is faced with a realization that it either has to accept the voluntary services of men, and then be subject to all of the criticism that grows out of that practice, or it must pay real salaries to get real men of ability. In life you never get something for nothing, and particularly is that true of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I shall hope, in the consideration of the bill, to advise the committee touching any item that is in it respecting which inquiry may be made. In order not to delay its consideration I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, including rental of offices in the District of Columbia, contingent and miscellaneous expenses, printing and binding, and personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $60,000,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1919.

Section 7 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, is amended to read as follows:

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question in respect to the housing proposition. Has the department adopted a plan to be worked out as a general proposition in providing houses by which they ask the people in the community to organize companies and subscribe a certain portion of money, and then the War Department through the General War Board or the Housing Commission, I believe they term it, will supply the remainder? For instance, if the local people supply 80 per cent, will the Housing Commission supply 20 per cent, or what is the plan of working out this housing proposition, if any plan has been adopted?

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall endeavor as briefly as I can to answer the gentleman's question, although there are 100 pages of testimony that were taken by the committee in an effort to get an answer to just such a question.

Mr. ROBBINS. I asked the question in good faith, because of applicants from my own district.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know that, and I am not quarreling with the gentleman at all. I am just explaining to him that it is a little difficult, as he will appreciate in a moment, to answer briefly his question. The proposed plan or plans will vary according to localities. There was originally created in the Council of National Defense a committee for the purpose of studying housing problems. Out of that committee afterwards grew the creation of a commission in the Department of Labor, of which Mr. Eidlitz is the head, and a number of other prominent gentlemen are associated with him to study this problem.

They undertook to make inquiries into those cases where either the War Department or the Navy Department said to them there was need for housing, and as to those cases where the communities themselves made similar statements and their statements were verified by the department, and then, after a survey, they have tentatively mapped out what they thought was necessary to do. They undertook in each instance to take a preliminary survey, which would determine whether it was possible to house the additional workmen that either had come or were going to those communities in houses already existing—in other words, to see whether the community had reached what they phrased as the saturation point. They also undertook to determine whether it was possible to open up other localities as tributaries to such manufacturing establishments where the workmen were employed by improving methods of transportation. Failing in either of those methods and having by a survey of the men employed and to be employed come to the conclusion that there was need of additional housing, they then undertook, as far as possible, to get that housing provided by the voluntary action of citizens in the community, or the corporations affected, or by boards of trade, or other civic organizations.

They desire wherever it is practical to aid some organization of the community rather than to undertake directly Government building and Government ownership. In some cases they have been unable to get any sort of local aid. They suggested that they propose in a number of instances to loan 80 per cent of the cost of building a given number of houses, the loan to be made to a subsidiary corporation created for that purpose by the corporation employing the workmen for whom housing is sought. For instance, the Bethlehem Steel Co. might create a subsidiary corporation which would agree to furnish the land and 20 per cent of the cost of the building, and the Government would then furnish the additional 80 per cent, taking a first mortgage upon the houses so built, and in some instances with an agreement as a part of the terms of the loan that within a period of five years after the close of the war, there should be a valuation of the property to determine what it would cost to reproduce it as it was in the first instance, and to the extent that that represented a less sum than the actual cost, the mortgage should be reduced. In other words, the Government in such cases is assuming what might be called the war cost of building. If, for instance, 100 houses were constructed at $3,000 each, and it was determined after the war upon a valuation that those houses could be constructed at the time of such valuation for $2,800 each, there would be a wiping off of $200 for each house upon the entire 100 houses, and to that extent the mortgage which had been taken by the Government would be considered satisfied. Touching the rest of it, there should be paid 5 per cent interest as the law passed by Congress provided, and at the termination of the period of the loan, the payment of the principal. That has been the plan proposed in a number of cases. In some other instances, particularly in connection with navy yards where the Government owns the establishment that needs to have the housing for its workmen, it has been proposed that the Government itself would build.

It developed in the hearing that the problem was largely one of permanent housing, not because of the desirability of housing permanently, but because of the character of the workmen who were to be supplied with houses. Temporary housing is practical for much unskilled labor and for a limited amount of skilled labor. Single men can to a limited degree be so taken care of, but for the skilled mechanics who have their families it is necessary to provide them something better than could be supplied through temporary barrack construction, and the difference between the two in cost would not be such as to warrant putting up simply temporary buildings. So while they have practically in every instance refused to agree to the full demand of the locality as to the number of houses to be built, their program looks in large measure to the building of permanent houses that can be sold, and are to be sold where the Government owns them, to workmen who will live in them and will expect actually to own them. Where the Government makes a loan and takes a mortgage the house will be of such a character and in such locality as to assure the return to the Government of the money that is loaned. At least that is both the hope and expressed belief of those gentlemen. Now, as I stated in other instances, they are undertaking by aiding in transportation to solve some of the problems. The gentleman will find on page 8 of the hearings a list of the cities where there have been requests for purchasing houses and where they have come to some conclusion as to the amount of money that they would probably expend at such places. On page 9 is a list of other cities that have made requests and where requests have not yet been acted upon. Now, it became early apparent in the hearings that it was impossible for the committee to designate in the allotment of moneys and by the character of houses as to how this money should be expended, but a reading of the hearings will clearly disclose, I think, that these men, who are experts in their respective lines, have given to the subject a degree of study that warrants the belief that as far as possible there will be a safeguarding of the Government's moneys. The committee examined into each program of building that had to any degree been determined on.

Mr. ROBBINS. That answers very fully the inquiry. I noticed page 8 and 9, and had read the list of places that applied, but no town I had in mind seems to have been included in this list. Butler, Pa., whose application was presented, on behalf of the board of trade with members of the board of trade, does not seem to be included, and Erie, Pa., which I was advised at the same time had been favorably acted on, does not seem to be included. This is only, however, an omission that is not fatal at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not recall either of those instances, but it is only fair to say the lists presented there are tentative. I think this ought to be said, and I say it without reference to the two instances that the gentleman cites, that there ought to be impressed through the membership of this House upon the communities of this country the very great duty that rests upon such communities to take care of this burden as far as it is possible; that they are not to assume that because the Government has seen fit to appropriate moneys for housing that it means thereby that it is to do all of the housing that needs to be done. The community that gets the benefit of great industrial activities on account of war orders, that has an expanse and a growth and a prosperity growing out of that, has a very definite pronounced patriotic obligation in turn to assume burdens that flow from those benefits, and not to look to the Treasury of the United States to house all the people who happen to come there.

Mr. ROBBINS. I think that was the same statement that was made to the Board of Trade of Butler, Pa., by the housing officials to whom they applied over in the city here, on F Street, I believe. I want to clear up the statement the gentleman made as to the depreciation charged off at the period of revaluation after the war for houses which were erected by the Government on the basis of 20 per cent advance by the Government and 80 per cent advance by the local community——

Mr. SHERLEY. It is the other way around; 80 per cent by the Government and 20 per cent by the local community, corporation, or individual.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it the idea of the gentleman and of those who are interested in it in perfecting this housing proposition and its operation that that would be charged off as depreciation and credited to a Government mortgage, without any payment by the local people?

Mr. SHERLEY. The word "depreciation" is misleading. The idea is this: Building at this time is of necessity more expensive than at any other time——

Mr. ROBBINS. We appreciate that very much.

Mr. SHERLEY. And because it is more expensive to-day, private interests hesitate to undertake it. Now, if they are to be charged with the entire cost of building, the only thing that they get in the way of inducement is the loan at 5 per cent that the Government makes. They have insisted—and I am simply stating their case now, without necessarily meaning to say it meets my approbation—they have insisted that inasmuch as they have to build at a time when there is an excess of anywhere from 30 to 50 per cent in building cost, they should be permitted to pay back as of the value of that property if built in normal times, and they give to the Government the option to have an appraisal made at any time within five years after the close of the war. Now, that appraisal is not for the purpose of determining the value of the houses when appraised, but it is to determine what it would cost to erect at this time new houses exactly like those were when new.

Mr. ROBBINS. Protect them against the excessive cost?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the purpose of such provisions.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Is it the purpose to deduct from this $60,000,000 for housing money to establish electric-light plants, pave streets, and establish water companies?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think with perhaps the one exception of a proposed plan down near Portsmouth none of the items discussed were items where it was proposed to build houses outside of existing municipalities. In no instance was it proposed to create municipal facilities other than the suggestion touching some property outside of Portsmouth.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I have in mind the shipping plant at Bristol. They are spending there about $5,000,000. They are opening a great many streets; they are placing a sewerage system in the streets, installing electric lights and water pipes, and paving the streets, and expending a great deal of money. Would that come out of the $60,000,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is a case where the moneys come from the moneys furnished the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation, and it is pursuant to an act that was passed some months ago authorizing the Emergency Fleet Corporation or the Shipping Board to expend up to $50,000,000 for housing purposes.

Now, I suspect, without recalling the details, though we had some testimony by the Shipping Board in the sundry civil bill as to Bristol, that this is the situation, namely, that they found that as a business proposition it was better to take certain lands that could be obtained in sufficient quantity at a reasonable rate; and they are building these houses and opening up the streets with a view of subsequent sale of the houses, rather than to undertake to buy expensive land that might not be as suitable for the purpose. And it might be quite possible, as the gentleman says, and I have no doubt it is, that in that instance they are opening up new streets.

Now, there is another question in that connection, and that is one of the reasons why, in my judgment, it is desirable to authorize in this bill the creation of a corporation. If the Government buys these lots and erects the buildings on them, the property ceases to be taxable for either municipal, county, or State purposes; and, of course, it is not to be expected that if you take out of a community certain of its taxable assets the community will of its own accord furnish municipal facilities. And in the hearings it was suggested that one of the things that was desirable to do, instead of having the Government go into the creation of municipalities, was to enter into agreements with existing municipalities, where it was practicable, for the extension of their sewerage and water and lighting and streets and fire and police facilities in consideration of having added property that would be sufficiently valuable for taxation to give a return for the facilities given.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Has the President authorized the organization headed by Mr. Eidlitz, that was created by the Secretary of Labor, to go ahead with this housing proposition?

Mr. SHERLEY. At the time of the hearing he had not formally done so, but I have no doubt of his determination to use these gentlemen in the carrying out of this act. I say that because of the fact that in connection with some of these preliminary surveys and work that they have been doing, and which ought to have been done, and had to be done, if the situation was to be met, he has advanced out of the fund that Congress placed at his disposal a limited amount of money, I think something like $60,000. So I have no doubt he will use this existing organization.

Mr. MAPES. Can the gentleman tell us whether or not any conclusion has been reached as to how these houses that are to be built by the Government are to be furnished?

Mr. SHERLEY. They are not to be furnished by the Government at all. They are to be rented unfurnished; that is, outside of those in the District of Columbia, where they do expect to furnish them, and have dormitories composed of several hundred rooms, each room to house a single person.

Mr. MAPES. It will be necessary to furnish those, will it not?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAPES. And is that the settled policy of the organization?

Mr. SHERLEY. I gathered that that was their policy. The testimony showed that they did not contemplate the furnishing of any of these houses that are to be built elsewhere. And, as I stated a few minutes ago, it was their desire not to build these in any instance except as a final resort.

Mr. MAPES. My inquiry was directed more especially to the housing facilities to be put up here in the District.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, in the District there are some proposals looking to the building on four sites here of dormitories, probably exclusively for women. The dormitories will house different numbers, according to the area available, divided into rooms that will be occupied by one person and which will be simply furnished and to have in connection with such dormitories a restaurant, the facilities of which will probably be given—and when I say "given" I do not mean in the sense of a gratuity—to some concessionaire, who will run the restaurant.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question on another matter?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. Is there any provision in the $11,000,000 for training camps, for any training camps outside of those connected with the regular cantonments?

Mr. SHERLEY. The $11,000,000 for training camps was for training camps for any training camps outside of those committee had no opportunity to express an opinion in regard to their wisdom or their unwisdom. It developed that the Secretary of the Navy had taken the responsibility of ordering this work done, and there was $11,000,000 to be met, and there was nothing for the committee to do but to meet it.

Now, the gentleman will find on page 141 of the hearings a statement setting out the training camps and the estimates as to the expenditures at the various camps. They are all existing camps, and the amount which is to be expended or which has been expended is set out there. The gentleman will see that $7,650,000 is on camps where the work has been let and is under way; $950,000 is at camps where the work has been let but is not under way; and $2,400,000 is where authority has been given but where there has been no actual contract made.

Mr. SNELL. But there is nothing in this that provides for any additional camps?

Mr. SHERLEY. No, sir. The gentleman will find the details set out there. The committee has had no option. It is manifest that it is impossible for the committee, I will say to the gentleman, to ascertain how extensive the building should be and whether it is being done economically or not. The clerk reminds me that it did develop in the testimony that there were projects that had not been approved by the Navy looking to an expenditure of $4,000,000, but they are not involved in the amounts that are carried in this bill.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman tell from what fund the nitrate plants Nos. 2 and 3, that have been decided upon, come—Nos. 2 and 3, down at Muscle Shoals?

Mr. SHERLEY. My subcommittee has had no hearing on that. The subcommittee on fortifications is having a hearing at this time on that and other matters in connection with the fortification bill. My understanding is that a very large part of the fund was obtained from the money appropriated in one of the deficiency bills last year in connection with the purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon; it was held that the language "manufacture and test" made available such portions of that fund as were necessary in connection with the manufacture of ammunition.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman says the fortifications subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations is considering that at the present time?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. They are having hearings in connection with the estimates for the coming year, and, as always has been the practice of the Committee on Appropriations, they endeavor in connection with new estimates to make inquiry into the expenditures that have been made under similar items heretofore; and I happen to know—because I have talked the matter over with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]—that this particular matter will be inquired into. I personally am not familiar with the testimony that has been given over the last several days.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The entire amount of the plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals was taken from the item that the gentleman refers to. Does the gentleman know what item is being used for the construction of those two new nitrate plants?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not; but I presume the same thing would apply as to them. There was also an appropriation of $20,000,000 in the national defense act. Just how much of it has been used, or will be used, I do not know; but I think the gentleman will admit before he is through the inquiry—and I have no objection to the inquiry—that, assuming the necessity for a greatly increased capacity in this country for the making of various forms of explosives——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think there is no question but that it is necessary——

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment—and assuming the need for the creation of additional sources for the supply of nitrate as an incident to the manufacture of such explosives, that the department would have been derelict in duty if it had not undertaken to supply the deficiency in those particulars as early as possible. Now, by that I do not mean to say that the method pursued has been wise or unwise, though I do not think that the statements heretofore made have warranted the assumption that some gentlemen have indulged in, that the whole matter was indefensible and without excuse.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think that anybody has denied the necessity for getting a larger supply of nitrate, but the gentleman must agree to this, that that appropriation when made was intended for objects other than the building of nitrate plants, and therefore if a large amount, some hundreds of millions, is taken out of that item——

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not agree to anything of the sort. I do not come close to it. I will tell you what I do agree to, and that is that the practice in the past has been—and by that I mean before the war—that whenever a department had in contemplation the creation of some factory or facility for manufacture that involved a sum at all large, instead of undertaking to get it out of the funds carried for guns or ammunition generally, they came to Congress and specifically asked for it. That is the way we created our various arsenals. But it does not follow that, because that was the practice in the past, there may not have existed conditions that warranted them in using this money for this purpose; and it does not follow, as implied in the question of the gentleman from Ohio, that such use means a diversion of funds, and that it results in a less sum being available for ammunition purposes. Just the contrary may be true. It does not necessarily matter in the way of quantity production of ammunition whether that money is expended in buying the finished product, whether all of it was so expended or part of it expended in getting those things that go to make the finished product.

Mr. SNELL. Does the money for the establishment of the water power come out of the same fund as that in connection with the building of the plant?

Mr. SHERLEY. My only knowledge on that point is derived from some statements made by the gentleman from Ohio, which I neither question or confirm.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My information came from the Secretary of War, and I can tell the gentleman that Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals is being built with moneys taken from the $20,000,000 nitrate fund, and the money for the erection of the plant itself is being taken from this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for another minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. We can best get at this matter when it comes before the House in a regular way and when all of us will have all of the information that is available on the subject.

Mr. SNELL. When will that come?

Mr. SHERLEY. That will come under the fortifications bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President, if in his judgment such action is deemed necessary or advantageous, may authorize the creation of a corporation or corporations for the purpose of carrying out the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, such corporation or corporations to have or obtain all powers necessary or appropriate therefor. The total capital stock of the corporation or corporations authorized hereunder shall not exceed $60,000,000: Provided, That where such corporation or corporations are created by authority of the President, representatives appointed by the President, or by such agency as he may designate to carry out the purposes of the said act, shall subscribe to, own, and vote the capital stock thereof for and on behalf of the United States, and shall do all other things in regard thereto necessary to protect the interests of the United States and to carry out the provisions of the said act: Provided further, That section 605 of the Code of the District of Columbia prohibiting a corporation from buying, selling, or dealing in real estate shall not apply to such corporation or corporations so created or designated, with respect to buying, selling, or dealing in real estate in furtherance of the provisions of the said act: Provided further, That the act entitled "An act to amend section 552 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia, relating to incorporations," approved February 4, 1905, shall not apply to any corporation or corporations created under the authority contained in this paragraph.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of stating a fact that recently has come to my knowledge and which does not affect the legislation here, because it is nothing which Congress can affect one way or the other. It is a matter entirely within the executive action of the departments and bureaus. That is the competition here in Washington between the different bureaus and agencies of the Government, which I hope will not affect the building of these houses. I was told recently of one department where the men who were working were drawn out of their employment to another department because they were working 8 hours and the other department offered them the opportunity to work 10 hours, and, of course, for the two extra hours they would receive overtime. Therefore it was more attractive to them than where they were working. So they were drawn away from where they were doing good work to another department which, perhaps, needed them less. I do not believe that the question as to which needed them most was at all taken into consideration in their final apportionment.

I heard of another case where bricklayers who were working in one department here in Washington at $6 a day were offered $8 a day here by another department, and so they were taken away from the place where they were probably quite satisfied and doing good work at $6 a day to the other department paying them $8 a day. Now, which department needed them most I do not know. If there was any assurance that they finally were landed in the place where they could do the most good to the Government, it would lessen my criticism.

Mr. SNYDER. Were the men who offered them the higher wages working on a contract?

Mr. GILLETT. No; these were both strictly Government departments or bureaus or agencies. I do not care to be specific and say who they were, because I do not wish to criticize any department; but it simply illustrates a condition which exists. I hope the Department of Labor, which is to engage in this housing business, will not follow the practice which other departments are now apparently following, of bidding against some other department, thereby constantly enhancing wages and increasing the cost to the Government, and worst of all not insuring that the department which needs them most finally gets them. There ought to be, and I suppose there is, on paper an organization to accomplish the object that there shall not be this competition among the departments, and that some one shall have supreme jurisdiction where a man shall go. But as these facts were brought to my attention I thought I would bring them to the attention of the authorities in this way, hoping that the abuse which apparently exists in Washington will not be increased by this very large addition to the employment of labor.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the temporary employment of such additional force of clerks and other employees as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be proper and necessary to the prompt, efficient, and accurate dispatch of official business in the War Department and its bureaus, to be allotted by the Secretary of War to such bureaus and offices as the exigencies of the existing situation may demand, $900,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall submit to Congress on the first day of its next regular session a statement showing by bureaus or offices the number and designation of the persons employed hereunder and the annual rate of compensation paid to each: Provided further, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $5,000 per annum, not more than 5 persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $2,400 per annum each, and not more than 35 persons shall be employed at a rate of compensation in excess of $1,800 per annum each.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, who is the clerk that is to be employed at $5,000 a year in the War Department? At page 6, line 12, there is a provision for one clerk in the War Department to be employed at $5,000 a year.

Mr. SHERLEY. No clerk.

Mr. KAHN. What is the $5,000 salary for?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is for those high-grade people whom the Secretary of War personally stated that he needed in connection with a lot of work that was going on in the department, among other things the systematizing of contracts. The gentleman will note that the paragraph relates to the temporary employment of such additional force of clerks and other employees as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be proper and necessary.

I stated awhile ago, during the gentleman's absence, that the Secretary said he had but one of three methods that he knew of available to him for a certain character of work—either to accept the services of men who volunteered, with all the evils that have been so frequently pointed out on this floor, or the employment of men at salaries sufficient to get men of real competence, or turning over of important work to men who were simply clerks and not competent, or giving men commissions, with such high rank as would give them commensurate salaries, and which he thought was a very indefensible method. He urged very strongly upon the committee that we allow appointments at a rate as high as $7,500 a year, and without any other limitation than that he should personally make the appointment and certify the reason for it. The committee, having in mind somewhat the attitude of this House in the past, reached the conclusion that the allowance of five salaries not exceeding $5,000 would probably enable him to meet the situation, and it accordingly fixed that limitation.

Mr. KAHN. I have no objection to giving to the Secretary of War all the assistance that he needs——

Mr. SHERLEY. The proposition was simply this, and I am sure the gentleman will agree with it. It is perfectly apparent that in this day, with the tremendous expansion of that department, there is great need of a limited number of high-grade men. Now, you can get those men either by having them volunteer, or by paying them a salary, or by commissioning them, and I think the payment of a salary is a legitimate, dignified way for the Government to do it.

Mr. KAHN. I agree with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Medical and Hospital Department, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918 and in the deficiency appropriation act approved October 6, 1917, the Secretary of War is authorized to enter into contracts and otherwise to incur obligations not to exceed $33,000,000 in addition to the appropriations heretofore made.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to have information about that item.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will give it again. I am sorry the gentleman was not here when I made the explanation a few minutes ago. I shall be glad to make it again.

The gentleman will find by looking at the hearings that the Medical Department came in with a statement showing the expenditures that they had made under the appropriations that had been given to them heretofore of $130,806,000; and they showed that there was in the way of expenditures and obligations an indebtedness that more than took up that amount of money, and that they needed, under additional obligations or appropriations, for motor vehicles, $2,985,000; replacements and repairs, $1,040,000; printing and binding, $100,000; veterinary supplies, medicines, and antiseptics, $269,019; dressings, $142,824.12; instruments, $67,272.92; horse blankets, $245,000; gas masks, $11,000,000; employees and operatives, $1,257,000. Other medical and hospital supplies: Medicines, antiseptics, and disinfectants, $5,000,000; surgical dressings and sutures, $14,000,000; hospital equipment and supplies, $1,600,000; textiles, $6,000,000; instruments and appliances, $900,000; litters, pack saddles, and field chests, $500,000; making a total of $45,316,116.04.

Then they had an expense of civilian employees, that is out in the field, of $1,315,000; laundry hospital linen, $400,000; civilian medical service, $500,000; expressage on medical property, $4,000; gas and electricity and laboratory apparatus, $4,000; miscellaneous, $6,000; allowance to disbursing officers in Europe for which no accountability will be made to the Surgeon General, $3,600; making a total of $51,145,116.04.

At the time this statement was made they had $18,233,305.35 unobligated, which left $33,000,000, the amount we are carrying here. At the time the hearing was had, which was later than the time the table was made up, there were a number of items that had changed the $18,000,000, which, as I said a moment ago, had been all obligated, but the table I have read gives you the situation, after four or five hours of hard work with the Medical Corps.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel, lights, repairs, miscellaneous items, and printing for the fiscal years that follow:
Nineteen hundred and eighteen, $45,150.
Nineteen hundred and nineteen, $147,500.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Does the Government manufacture its own electricity for all these new buildings?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think in all new temporary buildings it buys it. It was stated that they were buying at a rate which was as cheap as they could make it. I do not think that applies generally to permanent buildings. Eight or ten years ago I had occasion to go into the cost of making electricity in the District of Columbia when they had a proposition to sell us electricity at a price which ran all the way from 10 cents down to 3 cents, and 3 cents was extravagant. In connection with these particular buildings I think we are getting it as cheaply as we could make it.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know what the rate is?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is a sliding scale, making it considerably under 3 cents, but I do not remember accurately the rate.

The Clerk read as follows:

War and Navy Department temporary office buildings (Potomac Park): For the following employees from August 15, 1918, to June 30, 1919, inclusive, at annual rates of compensation as follows: Assistant superintendent, $2,000; clerks—1 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 4 of class 1, 4 at $1,000 each; 4 messengers, at $720 each; chief engineer, $1,800; assistant engineers—1 $1,600, 6 at $1,400 each; chief electrician, $1,600; electricians—4 at $1,400 each, 4 at $1,200 each; foreman, $1,600; carpenters—3 at $1,400 each, 7 at $1,200 each; sign writer, $1,400; painters—3 at $1,200 each, 2 at $1,000 each; plumbers—1 $1,400, 4 at $1,200 each; steam fitters—2 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,200 each; machinist, $1,400; 4 switchboard operators, at $1,200 each; 6 general mechanics, at $1,000 each; guards—captain $1,600, 6 lieutenants at $1,080 each, 8 sergeants at $930 each, 205 at $780 each, 80 at $720 each; fire marshal, $1,080; foreman of laborers, $1,000; 2 assistant foremen of laborers, at $840 each; 83 laborers, at $660 each; 22 female laborers, at $480 each; 8 forewomen of charwomen, at $300 each; 208 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $388,955.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On page 10, line 4, there is a provision for a sign writer at $1,400. What is a sign writer?

Mr. SHERLEY. In this instance he is a painter who paints the signs for all the doors and hallways to help people find the offices and to indicate who are in the offices.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Is he employed continuously every day writing signs?

Mr. SHERLEY. He is employed continuously, and when not painting signs he is doing general painting work around the place.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. He does other work besides painting signs?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

War Department temporary office building (Eighteenth Street and Virginia Avenue NW.): For the following employees from July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, inclusive, at annual rates of compensation, as follows: Assistant superintendent, $1,800; clerk of class 1; chief engineer, $1,400; assistant engineer, $1,000; 6 firemen at $840 each; 4 coal passers at $720 each; electrician, $1,200; carpenter, $1,200; painter, $1,000; general mechanic, $1,000; guards—captain $1,200, 3 sergeants at $930 each, 42 privates at $780 each; foreman of laborers, $840; 10 laborers at $660 each; 3 female laborers at $480 each; 2 forewomen of charwomen at $300 each; 18 charwomen at $240 each; in all, $68,270.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. On page 9, line 25, I see there is an assistant superintendent at $2,000, and on page 10, line 25, an assistant superintendent at $1,800. Why is it not proper to reduce the one who draws $2,000, on page 9, in the Navy Department to $1,800, who seems to perform the same duties and hold the same office as the other and known by the same name? Why the difference?

Mr. SHERLEY. They have the same name but do not do the same amount of work. One of them is in charge of buildings very much larger than the other. The committee took the statement of Col. Ridley, who has charge of the matter and knows what these people ought to be paid. In these two instances he testified he was having great difficulty in getting men at all fitted to attend to the jobs at the salaries ordinarily paid. All the gentleman needs to do is to recall what unskilled laborers are getting to-day to realize that that is true because these men are not getting a permanent Government position, at least I hope they are not. These buildings will pass away in the course of a few years. Anyway that particular difference was at the instance of Col. Ridley, who said that the work they had to do warranted the difference in the salary.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to say that I have been through these buildings somewhat, and so far as my observations go they are filled with clerks that are not employed. They are not busy. The service down there looks to me as if it was very indifferently and inefficiently rendered. Now, I want to be understood; I do not mean to say that those who are working are not performing their duty but they do not all work. On one occasion as I walked through the buildings at Seventh and B Streets I observed a great many idlers. As I and my friend went through one long room we counted seven girls and four boys sitting at a desk talking in one room. We took occasion to pass back through the same room 5 or 10 minutes afterwards and they were doing the same thing. Now, I have no objection to paying one of these men $1,800 and the other $2,000, for I accept the gentleman's explanation in this instance, but I wanted to make the other observation which struck me at the time, that if these two men are in charge of the buildings there, they ought to see that the people employed there work.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, he is laboring under a misapprehension as to what this force is for. This force has nothing to do with the clerical force of which he is speaking. This force is there for the purpose of attending to the heat, light, cleaning, and protection of the building. Touching the other matter, I want to say this: I have taken occasion—not once, not twice, not six times, but a dozen times—to call the attention of the various responsible officers of the Government to statements that have been made upon the floor and off the floor similar to what the gentleman has just said. I think—I know—that some of that criticism has been warranted by the facts. It is fair to say that there are times, of necessity, when a bureau is undergoing expansion, when there will be some slack that can not be immediately taken up, but that does not explain what has been a condition in the past. Some of it has been due to the very great incompetency of some of the clerical service that we get here, and if the Civil Service Commission would get a more intelligent examination, I think we would get a better class of clerks. We might not get quite so many school-teachers, but we might get more people who know about clerical duties. I want to say in justification of the department that an officer has recently been detailed upon this very matter, and I had occasion to talk to him—in point of fact, he sought me out as a result of some criticisms that I had made—and I have reason to believe that he and other people are going to correct and are correcting now some of the abuses of which the gentleman complains. When the sundry civil bill hearings come out the gentleman will find page after page of inquiry of various people in connection with just that question. You are usually met with the statement that they do not know of the incidents of which they complain. I suggest to Members of Congress—and it is not a pleasant duty, and there are a lot of things that are not pleasant these days—that instead of coming on the floor and making a general assertion, they come with the concrete case, when they see a case of that kind, and take the time to make some inquiry and find out who the clerk is and who is the man responsible for the clerk, so that we can put our finger on the people and get results. There are 15,000 temporary employees now in the War Department. It is impossible to indict every one and get anywhere, but if gentlemen will bring specific cases we will be glad to aid them in getting at the responsible people.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to call the gentleman's attention in that connection to another incident that occurred to me, subject perhaps to his suggestion that I ought to be specific and get the names and places and the officers in charge. On Friday last, about half past 10 o'clock in the morning, I came along by those buildings at Seventh and B Streets. I had been in the one located farthest south on business. I found the whole street filled with clerks. It was not the noon hour. It was about half past 10 o'clock in the morning, but it looked like the Atlantic City boardwalk, and the gentleman who was with me made the same comment and wondered how it was that all those clerks were out. Boys and girls would walk up to the corner, buying ice-cream cones and going over to the fruit stand across the street, and seemed to be out for a holiday rather than working for our Government in war time. Does the gentleman know the explanation for that unusual condition of affairs?

Mr. SHERLEY. I expect the explanation is this: In certain departments the clerks are at work longer than seven hours, some perhaps working longer than eight hours, and they are being given 10-minute rest periods, I think, twice a day, in addition to the lunch hour. In other words, they come to work at an earlier hour and stay later, and it has been deemed advisable by the officers having them in charge to give them certain rest periods, and I am not prepared to say that that may not be wise administration, assuming that it does not mean actual curtailing of the work but simply means longer time down there, with rest periods so as to prevent the fag and the fatigue that slows down work. I think that is the explanation of the incident of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry with reference to these appropriations for these different employees?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Will they be eligible for the horizontal increase that has been given other Government employees?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman means the $120 increase?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. That matter is in conference between the House and the Senate. It depends upon what comes out of conference. The Senate raised the amount and undertook to restrict it so as not to have it apply to new bureaus that have been created since July, 1916. The House provision did not so restrict it as to bureaus, but did restrict it to a lesser sum.

Mr. WALSH. I had forgotten for the moment that that matter had not been definitely acted upon; but if that is adopted, it depends upon the form in which it is finally enacted?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; but in these instances it would not affect these people, because this is not a new establishment but is an expanded old one.

The Clerk read as follows:

The char force of the foregoing temporary office buildings and the temporary office buildings in Henry Park, which is employed and paid by the bureaus or offices occupying the said buildings, shall be subject to the supervision and control of the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Building.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The reason for that provision is this: There developed a rather curious situation growing out of an old division of authority, that had a reason, in old buildings. The superintendent of these buildings had charge of the charwomen engaged in cleaning the corridors, but had nothing to do with the cleaning of the space that was occupied by the offices. That was perfectly understandable in a building like the State, War, and Navy Building, which is divided into many rooms, but in a great number of these new buildings there are no rooms in the sense of rooms apart from the corridors. The corridor consists simply of a path through the middle of one big room, with a rail on either side, and it was absurd to have two different forces of charwomen under two different managements taking care of that space, and this is to correct that situation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of remains: For transportation of remains, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918, $300,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. In reference to the item of $300,000 I wish to ask the gentleman, and I do not wish to elicit any information that will be very dismal or improper to obtain, but I had a constituent killed in battle on the French front, and upon request for the return of his remains, at the instance of his father in this case, I was advised that no returns would be made until the close of the war. If that be true, what is the necessity for this item? Is there an explanation? I do not care to go into it in detail or to make any inquiry that would disclose anything improper at all, but the item seems rather unusual.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, this relates to the Navy and not to the Army. The Navy are bringing home a certain number of men who die on ships in foreign waters, and it also is used for the purpose of transporting the remains of men in the service here in America who die either aboard ship or ashore. The Navy has undergone a very large expansion, and we have felt that while we did not know that they would need this amount of money that they might need it, and the committee naturally did not want to refuse any money for such purpose.

Mr. ROBBINS. I understand that; I just wanted to inquire.

The Clerk read as follows:

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

For office expenses, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918, $8,000.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do not know anything as to the necessity of this item for the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and I do not want particularly to take part in the discussion as to whether clerks in Washington are, generally speaking, working, or, generally speaking, loafing. So far as my observation goes, they are working; but I do believe there is a whole lot of Government work being done here in Washington and elsewhere which has nothing whatever to do with the winning of this war, work that might as well be postponed now as not, and that the force of clerks so employed ought to be transferred to the War Department or the Navy Department or to some other department which is essential to the winning of the war. The Provost Marshal General has recently classified certain industries as nonessential and has said that men, even those who are married, who are holding certain positions in hotels and in other places must seek other work or fight. Now, there are lots of men from my observation doing Government work which is nonessential and who ought to seek other work or be forced to fight. On the 9th day of May I introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Bureau of Efficiency be directed to report to the House of Representatives what Government activities in Washington or elsewhere are not essential to the successful prosecution of the war, and also what Government activities could be curtailed during the war so that their clerical forces could be transferred in part to essential war activities.

That resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, for what reason I do not know. I shall ask the Committee on Military Affairs, now that they have their big bill off their hands, to take some action on it or I shall ask a rereference of it.

It probably ought to be referred to some other committee. We certainly ought to have some light on this subject. We passed the Overman bill week before last giving the President full authority to reorganize and transfer men from one department to another, but President Wilson, I think, in all fairness may be said not to be given to drastic action. He does not like to chop off men's heads and throw people out of one place and put them in another if he can help it, but somebody ought to make a study and report on these matters, roughly at least, and let us know, let Congress know, and let the President know what activities could be postponed during the war or what should be curtailed. A great flood of people has been coming to Washington to do war work, congesting all living accommodations and causing unnecessary expense, when there are other people here who might be doing the war work instead of the work they are now doing.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not the gentleman think in the line of his suggestion that the great army of clerks over here in the Interstate Commerce Building valuing railroads could be taken off that job during the war and turned to something else, especially since the Government has taken over the roads?

Mr. PLATT. I do. I think that valuation work is an absolutely idiotic thing to do at this time. They are employing a lot of engineers that ought to be doing Army work. There is not a man employed in that work to-day who feels proud of his work, and several of them have told me so. The engineers who are employed will tell you they are not doing anything worth while. It is an outrage to continue work of that kind when everybody employed in it knows it is not useful at this time, if at any time, and when there is such a tremendous demand for engineers and for competent clerks in war work.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, with the gentleman's general observation I am in accord; as to the illustration used to enforce it I am not. It so happens that the $8,000 is for the purpose of supplying charts for the Navy and Shipping Board, and is more essential now than ever before in its existence——

Mr. PLATT. I fully agree to that.

Mr. SHERLEY. And it was carried for that purpose. I do not agree with the gentleman especially touching the valuing of the railroads, because there is going to be a very great need of that sort of information to protect this Government from the expenditure of a great many millions of dollars in the near future. Whatever may have been the need in the past for doing it, the need has grown, and to stop work now would be to throw away all that is behind us and put ourselves at the mercy of the railroads if we should take them over or if any issue comes as to compensation for them incident to our present occupancy. I want to say I do thoroughly share with the gentleman his general indictment of many of the departments of the Government.

One of the melancholy things in connection with this war is that everybody is willing to tack onto a war need his particular activity, whether there be any legitimate reason in peace or otherwise for its existence, and one of the chief difficulties the Committee on Appropriations has is in trying to force that idea into the heads of men who do not want to see it, even when they do see it. I think the President has the power—and I think he has the desire—to eliminate some of the unnecessary activities that go on, but the ingenuity of men in explaining why the other fellow's job is unnecessary, but that theirs is important, passes all belief. Somehow or other, both in this present emergency and every other that this country has ever faced, it has been exceedingly difficult to divorce any governmental employee from his job. Some of the real achievements of my career in 16 years have consisted in abolishing a few commissions.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wanted to ask the gentleman what particular item in this bill has to do with picric-acid plants which I see the Government is contemplating establishing. What appropriation do they come out of?

Mr. SHERLEY. They do not come out of any in this bill. During the gentleman's absence that matter was discussed considerably. I will say to the gentleman what I said to others, in connection with the hearings on the fortifications bill, it is hoped the committee may be prepared to present to the House as much information as possible relative to the development of these various plants.

However, I was mistaken a moment ago. I was thinking of nitrates. The gentleman is speaking of——

Mr. ANTHONY. Picric acid.

Mr. SHERLEY. All I know about that is what I saw in the newspapers the other day, that one plant had been located at Little Rock.

Mr. ANTHONY. And one at Brunswick, Ga. I wondered what appropriation from the gentleman's committee they come out of.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am unable to answer, but it is quite possible that they come from the fund that is available for the manufacture of ammunition.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman know if there is any particular reason for their location at Brunswick or Little Rock? Are there raw materials there?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman that some time ago a gentleman came to me from my city and said that the city was very anxious to have located a plant at Louisville. I did not give him any help in the matter, not because I did not want to see my city obtain new industries, but since this war I have made it a rule to make no recommendation at all concerning any contractual relation between individuals or localities and the Government. I do not think a man in my position in the House should make such a request, however much he might desire it. All I know is that the gentleman came to me subsequently and said Louisville had lost out and that Little Rock had been chosen.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wondered what appropriation those two plants would come out of.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For stationery for Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, including $1,000 for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House, $1,625.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of asking the gentleman to recur to page 14 and to the item headed "Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks," and including—repairs and preservation at navy yards and stations: For repairs and preservation at navy yards, fuel depots, fuel plants, and stations, $2,100,000.

Will the gentleman kindly state whether the Navy is now accumulating coal at fuel depots and whether this contemplates the erection of new ones? I am asking this now out of order, because I was obliged to leave the Hall for a while.

Mr. SHERLEY. That did not develop in the hearings at all, and this deficiency had nothing to do with that matter. It is a repair item and simply relates to general repairs and preservation at navy yards.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does not contemplate new fuel stations?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is a repair item entirely, and the hearings did not in any sense develop anything relative to such statement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I notice there is a great deal of discussion as to the necessity for buying coal early and putting it away now for next winter, so far as domestic use is concerned, and coal seems to be piling up at a great many Army stations and navy yards. I wondered if any precautions were being taken on that line now?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know that. I hope to present to the House a bill looking to the establishment of a yard here in the District of Columbia to take care of the Government needs for coal. It would save a lot of money and take us out from under the control of the coal dealers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a local question and is pertinent, but this matter of fuel depots does not contemplate the erection of new ones for the Navy, so far as the gentleman knows?

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply say that this item has nothing to do with that one way or the other. I do not know what is being done.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the Clerk correct the totals of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12280) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. To ask unanimous consent that I may be given the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of ordnance and also on the transportation of the Army.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subjects indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, I understand, has stricken out certain matter in his speech to which I called attention the other day?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I do not object.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, before making the motion to adjourn, I want to say that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] intends to call up the military bill to-morrow. And we will adjourn over for Memorial Day. I would like to ask unanimous consent to dispense with the business in order on next Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to dispense on Wednesday with the business in order on Calendar Wednesday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT FROM WEDNESDAY UNTIL FRIDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House, when it adjourns next Wednesday, may adjourn to meet on Friday at 12 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House, when it adjourns next Wednesday, adjourn to meet next Friday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRINTING COPIES OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that the number of copies that can be printed within the $500 limit, without resolution, of the President's message, delivered to-day, be printed and placed in the document room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that as many copies of the President's message, delivered to-day, as can be printed under the limit of $500 be printed and placed in the document room. Is there objection?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, would it not be better to place them in the folding room?

Mr. GARNER. I have no objection, if you want them to go to the folding room. Many Members will not use them, but they would be given away.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I suggest that they go to the folding room.

Mr. GARNER. Very well; I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 279. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in certain cases to missionary or religious organizations; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. J. Res. 131. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of annual installments on the purchase price for land in the Standing Rock Indian Reservation; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REVISION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to revise my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks leave to revise his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to make a unanimous-consent request, the first I have made since I have been in Congress, and I hope it will be granted. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he be permitted to address the House, not to exceed 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 28, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting list of places for which authorization for public-building work is recommended (H. Doc. No. 1134); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation desired by the Quartermaster Corps of the Army to increase the pay of the superintendent of the national cemetery at Mexico City, Mexico (H. Doc. No. 1135); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of War submitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Engineer Department of the Army for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1136); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky (by request): A bill (H. R. 12294) to provide for the redistribution of general taxes and special assessments due and payable on real estate in the District of Columbia in cases of subdivisions or sales of land therein; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma: A bill (H. R. 12295) for the relief of the Ottawa Indian Tribe of Blanchard Fork and Roche de Bœuf; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12296) for the relief of the heirs of the Eastern Cherokee Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12297) granting an increase of pension to Willis J. Gambel; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12298) granting an increase of pension to Andrew J. Molder; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12299) granting an increase of pension to Jerry Daniel; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 12300) granting a pension to Katherin Baker; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: A bill (H. R. 12301) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Henry O. Barrett; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NORTON: A bill (H. R. 12302) granting a pension to Chloe A. Truax; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12303) granting a pension to Naomi Towner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROSE: A bill (H. R. 12304) granting a pension to Annie C. Bonebreak; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TINKHAM: A bill (H. R. 12305) granting a pension to Maria Theresa Smyth; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WALDOW: A bill (H. R. 12306) granting a pension to Margaret A. Kinney; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. CANNON: Petition of D. C. J. Winder and 54 other residents of Kankakee County, Ill., demanding the repeal of the second-class postage provisions of the war-revenue act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: Resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce, Kenosha, Wis., asking Government aid in the construction and maintenance of highways, etc.; to the Committee on Roads.

By Mr. DALE of Vermont: Petition of the Rebekah Council of Vermont, favoring war prohibition; also the petition of a county convention of interdenominational Sunday schools of Vermont, favoring the Barkley war prohibition bill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ELSTON: Petition of Mrs. M. E. Harden and other residents of Alameda County, Cal., favoring the repeal of the zone-rate system of second-class postage; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of Joseph H. Matthews, Edward W. Woodward, and J. R. Scupham, indorsing House bill 259, introduced by Mr. RAKER; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, memorial of Frank Sextus and other residents of Alameda County, Cal., favoring the minimum wage bill; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petitions of Denison Coffee Co.; The Lord & Bushnell Co.; Hall, Wedge & Carter; the Pacific Mutual Door Co.; the Central Bureau, Furniture & Casket Manufacturers, all of Chicago; and Walter D. Williams, manager Security Insurance Co., of Rockford, Ill., protesting against any repeal or postponement of the advanced second-class postage rates as provided in the war-revenue act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Resolution of the Board of Commissioners of Skamania County, Wash., favoring the construction of military highways and post roads in the States of Washington, Oregon, and California; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, resolutions of the Tacoma Central Labor Union, the Tacoma Metal Trades Council, the Tacoma Building Trades Council, and the Tacoma Mill and Smelter Men's Union, No. 27, favoring the Smith-Sears rehabilitation bill; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. KAHN: Papers to accompany H. R. 12291, a bill granting a pension to George Casseboom, Company A, First California Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McFADDEN: Communication from J. Andrew Wilt, adjutant, Watkins Post, No. 68, Grand Army of the Republic, Towanda, Pa., favoring the passage of the so-called Smoot pension bill; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MAGEE: Petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Marcellus, N. Y., favoring prohibition as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 28, 1918.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O God, our Heavenly Father, at this critical hour of the world war, with vast interests hanging in the balance and the world looking on with restless anxiety, we appeal to Thy power to defend our men at the front who are struggling to maintain the principles which pertain to Thy kingdom. The cause of justice and righteousness and honor is the habitation of Thy throne, and we look to Thee with great confidence to lead on the forces contending for these principles. As Thou didst bid Thine ancient people to go forward, and gavest them a lasting victory over their foes, so do Thou speak to our armies on the field of battle to-day and give them a triumphant victory. Paralyze the arms that are raised against them until their enemies shall see the hand of God in the defense of the right, and seek no longer to destroy the peace of mankind. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3799) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 12211. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 12229. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 12280. An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 8764) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a resolution adopted by the New Jersey Society of Architects, of Jersey City, N. J., favoring the utilization of the services of the architects of New Jersey in war work, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Frenchtown, N. J., and a petition of sundry citizens of Washington, N. J., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to prohibit polygamy, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Jersey City, of the Political Study Club of Orange, of the New Jersey State Organization for Public Health of Newark, all in the State of New Jersey, and of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends, of Pennsylvania, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Common Council of Elizabeth, N. J., and a memorial of the Liberty Loan Committee of Elizabeth, N. J., remonstrating against the circulation of periodicals printed in the German language, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Jersey City, N. J., praying for a better system for Americanization of the foreign-born population in the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. KELLOGG presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Vernon and Wilbarger Counties, in the State of Texas, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a communication from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the State of North Dakota, and several telegrams, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication and telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORTH DAKOTA WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION,
Fargo, N. Dak., May 24, 1918.

To the United States Senate:

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the State of North Dakota, representing 3,000 women, protest most emphatically against the delay by the United States Senate in passing the Federal woman's suffrage amendment.

The women of this country are patriotically responding to every call made by the Government and are doing their utmost to help in winning the war. Many of us are humiliated that our great Nation should be the last English-speaking nation to accord to women the right of franchise. We also believe that it puts us in an unenviable position of inconsistency, not to have democracy at home when we are fighting for it abroad. We urgently petition that this act of simple justice may be given to the women of this great country at once.

ELIZABETH PRESTON ANDERSON,
President.
BARBARA H. WYLIE,
Corresponding Secretary.

FARGO, N. DAK., May 25, 1918.

Senator ASLE J. GRONNA,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Firmly believing that no more patriotic duty is before the American people than the enfranchisement of one-half her citizens, and in view of the fact that our allies have regarded the enfranchisement of their women as a war measure, thereby making the United States the only English-speaking nation without equal suffrage, we do hereby protest against the delay in the Senate and urge the immediate passage of the Federal amendment for woman suffrage. Please read into RECORD.

HOPE, N. DAK., May 25, 1918.

Senator GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

As president of the Federated Club of North Dakota, representing women who are loyally serving the Government, I do protest against the delay in the Senate and urge the immediate passage of the Federal suffrage amendment. Please read this into the RECORD.

Mrs. H. G. VICK.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present petitions of the Equal Suffrage League of Dover; the Woman's Christian Temperance Union; the Woman's Missionary Society of the First Baptist Church; the Equal Suffrage Association; and of Amoskeag Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, all of the city of Manchester, N. H., praying for the passage of the woman's suffrage constitutional amendment.

I have presented very few of the numerous petitions and letters which I have received in relation to this subject, and have been constrained to say to my correspondents that I have no knowledge as to when the matter will be presented for the consideration of the Senate, it being in the hands of a committee representing the majority of this body.

Mr. McCUMBER. I present a telegram in the nature of a petition, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOPE, N. DAK., May 25, 1918.

Senator MCCUMBER,
Washington, D. C.:

As president of the Federated Clubs of North Dakota, representing women who are loyally serving the Government, I do protest against the delay in the Senate and urge the immediate passage of the Federal suffrage amendment. Please read this into the RECORD.

Mrs. H. G. VICK,
Cavalier, N. Dak.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CUMMINS, from the Committee on Rules, to which was referred Senate resolution 242, amending paragraph 3 of Rule VII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to the business of the morning hour, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 468) thereon.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9864) to amend section 111 of the Judicial Code in respect to the western district of Virginia, reported it with an amendment.

GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the House concurrent resolution No. 43 to authorize the printing of the journal of the Fifty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the year 1918, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed as a House document 1,500 copies of the Journal of the Fifty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the year 1918, not to exceed $1,700 in cost, with illustrations, 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House and 500 for the use of the Senate.

THE SEAMEN'S ACT (S. DOC. NO. 228).

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 248), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] on April 16, 1918, entitled "American sea power and the seamen's act," by Andrew Furuseth, president of the International Seamen's Union of America, be printed as a Senate document.

THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. From the Committee on Printing I report back an original resolution (S. Res. 249) to print the article entitled "The Electoral College and Presidential Suffrage" as a Senate document. I ask that the resolution may go to the calendar. I do not know enough about it to ask for its consideration at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

BLACKFEET RESERVATION, MONT.

Mr. WALSH. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I submit a corrected report (No. 451) to accompany the bill (S. 4404) repealing that portion of the Indian appropriation act of March 1, 1907 (34 Stat. L., pp. 1015, 1035), which relates to the disposal of the surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Reservation, in Montana, heretofore reported by me. I also report from the same committee certain amendments to the bill and ask that a reprint of the bill be made showing the reported amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the report take the same number, and that the bill retain its place on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WALSH:

A bill (S. 4627) granting an increase of pension to Robert J. Erwin; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 4628) for the relief of H. G. Godfrey; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A bill (S. 4629) amending the act of Congress of August 24, 1912, chapter 389, paragraph 1 (37 Stat., 550), to include periodical publications of regularly incorporated charitable organizations, admitting such publications to the mails as second-class matter; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORT ON AMMONIA, NITROGEN, ETC.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 250), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 1,500 copies of the report of the Secretary of Agriculture concerning ammonia, nitrogen, and nitrogenous materials manufactured, imported, and used in the United States in pursuance of Senate resolution No. 137 of the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, be printed for the use of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9959.

Mr. ASHURST. Is the motion debatable?

Mr. SMOOT. It is after morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will have to examine the rule.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish to discuss the motion; I have no doubt I am in favor of the bill. All I wish to say is that I would prefer to have the calendar called in regular order. There is a bill on the calendar, Order of Business 141, the bill (S. 385) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations. It has been reported favorably from the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill has once passed the House, has been twice reported favorably by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the Department of the Interior is anxious that the bill should be passed. The situation in our country concerning mining for metalliferous and rare metals is such that the bill ought to pass.

I do not ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, because I know there would be a great deal of discussion and doubtless objection, but after disposing of the bill in which the Senator from Utah is interested officially, and which he wishes to have passed, I should like to ask that the calendar be taken up, so that Senate bill 385 may be reached.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Nugent	Smoot
Baird	Hollis	Overman	Swanson
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Thompson
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Poindexter	Townsend
Cummins	Kellogg	Pomerene	Trammell
Curtis	Kendrick	Shafroth	Underwood
Dillingham	Kenyon	Sheppard	Vardaman
Fernald	King	Sherman	Wadsworth
France	Kirby	Shields	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Simmons	Warren
Gallinger	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Wilfley
Gerry	McNary	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
Gronna	Martin	Smith, Md.
Guion	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Harding	Norris	Smith, S. C.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HENDERSON] is detained on official business.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], is detained on public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] informs me that he has a report to make from the Committee on Appropriations, and he also expressed the opinion that it will take but a very few minutes to pass the bill. I am of the same opinion. The Senator from Virginia desires to have the bill passed as soon as possible, and therefore I withdraw my motion for the present in order that the Senator from Virginia may submit his report.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 12280) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MARTIN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments the bill which has just been laid before the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MARTIN. There are very few amendments of the committee and I think the bill can be disposed of in a short time. I ask that the formal reading be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk the amendments which were adopted by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, after line 12, under the heading "Legislative," it is proposed to insert:

SENATE.

To pay to Lula W. Stone, widow of Hon. William J. Stone, late a Senator from the State of Missouri, $7,500.

To pay to Mary Marrette Broussard, widow of Hon Robert F. Broussard, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana, $7,500.

For stationery for Senators and the President of the Senate, and for committees and officers of the Senate, $4,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments are agreed to, without objection.

Mr. MARTIN. Those are the only amendments which the committee has recommended to the bill, Mr. President.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill S. 3799, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 12211. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 12229. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9959) increasing rates of pensions of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to say that neither at this time, nor in fact at any time, do I wish to be put in the attitude of obstructing the bill in which the Senator from Utah is interested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Utah is one that is not debatable.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill? [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence, and not having a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GUION (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] and vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I inquire if the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Having a general pair with that Senator, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], which I transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (after having voted in the negative). I wish to inquire if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the negative). I see that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], with whom I have a general pair, is not in the Chamber. I transfer my pair with him to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and will allow my vote to stand. I will let this transfer remain for the day.

Mr. SWANSON. I am paired with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired for the day with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], is detained on public business.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is necessarily absent from the Senate Chamber.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—44.

Ashurst	Gerry	Kirby	Pomerene
Baird	Gronna	McCumber	Ransdell
Borah	Guion	McLean	Shafroth

Fernald	La Follette	Saulsbury	Willey
Goff	Lenroot	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Gore	Lewis	Smith, Md.	Wolcott

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9959) increasing rates of pensions of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions, with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the general pension act of May 11, 1912, is hereby amended by adding a new section, to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That from and after the passage of this amendment the rate of pension for any person who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War, now on the roll or hereafter to be placed on the pension roll and entitled to receive a less rate than hereinafter provided, shall be $30 per month. In case such person has reached the age of 72 years and served six months, the rate shall be $32 per month; one year, $35 per month; one and a half years, $38 per month; two years or over, $40 per month: Provided, That this amendment shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I want to inquire of the Senator having charge of the bill what is the amount of the increase, when stated in dollars and cents, in each of the classes which are provided for in this amendment to the law?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, I will state that this substitute for the House bill is the same as the bill that was reported to the Senate and is now upon the calendar as No. 230.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the bill which was formerly under consideration?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. After the so-called Sherwood bill passed the House, came to the Senate, and was referred to the Senate Committee on Pensions, the Senate committee substituted the provisions of the Senate bill referred to for the House bill. I will say to the Senator that the amount which will be carried, if the substitute is adopted, will be, in round numbers, $35,000,000. In other words, since the report was made by the Secretary of the Interior on February 15, 1918, to the Pensions Committee, there have been deaths among the old soldiers which reduced the amount to about $35,000,000. The report showed that there were 299,941 soldiers that would be affected by this legislation.

Of those less than 72 years of age who served 90 days and over and 72 years and over who served less than six months, there were 2,171, and the increased cost was $10,670,202.

Of those 72 years and over who served six months and less than one year there were 39,163, and the increased cost per year was $5,099,178.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from what he is reading, so that I may follow him?

Mr. SMOOT. I am reading from the report of Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. POMERENE. From what page of the RECORD is the Senator reading?

Mr. SMOOT. Page 5327 of the RECORD.

Of those 72 years and over who served one year and less than one and a half years there were 42,083, and the increased cost per year was $6,209,772.

Of those 72 years and over who served one and a half years and less than two years there were 24,785, and the increased cost per year was $4,165,542.

Of those 72 years and over who served two years and over there were 111,739, and the increased cost per year was $15,959,268.

That was based upon the bill as it was introduced by me, in which the pension applied to those reaching the age of 72 years.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think the Senator caught my question. Perhaps I am at fault for that.

Mr. SMOOT. I may have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I will put the question in a different form. The bill provides—

That from and after the passage of this amendment the rate of pension for any person who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War, now on the roll or hereafter to be placed on the pension roll and entitled to receive a less rate than hereinafter provided, shall be $30 per month.

In dollars and cents per man, what would that increase be?

Mr. SMOOT. That, Mr. President, I can not tell offhand.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, take the next one.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that many of the pensioners are receiving $30 per month to-day, and therefore, unless they have served more than 90 days, this bill would not affect them at all; but if they were getting less than $30 a month, then, of course, they would receive the $30. In other words, the minimum rate of pension is $30 per month for soldiers serving 90 days or more.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado permit me to ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What percentage of pensioners are receiving less than $30 per month now? Does the Senator know?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no figures which would enable me to state just the percentage. I could not say that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is very small, I fancy.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I will say to the Senator that there are a great many of them; and, in fact, the report here shows the age, the length of service, the numbers that it will involve, and the increase. I could tell the average, if that is what the Senator desires, by dividing the number into the amount of increase.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not care to put the Senator to that trouble.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it will not take very long.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator from Colorado permit the Senator from Utah to answer this further question: What is the increase carried by this bill? What is the total amount carried?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator stated that.

Mr. SMOOT. Before it becomes a law, and taking into consideration the deaths that have occurred since the report was made, the department estimates that it will be about $35,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to postpone the final vote upon the passage of this bill further than to state why I think it should not be enacted at this time, and to refer to some correspondence and criticisms evoked by the remarks which I submitted when Order of Business No. 230 was before this body for consideration. Indeed, knowing what the sentiment of the Senate is regarding this and similar bills, I very much question whether I would have said anything further about it were it not for the correspondence to which I have referred.

This bill is designed to add some $35,000,000 to the permanent expenditures of the Government, at a time when those expenditures are unprecedented in amount, and when the President has admonished us to remain here to increase the rates of taxation for the purpose of obtaining additional revenues needed for the exigencies of the war. One of the reasons assigned for this increase, if I comprehend it, is that owing to the increased cost of living the pensions now prevailing are insufficient to enable their beneficiaries to live decently; and another, of course, is the old, old demand of patriotism.

Mr. President, I do not understand that the bounty of the Government, as expressed in pensions, is or ever was designed, except in cases of total disability, to be sufficient for the sustenance of the beneficiary. If that were so, then our pension system, instead of necessitating the appropriation of one hundred and eighty-odd million dollars every year to meet its requirements, would take that amount of money multiplied several times. Pensions are theoretically a recognition of honorable service, and should be absolutely confined to the purpose for which they were originally designed; but under what I conceive to be a mistaken policy, partly commendable, but largely for political purposes, participated in by both of the great parties at all times, they have been so extended as to apply to all men, in any grade of service, in any war, for any time, in excess of 90 days, and, by special legislation, have been made to include in many instances men reported upon the military records as deserters or dishonorably discharged. In other words, the original purpose and theory of pensions has been long ago abandoned for the practice, now becoming altogether too common, in many other directions as well, of utilizing the Treasury of the United States for the payment of political debts and for the securing of political favors yet to come.

Mr. President, to say that this increase is prompted by the necessity of giving to the old soldiers of the country more money than they now receive, lest their means of livelihood become all to meager, is to defeat this bill upon its face, for the highest pension which will be paid under it is $40 per month. Mr. President, it is well known that no man at this time can live on $40 a month; or if he can, then his experience is so unique that he should be made the subject of special and honorable mention, wherever found. Long ago provision was made for these identical conditions in the establishment of Soldiers' Homes, some national, others instituted by the States, and both designed to give a refuge to the soldiers of the Republic in their old age and in their years of indigence. These homes to-day are open to this class of our citizens, who can enter them, not through any sense of dependence, but as the guests of the Nation, and receive in full that sustenance and support for which they were designed.

I was told by a pension official the other day that the cost per man of maintaining these Federal institutions now is $400 a year, as compared to $180 prior to the war—a raise which in itself means millions of dollars to the country, but which it should, of course, cheerfully bear in view of existing law and of the purpose for which these institutions were created. I have no doubt that the maintenance of State homes would show an equal percentage of increase.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that the Sherwood bill, for which the so-called Smoot bill is offered as a substitute, excludes from its benefits the inmates of the soldiers' homes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am aware of that. I am aware also of the fact that the so-called Sherwood bill, if it should be enacted into law, would increase the cost of the pension rolls by something like twenty millions, an amount altogether too small to address itself to the favorable consideration of a majority of the Senate Committee on Pensions. I am glad that the Senator reminded me of the fact, however, because otherwise I might have omitted to state that this bill is so devised as to bring within its provisions all survivors of a given age, whether they are recipients of the benefits of the homes or not, unless I have entirely misread its provisions. But to claim that this bill is needed for the support of the old soldiers of the country and then limit the amount of its benevolence to a maximum of $40 per month is, as I said before, entirely to defeat the argument. If that were its purpose, this amount should be multiplied by three.

No, Mr. President; that is not its real purpose. The situation presents one bill from the House, championed by a member of the Democratic Party, and another in the Senate, championed by a member of the Republican Party, and the contest seemingly involves the problem as to which of the two parties shall have the distinguished honor at this time of increasing the general expenses of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not think the author of the bill we are now considering could have gotten a hearing for the bill in the Senate at all had he not been supported by Senators upon the other side of the Chamber. In fact, without their support the bill would not be before the Senate to-day.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I hope the Senator will not misunderstand me. The Democratic Party, to which I belong, when it comes to extravagant legislation, is just as deep in the mud as the Republican Party is deep in the mire.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I want to put it another way. As the result of a long experience and observation, I want to say that Senators upon the other side of the Chamber and upon the Democratic side of the House of Representatives have been animated by a higher purpose and motive than that ascribed to them by the Senator from Colorado in voting upon this pension legislation, and I have seen many bills saved by their patriotic ardor for an appropriate and proper recognition of the Union soldiers.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that is absolutely true. I am not now talking solely about pension legislation. In its earlier days pension legislation was of a character which every citizen could approve. I am speaking of its later developments, which can not be defended. Why, Mr. President, the last Congress enacted a pension bill which virtually requires the Government to pay alimony to certain widows of soldiers in this country, and that bill received as much support upon this side of the Chamber as upon the other. I refer to the bill for pensioning widows of soldiers, which provides that if a marriage of a widow is followed by a divorce for which the former pensioner was not to blame, then, that fact being established to the satisfaction of the authorities, her pension will be revived and go on just as before. If that is not paying alimony, then I am at a loss for a word which can properly describe it.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator refer to the war-risk insurance bill?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no. I am speaking about the bill that was passed at the last Congress. But the Senator reminds me that we were unable to pass a bill for the insurance of our present soldiers at the last session of this Congress without including in it a further pension for the widows, as I remember, of soldiers of the Civil War.

I was about to say, when the Senator from Utah interrupted me, that it has been whispered to me that the enactment of this bill would make 40 Democratic Congressmen, which would mean one Congressman for every million dollars. I want to see Democratic Congressmen elected, but I am not so anxious to see it that I am willing to pay a million dollars apiece out of the Treasury of the United States to accomplish that result.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not believe any such statement as that?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I do not believe a word of it.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know. I was told some years ago that the so-called Sherwood bill resulted in the election of fifty-odd Democratic Congressmen. I have been warned since the last speech I made on this subject that many Democratic votes which never were cast for any other ticket will go for the Republican Party because of my opposition to the bill. I do not believe that.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that, if I remember correctly, just such a statement as that was made because the Senator voted for free sugar, but it did not affect the Senator at all.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that is true; but it would not have made any difference in my vote whether it cost my reelection or not.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly not.

Mr. THOMAS. The position I now occupy is precisely that which I occupied then.

I am reminded in this connection of a speech made by our late lamented colleague when in the House, Hon. William Hughes, of New Jersey, one of the few patriots in that body who had the moral courage to vote against the $50,000,000 Sherwood pension bill. Here is what he said, June 10, 1911:

Mr. Speaker, I hope I can say I have always been friendly to men who fought the great battles of the Republic—

Let me say that I indorse the sentiment of this speech throughout—

Mr. Speaker, I hope I can say that I have always been friendly to men who fought the great battles of the Republic, and while I am not in the habit of saying much about my own military record, because there was nothing particularly distinguished about it, except that during the Spanish-American War I consumed as much bad beef as any other man in the American forces, still I was a soldier once myself and will go as far as any man ought to go in the matter of appropriating money for this purpose. Yet I want to say this, here and now, though I realize the effect of my vote upon this question, that $50,000,000 a year is too big a price for the country to pay to bring me back to Congress.

He was returned by an increased majority, not to the other end of the Capitol but here.

Now, Mr. President, before leaving this branch of my discussion, let me say that I am and always have been in favor of granting a pension, moderate in amount but proportioned to the disability, to every man who actually fought for his country, incurring disability either by wound or by disease, or who in his old age became, without his fault, so dependent as to appeal to the generosity of the country for which he fought.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator allow an interruption?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What has the Senator to say of that class of soldiers who were in camp ready for military duty and contracted disease which permanently impaired their health and disqualified them for the battle of life?

Mr. THOMAS. That is service, Mr. President, quite as worthy of pension recognition as actual service in the field or in the trenches. But our pension system is not limited to those. During the past 25 years it has spread its mantle of munificence over all classes and conditions of men, without regard to their needs or the character of their service save as limited by the 90-day period. It has taken within its embrace men whose records we have corrected to enable them to secure pensions and those who have been searched for and discovered by pension attorneys and brought to the front for pension purposes. Mr. President, I am not in favor of that sort of pension system, and I never was.

The other day we passed 13 pension bills, omnibus bills, consisting of an aggregation of individual pension bills, presumably examined by the Committee on Pensions and passed favorably. I am satisfied that in those bills were cases which should not have been included. I did not object to their consideration, however.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. We passed 13 of them, and upon the theory that they embodied individual cases demanding recognition. This, however, is a universal pension bill designed for the poor and the rich, the low and the high, without any exception whatever. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection I wish to say to the Senator that these private pension bills apply only to those who are more persistent in coming to Congress and have learned the way. Would it not be better to pass a bill of this kind and do away with thousands and tens of thousands of those special bills?

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator think it would do away with one of them?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and I want to tell the Senator why. That is just what I hoped the Senator would ask me, and if he had not I would have stated it. Under the rule of the Senate and the House there is no pension granted above $50, and $50 only in case the soldier is absolutely helpless and requires constant attendance. Ninety-five per cent of all the special bills that are passed run between $30 and $40. This bill will do away with all those, I will say to the Senator, and I tell him now that as far as I am concerned, if this bill becomes a law I want them done away with. But when a soldier becomes absolutely helpless and requires constant attendance night and day to take care of him, to feed and wash him, and half the time, perhaps, he is required to be in bed, in those cases we could afford to pass a special act.

Mr. THOMAS. If my recollection serves me aright, the same argument was advanced for the Sherwood bill. It was said, "Why be bothered with these constantly accumulating individual bills? Let us pass a general bill and do away with them." I think they have multiplied manyfold instead of having disappeared since the enactment of that famous measure.

This bill will no more stop the tide of individual applications for pensions than it will result in the direction of economy in the administration of public affairs. The individual pension bill is an established institution. I have introduced many of them. I expect to introduce many more. They come from constituents who expect it. It is a right crystallized into that condition by the custom of many years, many of them doubtless inspired by the idea that since others got through successfully they will be equally fortunate.

Mr. President, I did ask one question when one of the bills to which I referred was before the Senate. I asked the Senator having charge of the bill what the total increase in the pension list in dollars and cents would be if the bill were enacted. He did not know. Those bills are reported by the committee and brought here without any estimate as to the total increase in the expenditures of the Government which they create. It indicates that they go through without much opposition and then come in so prepared as to include individual cases covering nearly every State of the Union. Of course, that appeals to Members of both Houses, very naturally, and does away with that rigid investigation which should be made of all bills designed to appropriate money by the Senate and the House after reaching their respective calendars.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. In justification of the Senate committee in considering such bills as the Senator has referred to, I wish to say that not one of them comes to the Senate or to the House but what it has been carefully gone into and the testimony examined. The rule that is adopted is strictly adhered to. I know in some cases perhaps there is a difference of $5 as to the amount that may be granted to a particular individual, but they are rare. The committees have tried, particularly of late, to adhere strictly to the rule. The testimony must show that the case falls within the rule, for no greater pension can be given than the rule provides for.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not objecting to that. I was commenting upon some of their aspects which do not appeal to me favorably.

I have assumed since this war began, and I shall continue to assume with reference to individual pension bills which come here, that they represent worthy causes, and I shall vote for them, or at least I shall not vote against them. If we were not in the present war, they would deserve more careful scrutiny by the Senate—I do not mean by the committee but by the Senate—before we finally pass upon them.

Mr. President, in the vast mass of criticism, condemnation, and personal abuse of which I have been the recipient during the past month because of my attitude upon this bill I have received here and there some letters of a very gratifying character. I want to read one dated April 24. I will omit the name of the writer and his address as well, not because he has requested me to do so but because I fear if I do not he may also hear from some of the advocates of this bill outside of the Chamber. He says:

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS.

HONORED SIR: I note your objection and remarks in the RECORD of the 19th instant on S. 3783, introduced by Mr. SMOOT, and heartily commend you for the stand taken. Congress does not seem to use ordinary discrimination in many of its appropriations. A bill to raise salaries of postal employees made a flat raise for all regardless of how different employees are paid. Some are entitled to it; others that get it are overpaid now. Take as an illustration bill 3783. Of the Grand Army here—30 in number—8 would be benefited by it, not all of them needing it, while of the others 1 owns two fine farms worth more than $200 an acre; another owns 300 acres worth $240 an acre, house in city, bonds, etc.; another with good farm, city property, Government $1,300 job; another a big farm and city property; and another the same; another has the triweekly paper, city property, and had State and United States offices for 12 years at from four to six thousand dollars a year. There are 5 farm owners. All these get the increase as well as the 8 whom it would benefit. These 22 rich men have had their pensions during all the pension years.

I favor a pension to every soldier who needs it, not a fixed sum but an abundance for every need; but it is unjust to pay a man worth $100,000 the pension a soldier needs for a comfortable support. Congress is overpaying rural carriers. With their autos they make their routes four-fifths of the time in three to four hours. The upkeep of an outfit in these parts is probably half the rural route congressional enthusiasts figure.

Pardon this trespass on your valuable time.

Mr. President, I have read this letter to emphasize the character of this bill, which gives an increase of pension to the man who does not need it as well as to the man who does need it, which gives it to the man possessed of much more than a competency as well as to the man who has no competency at all. It is a universal, indiscriminate piece of legislation, part of which may be deserved, but a part of which is reckless prodigality.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Admitting it to be an evil, is not that something which can not be avoided in legislation of this kind?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Take the war-risk insurance act. I know a young lady who married a soldier before he left for the front. Her father is a very wealthy man, but she gets her pittance of $10 each month from the Government of the United States. That runs all through the war-risk insurance act, which is a recent statute. So, as I look at it—and I have had a good deal to do with pension legislation, it is impossible to so construct an act that it will be equitable in all respects.

Mr. THOMAS. The war-risk insurance act, to which the Senator has referred, is one of the benefits of which every soldier is required to pay himself very largely. The Government assumes a part of the expense and the soldier the remainder. It works equitably, and it can only work equitably by being made universal in its application.

This is entirely different from this bill in its aspect as well as in its consequences. I do not think that our early pension law, although general in character, was so universally applicable as to fall with equal generosity upon those who needed it and those who did not need the support given by the Government. This is bad legislation, and at the present time it is worse than unwise legislation, because it is a needless increase in the expenditures of the Government.

So much, Mr. President, for the proposition that this bill is needed as one of the consequences of increased prices in the necessities of life. Let me summarize again by saying if there is anything in the argument, the bill provides for pensions that are altogether inadequate to the purpose.

Mr. President, I now refer briefly to a personal phase of the controversy, which perhaps can be appropriately introduced by calling attention to one or two letters which I have received of an entirely different character, and which are fair representatives of a vast number of others. I have a letter dated the 27th day of April, written to me by a gentleman in New Jersey, who takes great pleasure in sending me an extract from a newspaper, which I think, is published in this city and called the National Tribune.

I read the inclosure but not the letter. It is as follows:

The only outspoken opposition to the Smoot bill in the discussion last week was by CHARLES SPALDING THOMAS, senior Senator from Colorado, whose birth and breeding were in Georgia. He was about 17 years old when he left Georgia, but by that time he had acquired a lifelong rancor against the men that Sherman led triumphantly through Georgia. His association with the marauders of Pap Price's army, who formed so large a portion of the early settlers in Colorado, did not improve his knowledge of the world and his breadth of view on national questions. He has been conspicuous in his opposition to everything that looked to higher Americanism, and has made a personal matter of opposition to pensions. His speech in opposition to the pension bill was a dreary rehash of old Copperhead talk. He felt that "severe economy," which, in his mind, meant absolute deprivation, should be exercised in regard to pensions for Union soldiers, although he was in favor of lavish appropriations for other purposes. He felt that no man should be regarded as a permanent charge upon the Treasury of the country merely because he had fought to maintain its existence. His argument is such as one might expect from the limited mentality of a boy developed in the sand barrens of southeastern Georgia. The larger view that the men who had sacrificed everything when the country was poor and struggling for existence deserved some sort of repayment and grateful care by the Government, when they had grown old and it had grown rich, did not find lodgment in his circumscribed intelligence. He did not know from the history of his country that it had always regarded its veterans when they grew old as objects of particular care. It did this with the veterans of the War of the Revolution. By the time they had grown old the country had thoroughly established its national life; was proud of its place among the nations of the world, and felt that it owed much to the men who had given the best years of their life to accomplish this. It was the same with the war of 1812. The men who had fought in the Mexican War had brought an immensity of good to the country, which was recognized in the form of liberal pensions to them as they grew old. They did not forfeit this consideration by the country even by serving in the rebel army, which tried to destroy it. Such natural and usual feeling among legislators of really national view seems entirely impossible to the senior Senator from Colorado.

Another letter, dated on the 1st day of May, 1918, is very short and entirely to the point. It reads:

WAYNESBURG, PA., May 1, 1918.

I take pleasure in sending this clipping from one of your Washington, D. C., papers, and hope, if so, it will rip you up the back right along.

This letter is signed by a gentleman calling himself an "ex-Union soldier."

The extract I will read into the RECORD, as follows:

Senator THOMAS is one of those unfortunates who was too young to serve in the War of the Rebellion and too old to serve in the War with Spain. In 1860 THOMAS was 11 years old, and in 1898 he was 89.

That is one or two years, I believe, older than I really am. [Laughter.]

Not having had any military experience, Mr. THOMAS has no sympathy with soldiers or veterans. Also, having been born in the South—Georgia—the Colorado Senator does not love the Union veteran. Perhaps this explains his long and persistent opposition to nearly every pension bill that has come up in Congress since the worthy Senator has served in the Senate. His term expires in 1921. He is a Democrat. Perhaps the people of Colorado will decide in 1920 that they would like to have somebody besides THOMAS to represent them in the Senate. At any rate, the Union veterans in Colorado can very easily start a backfire under the seat of this southerner who would still wave the Confederate flag. Any movement of consequence takes time, so there is no use waiting for the 1920 senatorial campaign in Colorado to replace Mr. THOMAS. Let the ball begin rolling immediately.

These unworthy references to my origin are not important except as they indicate that the old animosities of our civil conflict, long since buried and forgotten everywhere else, still survives in the bosoms of some so-called soldiers who measure a man's patriotism by the attitude he occupies toward pension legislation.

We are assured that there is no politics in a bill of this character when in this identical article it is plainly intimated that there is not only politics of the most personal and virulent sort but politics which has for its object the defeat of men who, prompted by the desire to perform a conscientious duty, refuse to vote for every appropriation bill that comes before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. President, I have nothing but contempt of the most profound character for the man who at this period in our country's history will ascribe a motive actuating a Senator in the performance of his duty to opinions and prejudices said to have taken root during the days of the Civil War and reproach a Member of this body with being actuated by such sentiments and prejudices, because, forsooth, he finds it necessary to oppose a specific piece of legislation. I do not want the vote of any man or set of men who are capable of entertaining, much less expressing, such an opinion, degrading only the man who utters it.

It is needless for me to say, Mr. President, upon this subject more than to assert that when the war ended as it did I accepted the results and have endeavored to live in strict harmony with those results ever since. I have guided my conduct and my action in private and in public by that standard ever since. I propose to do my duty as I understand it, regardless of any motive which may be ascribed to me as inspiring my action, whether it degrades or elevates.

I have endeavored, Mr. President, in this body as consistently as I knew how to oppose every appropriation which seemed to me to be unnecessary or to border upon extravagance, with what success, unfortunately, the records of the Senate will for all time disclose. I shall continue in this course undeterred by the fear of abusive criticism and unmindful of the personal interests which my vote may affect; and I must determine for myself what the line of my duty is.

I have never been able to distinguish pork from pork because of any qualifying adjective. I am unable, Mr. President, to stand upon the floor of the Senate and oppose a river and harbor bill, a public-buildings bill, a bill increasing the pay of employees, and at the same time shut my eyes to a pension bill because, forsooth, it bears that name. I have never been able to accept the proposition that because a great army saved the country the entire Army for that reason should thereafter and always be beneficiaries from the Treasury of the United States. If that were so, then why, in God's name, do we confine our beneficence to the pitiful sums of thirty, forty, or fifty dollars a month, since if the public service rendered be not, as I have always supposed, patriotism undefiled by any considerations of personal benefit, then surely the Government should meet its obligations by making every man who has served under its banner independent for the rest of his days. That we do not, and I trust never will, attempt to accomplish. Patriotism can never be true to itself and find expression in demands for compensation.

Mr. President, I have heretofore been the recipient of very severe criticisms from another direction. I think it was in the last Congress—my friend from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will correct me if I am in error—that bills were introduced for the pensioning of the old soldiers of the Confederacy, and they were introduced in earnest. I received at once a multitude of letters from the South and from my own State, from the old Confederate soldiers, calling upon me to support that measure and declaring that the time had come when the feelings and the animosities engendered by the war had given way to a spirit of amity and brotherly love, through which could be seen the glimmerings of a patriotism and devotion to country equally great in the breast of the southern soldier with that of his northern adversary, and equally deserving of monetary compensation from a common Treasury. It was then that I received a letter from a gentleman in Alabama, formerly serving in the Confederate Army, which I intended to preserve, but lost. It was not grammatical, but to the point. He said:

DEAR SENATOR: The Daughters of the Confederacy has just resolved that no southern soldier can accept a pension from the United States Government and preserve his sense of self-respect. This is to inform you that I kin.

I received letters, Mr. President, some of which I have preserved, from my own constituents formerly in the Confederate Army, abusing me quite as roundly for telling them that under no circumstances would I support such a measure as I have received from Union soldiers since the last speech I made upon the subject. In one of them I was taunted with the fact that my father and my mother were born in Connecticut, and I was only a "galvanized" southerner, anyhow. I was reproached by another with the fact that, although I was born and brought up in the South, I was educated in the North, and that I had absorbed so much of the feeling of the Union that I was now about to shamelessly turn my back upon my old comrades in arms.

I merely mention this, Mr. President, for the purpose of demonstrating that I have tried to be consistent in my opposition to such legislation, and have encountered bitter reproaches from opposite directions. I should perhaps add that I would be recreant to my oath of office as a Senator if I ever countenanced the notion of extending the pension system to those who once had taken up arms against the flag of the country, and yet I doubt not that many of these old soldiers of the South, sincere, patriotic, and upright, giving to the cause in which they believed the highest test of devotion, are quite as worthy to be considered as entitled to some support in their old age as many of those who have been clamoring for my support to this bill.

Now, Mr. President, let me say one or two words more and I have done. I know, of course, that this bill will pass; it has been foredoomed to passage in some shape ever since it has been introduced, perhaps ever since it has been the subject of consideration. I am unable to support it, and I should at least be given credit for expressing my views in the open. I might say that, if Senators upon both sides of this Chamber who have intimated that this bill ought not to pass would oppose it upon the floor, it probably would not pass, or, if so, it would be enacted after material modification. With reference to public legislation, Mr. President, I am unfortunately incapable of having one opinion outside of the Chamber and another within its walls. I have thought that this legislation was improper and undesirable. I said so before the bill was introduced, and I say so now. Albeit I am in the usual hopeless minority and possibly deserving of the indirect credit of contributing to its passage by giving expression to my opposition.

Mr. President, the last bond issue enabled the Government to realize by loan several billion dollars. The people subscribed to that issue with enthusiasm and with a patriotism that knows no State and no section. Yesterday the President of the United States addressed the joint assembly of Congress upon the subject of revenue, and urged us to remain here during the sultry summer months of 1918 for the purpose of raising billions of added revenue. Very few of us desire to do so; all of us intend to do so, because the country's exigencies are such that money must be obtained both by loan and by taxation to the extent of its possible resources. This money is needed, Mr. President, to enable us to do the part of a mighty Nation in the greatest struggle of human history. This money is needed to give ample support and strength to our soldiers upon the battle front and to double their numbers as rapidly as they can be disciplined and transported. To win this great struggle perhaps every man and every dollar may be drawn upon in the great cause. There is no appropriation, Mr. President, no revenue needed for that purpose which I will not support as enthusiastically as any man here; but I want before I take my seat to utter once more my protest against the enactment of legislation at this time which needlessly increases the Nation's burdens. We must meet the emergency of the war, cost what it may; but during this hard season, when the nerves of the Nation are taut, when the fathers and the mothers, the wives, and the daughters of the boys at the front are even now listening tensely and anxiously for news of the last drive, when every breeze that crosses the sea on its westward course may be freighted with tidings of death and of disaster, we, Mr. President, should set our faces against needless extravagance and end for the time being our reckless appropriations of the public money for measures in nowise conducing to the success of our arms.

Democrats have denounced Republicans for their extravagance. Republicans have denounced Democrats for their extravagance. Each has been justified. Neither exhibits any evidences of reform in that direction. Attempts to stem the tide of needless expenditure are always met with the assurance that the particular thing under discussion is not the proper point of beginning. We must wait for something else and carry out our good intentions in other forms and for other objects. That point, Mr. President, has not been found. I am afraid it never will be. Perhaps before this war is over we may be called to give an account of our stewardship. I trust that in the final analysis we may not be found entirely wanting in our discharge of public duty with regard to public expenditures, easily postponed, if we so will, to other and less strenuous days.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if this bill shall go over for consideration at a later day, I probably shall have a few words to say upon the propriety of enacting it; but for the present I want to ask the Senator from Utah to agree to some verbal changes in the bill, at least. If I were going to rewrite it, I would make it quite different from what it is. I do not think the phraseology is very happy; but I will ask the Senator if, in line 22, page 3, the word "amendment" should not be "act"? This will not be attached to the original act. It will be a separate statute.

Mr. SMOOT. This language was sent up to me by the department, and the word "amendment" was used in it. I think myself that the word "amendment," on line 22, page 3, ought to be "act," and also on line 6, page 4.

Mr. POMERENE. I was not able to hear the suggested amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from New Hampshire was just suggesting that the word "amendment" on line 22, page 3, and on line 6, page 4, should be changed to the word "act."

Mr. GALLINGER. I make that motion, if it is necessary.

Mr. POMERENE. That is in section 6?

Mr. SMOOT. In section 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of South Carolina in the chair). The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment on page 3, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the word "amendment" and insert the word "act"; and on page 4, line 6, it is proposed to strike out the word "amendment" and insert the word "act."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is an amendment to an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico." I ascertained a few days ago that there were just 384 veterans of the War with Mexico living on June 30, 1917. That number doubtless has been reduced by 100 between June 30, 1917, and the present time; so that there are probably less than 300 veterans of the Mexican War living at the present time. I will ask the Senator, as this is an amendment to an act which recognized the soldiers of the War with Mexico, if he does not think it would be well to include them in this act?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that most of the Mexican War veterans are already receiving $30 a month and over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not many of them are receiving over $30.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the records show that there are a good many who have been pensioned by special statute. The question has never been submitted to the committee, so I will ask the Senator if he will not withhold the amendment for the present and I will give it consideration?

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall be glad if the Senator will look into it. If I had my way about it, I would insert, after the words "Civil War," in line 24, the words "and the War with Mexico." I think those few survivors of the War with Mexico, whom we have recognized in all our legislation heretofore, general and special, ought not to be overlooked in this proposed legislation.

Mr. President, there is one other amendment that I will suggest and which, I think ought, to go in the bill. The provision to which I refer was placed in the so-called Sherwood bill, for which this is a substitute. When I had more to do with pension legislation than I have now I insisted that it should go in all pension legislation where the services of pension attorneys and claim agents were not required, so I am going to suggest that at the end of the bill the following be added:

Provided further, That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for presenting any claim to the Bureau of Pensions or securing any pension under this act, except in applications for original pension by persons who have not heretofore received a pension.

The truth is that unless that goes in, the moment this bill passes, if it shall pass, the persons affected by the bill will be flooded with letters from pension attorneys, chiefly in Washington, asking them to agree to give them $10, more or less, for looking after their claims in the bureau, when no such service is required. It is merely a perfunctory matter to increase the pension in the bureau.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield; yes.

Mr. WALSH. As suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, the Sherwood bill attempts to make provision for that case in this language in section 5:

That no attorney shall be recognized and no attorney fees shall be paid for the presentation or prosecution of any claim under the provisions of this act.

Mr. GALLINGER. The language I have used is in the original bill; but the language in the Sherwood bill, for which this is a substitute, is equally efficacious, and either one or the other should be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the reason why it was not put upon this amendment was because the original act provides in substance what the Senator now suggests as an amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. That arose from the fact that the Senator from Utah regarded this as an amendment, when, as a matter of fact, it is a separate act.

Mr. SMOOT. Therefore, Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the suggested amendment of the Senator will be adopted, because all of our pension laws passed in later years have had just that provision added to them.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the proposed amendment of the committee, the following:

Provided further, That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for presenting any claim to the Bureau of Pensions or securing any pension under this act, except in applications for original pension by persons who have not heretofore received a pension.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me, I think the language proposed by him is hardly applicable, because there will be no original applications for pensions under this act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, Mr. President, I think there may be original applications under this statute. There are still a good many soldiers who never have applied.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Montana, that I think there are between 50,000 and 100,000 who have not made any application.

Mr. WALSH. In view of the language of the bill, I do not press my suggestion.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the words "or securing any pension" be stricken from the amendment I have offered, because the matter is covered by other language.

Mr. SMOOT. That will be acceptable, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be modified as requested by the Senator from New Hampshire. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I suggest that the quotation marks preceding the words "Section 6," in line 21, page 3, and after the word "private," in line 7, page 4, be stricken out.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, with the exception of my suggested amendment extending the benefits of this act to the few surviving veterans of the Mexican War, those are all the amendments I have to offer; and I will not offer the proposed amendment covering the surviving soldiers of the Mexican War until the Senator from Utah has looked into it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following proviso at the end of the bill:

Provided further, That the increase herein provided shall not be extended or granted to any pensioner who has an annual income of $1,000 or more in addition to his or her pension allowance.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Florida whether he desires to speak upon the amendment at this time?

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the bill is not going to be disposed of immediately, and I judge it will not be, I should prefer having the amendment submitted and printed for consideration when we take up the bill and when more Senators are present.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator offers it and asks that it be pending?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes; that it be pending.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, that it be printed and lie on the table?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest that it be printed in the RECORD, so that we may know what it proposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am advised that a general agreement has been entered into to the effect that at 2 o'clock the Senate shall adjourn until Friday. I take it there will be time for me to state to the Senate with some brevity the essential differences between the two bills now on the Senate calendar—the bill under consideration and the so-called Smoot bill, proposed by the Senate Committee on Pensions as a substitute for the bill coming from the House, generally known as the Sherwood bill.

Both of them contemplate granting an increase of pension to all those now having pensions and receiving $30 a month or less. The bills differ in respect to the amount of the increase in no very great degree, the appropriation called for during the first year by the so-called Smoot bill being something about $40,000,000, while the appropriation called for by the Sherwood bill is in the neighborhood of $29,000,000.

From each of these estimates made by the Pension Bureau some time ago a deduction must be made on account of intervening deaths, so that in the case of the Smoot bill I think probably the author has quite accurately stated that it contemplates an expenditure during the first year of about $35,000,000. A like deduction must be made from the estimate of the appropriation necessary under the Sherwood bill, and a further deduction must be made in case of that bill on account of two classes of exemptions for which it provides. These two exemption features in the Sherwood bill are what serve to distinguish it in any particularly marked way from the so-called Smoot bill. It provides that no one shall claim any benefits under the provisions of the bill, first, who is an inmate of a soldiers' home; or, second, who has an income in excess of $1,000 a year.

The justification for the increase at this time arises from the recognized large advance in the cost of living. The representatives of the old soldiers at the time the act of 1912 was passed represented, and no doubt with entire sincerity, that that was the last appeal that ever would be made to Congress for pensions for the old soldiers; but it was not to be anticipated, and no one could have anticipated, that such an extraordinary rise in the cost of living as we have witnessed would ensue, and it seems to me no criticism can be justly leveled at those who are in a special way the representatives and guardians of the interests of the old soldiers who now come and ask an increase of pension. I think everybody who admits the wisdom of the policy of granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Civil War is agreed that some increase ought to be granted at this time in view of the very material advance in the cost of living.

I must say, however, that the Sherwood bill commends itself to me on account of the two exemptions to which I have adverted. Of course, so far as the old soldiers who are themselves inmates of soldiers' homes are concerned, they do not confront the additional cost of living. The Government already bears the additional burden of expense on account of the increased cost of living; so that it seems to me no appeal can be made in anything like a persuasive way to the Congress of the United States at this time in behalf of the soldiers who are being cared for either in the National or in the State institutions.

I have not at hand the information as to the number of persons who would be affected by that provision of the bill. I should say in this connection, Mr. President, that the idea has been expressed to me in some letters received that under the provisions of the Sherwood bill the inmates of the soldiers' homes would draw no more pensions; but that is plainly an error.

It is not intended by anything in the Sherwood bill that anyone who is now drawing a pension shall be deprived of his pension, and it is expressly provided that his pension shall not be reduced. Provision is made in the following proviso, being a part of section 2 of the Sherwood bill, namely:

Provided further, That no pension heretofore granted shall be reduced by this act.

It is my purpose, whenever the appropriate time arrives, to suggest an addition to that of the following:

Nor shall any person now receiving a pension be by anything herein deprived of the same.

Now, with reference to the other class exempted under the Sherwood bill, namely, those having an income of more than $1,000 a year, it will be borne in mind that in like manner those people, whoever they may be, continue to draw the pensions provided for them by the act of 1912. They will simply be unable to claim the increase of pensions provided for by this act.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, the Sherwood bill has language in it substantially like that tendered in the amendment just offered by the Senator from Florida, as follows:

That no pensioner shall be entitled to receive any benefits under the provisions of this act for any period during which he shall be an inmate of any State or national soldiers' home; and the provisions of this act shall not apply to any pensioner whose net annual income from all sources, including his pension, is $1,000 or more.

It has been urged that it would cost more to administer that provision of the Sherwood bill than would be saved by virtue of it; in other words, that the investigations necessary to determine whether persons have an income of more than $1,000 would be quite equal to the amount that would be paid in pensions to those persons. In order to meet that condition, I shall propose an amendment to that portion of the act to read as follows:

to be determined by the income-tax reports on file in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who shall annually on the 1st day of July transmit to the Commissioner of Pensions a list of all pensioners having an income, as shown by such reports, in excess of the said sum of $1,000.

I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Montana except to make this observation, that the soldiers who are in soldiers' homes are not there from choice or of their own volition. They are not there because they prefer to reside there, but because of the stress of circumstances—perhaps because of wounds or exposure due to military service for which they can never be repaid. They are there perhaps because they have no other home that their income will support. Give them a proper pension and they would gladly return to their own home and the scenes that are dear to their hearts. Our Government can afford to be generous to its defenders.

Mr. WALSH. That is quite true.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think that the State Soldiers' Home in Grand Rapids averages about a thousand persons constantly there, and I venture the assertion that not 20 out of that thousand are there from choice or would remain if he were able to leave. Many of them come without their families, leaving a wife at home dependent upon them. The wife gets the pension money. It is necessary to support her. It seems to me that that provision of the Sherwood bill which prevents increase of pension to those living in soldiers' homes is very faulty and unjust in that it does not take into consideration the service rendered by the soldier nor those who are dependent upon the soldier.

Mr. WALSH. There are two considerations that may address themselves very properly to us in that connection, it seems to me. In the first place, the soldiers' homes were fairly well occupied before the present condition arose. In other words, there were a large number of pensioners who found themselves without a home when the cost of living was on a normal basis or they found themselves unable to maintain themselves at home. Now, when the increased cost of living is considered they will find themselves even less able to maintain themselves at home. So I do not apprehend that you are going to empty the soldiers' homes by granting these pensions.

But, Mr. President, any inmate of the soldiers' homes may go home at any time he sees fit and thereafter he will draw the increased pension provided for by this act.

Mr. CURTIS. But if he has a family at home to support, the increased cost of living would be so great that he could not support his family and himself at home with the increased pension.

Mr. WALSH. That of course is quite true. If he has a family at home, the increased cost of living bears upon them. Although I have no figures available at this time, I feel very confident from all I know about the matter that the large majority of those in soldiers' homes have no homes.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to state that I have received a large number of letters from inmates of homes who were supporting families outside.

ADJOURNMENT OVER MEMORIAL DAY.

Mr. WALSH. In accordance with the agreement to which I referred awhile ago, I move that the Senate adjourn until Friday at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Friday, May 31, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 28, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, out of the fervency of soul we come to Thee in prayer for the success of our soldiers and their allies in the great struggle now on in the western front; that our prayers may mingle with the thousands springing spontaneously from the hearts of anxious, loving, and devout souls.

Help us and them to rest our case on the immutable foundation, the justice and goodness of God. Our cause is right, and God is on our side; and though things may seem discouraging and dark, we may rest assured that all will be right in the end.

We can not always trace the way
Where Thou, Almighty One, dost move.

But Thy wisdom, power, and goodness will, in spite of everything to the contrary, prevail. So we trust, so we hope, so we pray, in His Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. POWERS, indefinitely, on account of illness.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, had requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. FALL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

S. 4068. An act for the relief of Ella Oliver Richardson and Edmund Richardson, of New Orleans, La.

MRS. JOSEPH I. HOWE.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 350 (H. Rept. No. 609).

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Mrs. Joseph I. Howe, daughter of Benjamin F. Craycroft, late an employee on the roll of the House, a sum not exceeding $250 to defray the funeral expenses of said Benjamin F. Craycroft.

The resolution was agreed to.

MRS. KITTIE IVINS.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I present another privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 349 (H. Rept. No. 608).

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Mrs. Kittie Ivins, widow of Eugene E. Ivins, late an employee on the roll of the House, a sum equal to six months' compensation as clerk of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and an additional amount not exceeding $250 to defray the funeral expenses of said Eugene E. Ivins.

The resolution was agreed to.

SALARIES OF THE CHIEF PAGES.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I have another privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 324 (H. Rept. No. 610).

Resolved, That the salaries of the two chief pages be increased to $1,500 each: Provided, That the said increase be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives until otherwise provided by law.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARK) there were—ayes 88, noes 11.

Accordingly the resolution was agreed to.

MAJORITY AND MINORITY MESSENGERS IN CHARGE OF TELEPHONES.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I have another privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 323 (H. Rept. No. 611).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided by law, to the majority and minority messengers in charge of telephones, respectively, the sum of $300 each per annum, payable monthly, as additional compensation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. SHERLEY. To try to obtain some information about this resolution. I do not think we ought blindly to pay increases of salaries, and I should be glad if the gentleman will tell the House the reason for this.

Mr. PARK. The reasons submitted to the committee were mainly the increased cost of living.

Mr. POU. How much are these messengers now getting?

Mr. PARK. They are getting $1,200.

Mr. POU. And this is to give them $1,500?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I think they are receiving $1,500 each, and this will make it $1,800.

Mr. DYER. I think it is $1,200.

Mr. STAFFORD. The resolution, as I understand it, relates to the chief telephone pages. Their salary was increased a couple of years ago from $1,200 to $1,500. The purport of this resolution is to increase their salaries from $1,500 to $1,800. Of course, I may be mistaken about this.

The SPEAKER. If there is any dispute about the facts, the Chair will suggest that the gentleman from Georgia withhold the resolution.

Mr. GARNER. Does not the gentleman from Georgia know as a positive fact how much these people are getting?

Mr. PARK. I understand they are getting $1,200.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman ought to have positive knowledge on that.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the chairman of the committee is informed as to the situation, but perhaps the figures have slipped his mind for the moment. The salary of the chief telephone operator is now $1,500, and the purpose of this resolution is to make it $1,800, in order to equalize a situation with reference to which the House has already acted. A few days ago the House raised to $1,800 the pay of two employees who are really in the same class as the chief telephone operators. To leave it as it now is would be an unfair discrimination really against these two operators. At the same time I think every one in the House knows that the positions held by these chief operators are very important positions, that these positions are held by men who are very efficient, and I think we all recognize that it is absolutely essential in these times that these men should have an income at least as great as $1,800 a year to maintain their families.

Mr. CANNON. Who are the two employees whose salaries were recently increased to $1,800?

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Collier. The committee have looked into this matter carefully, and are in favor of this resolution.

Mr. BLACK. I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. If these increases are granted, will these employees also get the $120 a year increase?

Mr. PARK. I think they will.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think they ought to receive the $120 increase provided in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill and also receive this $300 increase?

Mr. PARK. It is a matter for the House. I present it as chairman of the Committee on Accounts. The Committee on Accounts have reported it unanimously, and it is presented here for the House to act upon.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK) there were—ayes 91, noes 29.

Mr. BLACK. On that I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-seven Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the passage of this resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 247, nays 48, not voting 130, answered "present" 5, as follows:

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. STEELE. I therefore withdraw my vote of "aye" and answer "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

On motion of Mr. PARK, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Under a special order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is recognized for 10 minutes. [Applause and cheers.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the hearty cooperation by Members on both sides of this aisle to dispatch business in order to adjourn the Congress by July 1, and in further view of the assurances which I have made so often to Members upon both sides of the House that we would not have a tax bill at this session, I feel it is due to myself, as well as to the House, to make a brief, plain statement concerning the legislative situation at this time. The first of the year—in fact, at the convening of this session of Congress—I recognized that the appropriations and the expenditures under the appropriations for the coming fiscal year would be so enormous that we would be under the absolute necessity, either at this session or at the next session, of bringing in a revenue bill largely increasing taxes. Upon returning to Washington after the holidays I talked with officials of the Treasury Department, with the Secretary of the Treasury and others, and insisted that a part of this session's program should be the enactment of a new revenue measure. When Mr. Burleson brought to me the President's program for the session, finding that it did not include any revenue legislation, I insisted to Mr. Burleson that the President should include as a part of this session's program a tax measure. I insisted upon and talked with the Treasury officials, including Mr. McAdoo, about the necessity of a revenue measure at this session as late as March 15.

I thought it was wiser and better, if we were to have tax legislation at this session, that we should begin it at once in the early part of the session, so that we could get it behind us and upon the statute books before the hot summer days came on, and then the people would have sufficient time to understand it, to approve or disapprove it. Those favoring and opposing would have opportunity to defend before their people their position on it. Finding that it was not the policy of the Treasury or of the administration to undertake the passage of a revenue measure at this session of Congress, and knowing, too, that a large majority of the House and Senate was opposed to such undertaking, I ceased further insistence upon its consideration and at once began to make efforts to so arrange the legislative program that we would get away by the 1st of July. I conferred with the minority leader and many other Members of the minority, also with the chairmen of the various committees, relative to the speeding up of legislation. I assured them that we would not have a tax measure, and, therefore, that we could get through the business in time to adjourn by July 1. Many of us believed and all hoped that by mutual, earnest cooperation it was possible and probable to dispose of the legislative program in time to adjourn by July 1, and went to work to that end. I took the matter up with the leaders in the Senate on both sides, and the same assurances that no tax measure was included in the session's program were made. All agreed to cooperate in facilitating the consideration and passage of the necessary war measures and the appropriation bills in time to get through by July 1, if possible.

I want to say that there has been upon the part of the minority as well as the majority an absolute keeping of good faith, both here and in the Senate. To-day the program, exclusive of a tax measure, is so far advanced that we would have adjourned about July 1. The minority has not forced the majority to bring in any special rule to consider any measure on the program. [Applause.] In the interest of facilitating legislation, the minority has consented to dispense with Calendar Wednesdays and Unanimous Consent Mondays whenever unanimous-consent request was made. While some did not favor all of the measures on the program, or all of the measures that have been presented as war measures, in toto, not one has attempted to filibuster or to delay the consideration of any of these measures, but he was willing and content to come to a showdown and to a vote. [Applause.]

I wish to say that when I saw the notice for the first time—and it was the first intimation that I had had from any quarter—in the New York World, about May 10, that the Secretary of the Treasury would demand and insist upon a revenue measure at this session, I was the most surprised, the most amazed, man in this body. I had understood just a few weeks before that no revenue measure was in contemplation at all. I am firmly convinced that it is not necessary to enact a revenue measure at this session and that it is unwise under all the circumstances to undertake one at this late day in the session. But the President of the United States, Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, has declared otherwise. He has given it as his opinion that it is necessary that a proper and just measure, largely increasing the revenues, be put upon the statute books before this session closes. Although, as I said, I do not believe there is an absolute necessity for the passage of such a measure at this session, yet when the Commander in Chief speaks I believe under the present circumstances that we should defer to his judgment. A refusal would be misconstrued and would be heralded by every enemy throughout the world, and especially in Germany, as a split between the Congress and the Commander in Chief, and that Congress had refused to give him the necessary money to maintain our armies in Europe. We could not afford to be so misconstrued and misinterpreted. Our duty is plain. We should go to the task as good soldiers and patriotic statesmen, promptly and uncomplainingly. [Applause.]

It has been asked how it is possible that we could pass a revenue measure in the short session while we claim that it will take four or five months or more to pass one at this session. The answer is easy. If the Ways and Means Committee—and it had decided to do that—should come back here a day or two after the fall elections, Congress not being in session, with no departmental work to perform, with no attendance necessary upon the sessions of the House, with no Members bringing in constituents to protest to us against taxing their particular product or incomes and profits, in that month of cool weather, when we could work morning, afternoon, and evening, 10, 12, and 16 hours a day, we could do what it will take us now two or three months to do. As it is now, the House will be in session and we shall have to attend the sessions of the House. We are subject to answer to roll calls; we must attend to departmental duties; and our correspondence is three or four times as large when the House is in session as when it is not in session. We can not work as many hours, even if the whole days were given to us, in this hot, intolerable, sweltering summer weather of Washington, as we could in November. I believe we could have framed and passed just as wise and as equitable a tax measure at the next session with that course pursued as we can at this session, and practically all the taxes would have been collected at the same time as they will be if passed at this session.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has spoken very frankly in reference to the situation, and in so far as his own action is concerned it was entirely unnecessary that he should make any explanation, because I am sure no one upon this side had any idea but he was acting in the utmost good faith. There is, however, one other matter of which I think some explanation ought to be given, if the gentleman is able to do so. It has come to my attention and to the attention of others of the House by repeated rumors that the action of the press had something to do with this matter. Can the gentleman inform me whether there is any truth in that?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the Secretary of the Treasury thought it was necessary to have this revenue measure at this session until his return from the liberty-loan campaign. In fact I know he did not think it was necessary when he started out on that campaign; but after going out in the campaign, seeing the situation from another viewpoint, and after returning to Washington and getting a closer eye upon the condition of the Treasury and a closer ear to his advisers in the Treasury Department and learning of the demands of the different departments for the enormous increased appropriations submitted to Congress, I think he became unduly alarmed and gave undue weight to the opinion of his Treasury officials, and was therefore convinced that it was necessary to have this legislation at this session. In answer further to the gentleman: I do not think that Secretary McAdoo ever thought about the press—the newspapers and magazines—one way or the other. However, I do believe that way back hidden somewhere, unseen by most of us, there was an influence of one of the shrewdest and most powerful lobbies that ever infested the hotels or the corridors of this Capitol, which made itself felt with some in whose judgment the Secretary of the Treasury had great faith. I know that such a lobby has been maintained here by the big publishers. Its committee has had interviews with me. It was determined by the publishers at the first of the session that this session should not close until they had a chance to put to a vote in Congress either the question of the repeal, or modification, or a suspension of the operation of the postal-rate provisions of existing law. I know they attempted to get such an amendment on the Post Office bill in the House, or to get a separate bill for the purpose. They failed. They attempted to get it on the Post Office bill in the Senate committee and they failed. They then gave notice that a motion would be made in the Senate, after the Post Office appropriation bill was reported to it, to suspend the rules so that such amendment could be offered to the bill and thus have another fight in the House and the Senate. I know that they planned that if they could not get it in some pending bill, one way or the other, they would insist on a revenue bill, which they believed would give them their chance.

I know that the leading papers that have been denouncing Congress and the Ways and Means Committee, and especially me, for the present postal-rate provisions, as soon as they had the first intimation that a tax bill would be demanded by the Treasury Department came out in strong, leading editorials demanding, in the interest of the Treasury and the country, that Congress enact at this session another revenue bill.

I understand their game. I want to warn this House and the country of their game. [Applause.] Here it is: They are going to try to put the repeal of the postal provision or the suspension of its operation upon whatever revenue bill is passed here. But they know that the manhood and the patriotism, the sense of right and justice, and of honesty and fair dealing between the Government and every class of the people, of the membership of this House, will forbid and prevent such repeal or modification going on in a bill here. [Applause.] They then hope to put such amendment on in the Senate, and then, when it goes to conference, they are counting upon the conferees of the House and the Senate sitting in session day after day and week after week, and finally getting together on every proposition except the repeal or modification of that provision, and then, when election time or adjournment time is nearing, they hope to get the President or the Secretary of the Treasury to insist upon the House conferees yielding, appealing to them not to take the responsibility of defeating or further delaying the passage of the greatest and most important tax and financial measure ever proposed on account of sticking to the little, pitiful postal-rate provision. That is their game; and, gentlemen, I warn you now. See if that is not the path they take.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. In a moment. I am going to watch and see who is going to help them play that game, and let you see what a prophet I am. [Applause.] I serve notice on them and the House now that if the Speaker's judgment shall assign me as one of the conferees there will be one who will not help them play that game, but will use all of his power to thwart it. [Applause.]

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 8764. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union.

OIL AND GAS LEASING BILL.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 2812, and ask to agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Oklahoma want?

Mr. FERRIS. I ask to agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The Senate has already appointed conferees, and I ask that the House agree to the conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. What is the request of the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. It is the oil-leasing bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked.

Mr. CANNON. What is the bill?

Mr. FERRIS. It is the general oil and gas leasing bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2812, to insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. RAKER, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and Mr. SINNOTT.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army during the next fiscal year, and, pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be dispensed with, with the statement that, so far as the committee is concerned, we shall be liberal with the discussion of this bill under the five-minute rule, and that I expect to take some 20 or 30 minutes to explain the provisions of the bill after we start with the reading of it, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], the minority member, will do the same.

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I do not intend to object, but it seems to me that on a $12,000,000,000 expenditure there ought to be something that the chairman of a great committee like this and the ranking member of a great committee like this should say to the country and to the House for the information of the Members of the House and the citizens of the Nation.

Mr. DENT. I think the gentleman evidently did not understand all of my statement.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say he was going to take 25 minutes.

Mr. DENT. Twenty to thirty minutes to explain it, and longer if necessary, and then have liberal discussion of each item of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood what the gentleman said, but I want to characterize what he said as inadequate; and that was the purpose for which I rose.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman want me to speak two hours?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the country is entitled to an elaborate statement in connection with the bill, and I think it devolves upon the chairman of this great committee and upon the members of the committee to make a frank statement to the country. There is no reason why they should not do it.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman mean to intimate we do not propose to make a frank statement?

Mr. MADDEN. I am afraid the gentleman could not do it in the short time he proposes to occupy. How could he do it?

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. It is the purpose of the chairman of the committee, as I understand it, to make an elaborate explanation of the various items contained in the bill under the five-minute rule. And in that way the Members of the House will be fully informed of the items in the bill. It has been the experience of practically every committee of the House that, when an explanation has been made under general debate, the same explanation has to be made when the bill is up for consideration under the five-minute rule. Because many of the Members who are not here under general debate begin to ask questions concerning the items when the bill is up for second reading. The committee thought, therefore, that the explanations would be made fully, frankly, freely, under the five-minute rule. And the committee thought, furthermore, that probably a better purpose would be served in doing that. I personally have had no applications for time for general debate, thus showing the disposition on the part of the Members to debate the measure under the five-minute rule. In fact, I have assured the Members on this side of the aisle that they will be given ample opportunity under that rule to discuss fully the provisions of the bill and to ask all questions they desire respecting it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, all of what the gentleman says is very interesting and instructive, but my own notion is that a consecutive statement about the items of the bill would be much more instructive and interesting, and appeal more to the intelligence of the public, than a disjointed statement made under the five-minute rule as to each particular item. And I do not believe that the people expect such expedition in the disposition of an important bill like this as to preclude the possibility of an amplified statement of the bill as a whole by the ranking men on the committee, including the chairman.

We were asked a little while ago to submit no questions when an appropriation bill came from this committee for $640,000,000 for airplanes. The committee came into the House with a great deal of mystery surrounding them. They seem to have been filled with a vision to the effect that if they disclosed any information which they possessed or did not possess something would happen to the Nation; that the Kaiser would discover that we had entered into a plan to exterminate him from the face of the earth. We were good and we abided the suggestions of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and asked no questions.

We sat here mutely, as automatons, and voted $640,000,000 to build airplanes, and we have heard from high sources of what has been done with the $640,000,000, how many airplanes we have not got, and what effect the introduction of these airplanes under this expenditure has had on the efficiency of the American Army on the other side, and how we have won the victories on the west front, and how we have prevented the German Army from advancing at Ypres, and Mount Kemmel, and Amiens, and on the Chemin des Dames, and all these places, while we have not an airplane anywhere that anybody knows anything about. We have seen the mystery that surrounded the appropriation. Now, we ought to know, and for one I ask—I am not going to demand it, but ask it as a right of the American people—that a full and complete and comprehensive statement in advance of the consideration of this bill shall be made by these men who report the bill, for the information of the House and for the information of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. May I interrupt the gentleman there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Has the gentleman read the report?

Mr. MADDEN. Why, no. The gentleman only reported the bill day before yesterday.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, on Saturday night.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman has not read the report.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman reported the bill Saturday night, and since then I have been in conference and I have had to read so many things about other questions that I have not had time to read this.

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman had read the report he would find that I put in it, as the chairman of the committee, and at the suggestion of the committee, and after getting the consent of the Secretary of War, a statement to the effect that although it has been stated we had but 1 airplane in France with our Army we have 1,316 there, and that 323 of them were fighting planes. [Applause.] And that is in the report.

Mr. MADDEN. And none of these were made in America. They were made abroad. Not one of them was made out of the $640,000,000 appropriation that I referred to.

Mr. DENT. They were paid for out of it.

Mr. MADDEN. We have not the planes on the other side, and men who are there will testify to it. But that is not all. Regardless of what the report contains, I plead with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to make a statement comprehensive in its nature. They are as the trusted servants of the American people.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can make his demand for the regular order.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman is out of order in his comments.

Mr. MADDEN. I am in order. The gentleman does not like to hear the truth.

The SPEAKER. All of this talk is out of order on both sides. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object to the request made by the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. McKENZIE. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Virginia can not drive me off the floor in that way.

The SPEAKER. Both gentleman are out of order.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 28, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

MR. SPEAKER: I request leave of absence for 29th and 30th, on account of important business.

Yours, truly, ALBERT F. POLK.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12281, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], whom I admire very greatly, and of whom I am very fond, has gotten unduly excited over this situation. The Committee on Military Affairs has undertaken to obtain every bit of information that was possible relative to the military situation of this country, and it has been the sentiment of the committee that as much of that information as was consistent with the military program in Europe should be given to Congress and the country.

Personally I have begged and pleaded with the War Department to allow the Committee on Military Affairs of the House to divulge such information obtained in executive session in connection with this appropriation bill as would not interfere with the military operations of the Government. I have believed, and it has been my opinion all along, that the country ought to know what has been done, but that we ought not to promise too much as to what will be done. That has been the trouble heretofore. [Applause.] In line with that I asked the Secretary of War to give me permission to put into the report that was submitted in connection with this bill what has been accomplished in regard to the air service, which has been grossly misrepresented throughout the country. I am not here to say that it has accomplished everything that was promised. I am not here to say that there have not been some mistakes and some delays. But I am here to say that that service has accomplished a great deal more than the country has been advised of.

With that permission from the Secretary of War, I have printed in the report, as coming from the Committee on Military Affairs, the following statement, and I propose to follow that with a little more detail. The Aviation Section of the Signal Corps, according to the testimony before the committee, is as follows: Number of officers, 12,107; number of enlisted men, 136,761; number of fliers, 4,054; number of machines in France, 1,316; number of machines in the United States, 3,760.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. So that there will be no misunderstanding as to that——

Mr. JUUL. From what page is the gentleman reading?

Mr. DENT. From the first page of the report.

Mr. GILLETT. Does it mean that those 1,300 machines were made in this country at all?

Mr. DENT. No; they have not been made here.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. OLNEY. For the benefit of gentlemen over here, I will say it developed from our investigations that our raw material, including steel, was all shipped over to France by the advice of our officers and the staff officers of Great Britain, and every bit of American material went into those machines. Even our mechanics put those machines together.

Mr. GILLETTE. Does the gentleman mean that all those machines were made exclusively of American materials?

Mr. OLNEY. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. The engines?

Mr. OLNEY. All but the engines.

Mr. KAHN. There has been a great deal of criticism about the Liberty engine and the delay in delivering the Liberty engine. Both England and France have placed orders in this country for the Liberty engine, so that that engine has proven a decided success, and the fact that the cobelligerent nations intend to buy some from this country is the best proof of the fact that they are a success.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me in order that I may ask the gentleman from California a question?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman says that England and France have placed orders with the United States Government for the Liberty engine. How many engines have they got? Have they only placed orders, or have they got engines?

Mr. KAHN. The engines are coming forth in good shape, and, of course, the deliveries will be made in accordance with our own needs and the quantity that we ourselves will use. There are over 900, I believe, that have already been shipped.

Mr. FIELDS. And 3,000 have been ordered by Great Britain.

Mr. MADDEN. Only 11 were delivered.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want to put into the RECORD the official figures of the production of the Liberty engine up to date. Five hundred and sixty-one have been delivered to the Army of the United States. Four hundred and eighty have been delivered to the Navy of the United States. Ten hundred and forty-one completed Liberty engines have already been delivered to the Army and Navy of the United States, and they are coming very rapidly now.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] said that the Liberty motors had turned out to be a great success, which I am delighted to hear. I want to ask the gentleman whether that was for the equipment of battle planes?

Mr. KAHN. It was for the equipment of bombing planes and fighting planes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not the actual fighting machine?

Mr. KAHN. Yes. The combat machine is the actual fighting machine. The Liberty motor can not be used to a good purpose in the pure plane operations. It is too heavy a machine, but in the heavy airplane it is undoubtedly a great success.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit me, I think perhaps the distinction was in the fact that the Liberty engine was not designed for and is not now being used for what are known as the pursuit machines, single seater, solo flying machines.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is what I refer to as the battle planes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The Liberty motor is not being used for that. It was obviously not intended for that, because it is too heavy for machines of that character.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Are the machines we are using made in Europe?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The single-seated pursuit machines, the solo flyers, are being made in Europe, but the heavier ones, combat planes and bombing planes, are being supplied with the Liberty engine as fast as it is being produced.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The War Department furnishes figures showing that 107 of the Haviland bombing planes have already been delivered to the United States Government.

Mr. MADDEN. Delivered where?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. To the United States Government.

Mr. MADDEN. In the United States?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Some of them here.

Mr. MADDEN. Just a little while ago the Bureau of Publicity, over which Mr. Creel presides, sent out information to the newspapers that the factories were making planes to the capacity of the factories, that thousands of planes were on the way to France, and all that sort of stuff, and there was not one built in the United States, as was proved from the lips of the men who had control over the manufacture in the Army.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say for the information of the gentleman from Illinois that the facts are that the cause of the delay in the production of the combat planes has not been really here in the United States, but because of the fact that changes in the planes have been demanded by those who have had the matter in charge in France. The delay in the production of these planes has come largely because of the demand of those in charge of our armies in France rather than because of the inability of American manufacturers to produce that particular character of plane.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I should like to make my statement, but I yield to the gentleman from Kansas, a member of the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman made the statement that foreign governments had expressed their entire approval of the Liberty motor. I do not believe such a statement as that ought to go out entirely unqualified. While it is true that foreign governments have given orders for Liberty motors, it is also true, as the evidence taken at our hearings shows, that at the request of foreign governments orders for Liberty motors have been canceled and foreign motors substituted in their place, showing that the foreign governments prefer their own motors.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. KAHN. The testimony given only three or four days before this bill was reported was that both England and France have given orders for specific numbers of the Liberty motors.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true, but if the gentleman will remember, Mr. Potter, who was in charge of that matter, stated to our committee that there were a number of cancellations of orders.

Mr. KAHN. That was before.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; lately, and where factories have discontinued the manufacture of Liberty motors and started, at the request of foreign governments, on the manufacture of their own motors in this country.

Mr. HUSTED. If the gentleman will yield, I want to get some further information along that line. I want to ask the chairman if there is an adequate number of training planes now in the Army aviation camps in this country and in France, in order to train the student aviators as rapidly as possible?

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman, in answer to that inquiry, that more men have gone into the service than there are planes for them to use. This service has been very popular, and the men have gone in more rapidly than the manufacturers have been able to construct the machines.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted I believe I left off at the number of machines in France. We have 1,316 machines in France and 3,760 machines in the United States. The number of combat machines in France is 323 and the number of aviation training camps in the United States is 27.

Now, to satisfy my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], I want to give the committee some additional figures. Last July Congress appropriated practically $640,000,000 for the Aircraft Service. It had already appropriated, as I recall, $10,000,000 in the regular Army appropriation bill on May 10, making a total of practically $650,000,000 that we appropriated last year for the aircraft program. Of that amount, according to the testimony as late as May 6, $316,517,000 had been actually spent. The balance of $423,369,000 has been obligated.

Mr. MADDEN. That takes it all.

Mr. DENT. Obligated for airplanes, engines, special clothing, motor transports, and other items provided for in that act.

Mr. MADDEN. But this was only for the construction of airplanes. It was not for clothing or payment of men or anything except the construction of airplanes, as I understood it.

Mr. DENT. Oh, yes; it was.

Mr. MADDEN. It was! Well, we spent $316,000,000. Will the gentleman tell us accurately what we have received for the $316,000,000?

Mr. DENT. I have already stated it.

Mr. MADDEN. We have 1,300 planes.

Mr. DENT. We have 1,316 in France and 3,760 in this country.

Mr. MADDEN. How much does that make it cost per plane?

Mr. DENT. I will give the gentleman those figures.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to ask the gentleman whether the cost of the 27 aviation fields that have been constructed, with the buildings and equipment, have been taken from the $640,000,000 fund?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. That forms a material part of the amount that has been expended?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. About $69,000,000 have been expended for aviation fields.

Mr. SNYDER. Was that authorized in the appropriation of the $640,000,000?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; and they had to be provided before we could do anything with the aviation planes.

Mr. SNYDER. That is according to my understanding, and I wanted to develop it.

Mr. DENT. Now, of this amount there has been expended $270,000,000 for planes and special parts. The average price of a plane is about $5,000. The price of the engine ranges from $1,950 to $5,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That is to be added to the $5,000, so that it makes a plane cost anywhere from $6,900 to $10,000?

Mr. DENT. Exactly. At the time of the declaration of war we had 73 aviators in the Army. Since that time we have graduated 3,439 who can fly. At present 5,000 are waiting for assignment to the ground school.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman let me ask a question right there?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. How many of these men were graduated on the other side?

Mr. DENT. I have not in mind now the figures in regard to that.

Mr. MADDEN. I think there were a good many more men graduated on the other side than there have been on this side.

Mr. DENT. I think the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken about that.

Mr. MADDEN. We had over 1,500 there at one time that had been sent over.

Mr. DENT. I think I have those figures.

Mr. MADDEN. We want these facts, if it takes a corkscrew to draw them out.

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman will be patient, I will try to give the facts, but I can not recollect the figures. The gentleman seems to be very impatient in getting at the facts. I am trying to give the committee information as fully and completely as I can.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman ought to get angry about it.

Mr. DENT. I think I am entitled to get angry. I am trying patiently to give the facts to the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman is going to make any progress by getting angry. I am not angry and I do not propose to get into any quarrel, but I do propose to insist on all the facts, as far as I am able to get them.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman has no right to say that he is trying to corkscrew the facts out of me.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not say that. I said that if I had to take a corkscrew to get the information, I proposed to do it to the best of my ability. I did not say that I was going to get them out of the gentleman that way. I do not think the gentleman has a right to resent it or be offended, for nothing that I said was intended to offend the gentleman. I do not think the gentleman will deny that I had a right to ask questions to get information if it is obtainable, but I propose to be courteous in regard to it.

Mr. DENT. I do not deny that; but I repeat that I do not think the gentleman should state that he had to corkscrew the facts out of me.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman objects to that, I will withdraw what I said in reference to the corkscrew. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALDOW. Will the gentleman yield or does he wish to finish his statement?

Mr. DENT. I would rather make my statement, because it will read better in the RECORD and the House will better understand it; then I will be glad to answer any questions after I have concluded. There are 2,713 at the ground school, 2,963 at the primary flying school, and 191 at the bombing school.

There are 191 bombing schools, 145 pursuit schools, and 88 observers' schools. There are 4,606 flying officers in the United States, or were on May 1, and 1,590 abroad, making a total of 6,211. There are 6,506 nonflying officers in the United States and abroad 1,854, making a total of 8,364. There are 2,983 cadets at the flying schools in the United States and 2,044 abroad, making a total of 5,037.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I would rather complete my statement.

Mr. MAPES. The matter which I desired to inquire about is right in line with what the gentleman is saying. In the report the number of cadets is not mentioned. I wanted to inquire if the cadets were included in the number of enlisted men.

Mr. DENT. A cadet is to be a commissioned officer.

Mr. MAPES. How many men are in training?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is interrupting the statement, and I can not stop to tell the gentleman these things. If he will be patient, I think it will all come out better in the end.

Mr. MAPES. But the committee report says nothing about the number of men in training, and I am interested to know.

Mr. DENT. The report gives the total men enlisted and men in the service.

Mr. MAPES. That is what I am trying to direct the attention of the gentleman to. I think the House would like to know how many men are in training, and the report does not show that.

Mr. GORDON. They are all in training except those who have gone to Europe.

Mr. DENT. I have given the number, 5,027.

Mr. MAPES. But the gentleman says the cadets are officers.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They are in training.

Mr. MAPES. I understood the gentleman from Alabama to say that the cadets are officers.

Mr. DENT. They will be officers.

Mr. MAPES. I would like to ascertain how many men are in training?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The men in training are cadets. We have cadets and reserve military aviators. When he has finished training, he becomes a recognized military aviator.

Mr. MAPES. Are those in training included in the report with the number of enlisted men?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The number of cadets, 5,027, is the number of men actually in training in the aviation schools in France and in this country.

Mr. MAPES. And they are included with the number of officers?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They are not included with the number of officers.

Mr. MAPES. Then they are not mentioned or included in any figures in the report.

Mr. McKENZIE Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. One of the officers testified as follows:

We have at the present time 5,000 men awaiting assignment to ground schools. There are 2,713 men at the ground schools, 2,983 at the primary flying schools, 191 at the bombing schools, 145 at our pursuit schools, 88 at our observers' school, and none at any gunnery school.

And, in addition to that, of course there are thousands of students at places such as Champagne, Ill., and I think there are 12 schools in the country where they get their first primary training.

Mr. MAPES. Are those men all included in this number of enlisted men?

Mr. McKENZIE. Not as enlisted men.

Mr. MAPES. Then, as I said before, the men who are being trained for fliers are not mentioned as a part of the aviation section in the report.

Mr. McKENZIE. As I understand it, when a man is assigned to the flying corps he is made a second lieutenant. When he becomes a real flyer he is made a first lieutenant. I may be mistaken about that, but that is my recollection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this additional statement, so far as production is concerned. The week ending April 27 we shipped—that is, shipped from our factories—110 primary training planes, 19 advanced training planes, 7 combat planes, 241 primary training engines, 108 advanced training engines, 86 combat or Liberty engines. These figures have been brought practically up to date. I was furnished this morning by Col. Arnold, of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps, with a statement which I shall put into the RECORD, giving the amount of money that has been expended up to May 23 for planes, propellers, and spare parts with the average price, and for engines and spare parts with the average price.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to have the gentleman give that.

Mr. DENT. For planes, propellers, and spare parts, average per plane $5,000, $186,154,369.79. Those are the real corrected figures that he brings up to date. For engines and spares, average price $1,950 to $5,000 each, $240,803,176.65. Balloons, $9,590,204.54. Machine guns, ammunition, and bombs, $28,496,912.33. General equipment, including instruments, $32,768,733.47; clothing, $2,519,824.79. Total of obligations, $859,839,974.36.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question there.

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask how many planes it takes for a flyer, to keep a flyer going?

Mr. DENT. That is a matter about which there is a difference of opinion.

Mr. MADDEN. Approximately?

Mr. DENT. My best recollection is that it takes about four.

Mr. MADDEN. How many planes have we got on the other side?

Mr. DENT. One thousand three hundred.

Mr. MADDEN. And how many flyers have we?

Mr. DENT. I gave that number to the committee a short time ago.

Mr MADDEN. It was over 2,000.

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Then we have less than one plane for each flyer, have we not?

Mr. DENT. Yes; I stated that frankly, that we were ahead in men and behind in the number of machines.

Mr. MADDEN. So that, as a matter of fact, there is not a bit of use in having the men unless we have the matériel—the guns and ammunition, and all that. Men are of no use in a battle unless they have everything else.

Mr. DENT. Except that when we get the machines we will have the men ready to go ahead and use them.

Mr. McKENZIE. May I be permitted to say to my colleague, in the interest of information, that a great many of our American flyers, who are spoken of in these numbers given out here, are flying for the English and the French?

Mr. MADDEN. Then they are not flying for us?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes, they are; I beg the gentleman's pardon. They are doing their bit.

Mr. DENT. I shall state in that connection that it was testified before the committee, notwithstanding the current rumors that appeared in the newspapers of the country, that there never has been a time when the American forces in the front line have not been protected with machines. If we did not have a sufficient number, they were furnished by the British and the French.

Mr. MADDEN. I guess that is the information supplied to the committee, but I do not think it is true.

Mr. DENT. Of course if the gentleman does not believe what the War Department says I can not help it.

Mr. SNELL. Is it so that our Government has adopted the Handley-Page bombing machine?

Mr. DENT. That is one of them that they use.

Mr. SNELL. And the Bristol fighting machine?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. And the D'Haviland reconnoissance machine?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Which one of those machines is it that you can build for about $6,000 or $7,000, as I understood from the gentleman's statement?

Mr. DENT. I do not recall the difference.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The price of the different machines has not been furnished the committee.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the chairman to say we could build some machines for $6,000 or $7,000.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is the cheaper machine. The engine costs about $5,000 and that would undoubtedly apply to the large bombing plane.

Mr. SNELL. I understood you could not build a Handley-Page bombing machine for $50,000 or $60,000.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have not built any yet; no, sir.

Mr. SNELL. Is there a Liberty motor actually in use on the western front in battle—in actual combat?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not think there is.

Mr. SNELL. How do you know they are successful if they have not been sent over there and been put in actual work?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Because we have tried them——

Mr. SNELL. Where?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In this country.

Mr. SNELL. I mean a battle plane at work on the western front—a combat plane?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Every condition of battle trial that is possible has been worked out in this country. We have not put them in battle, but the same process has been worked out as in regard to automatic machine guns; for instance, the Browning gun, for arming our troops. That has not been put in actual battle, but our officers know it is the best arm with which they can fight that has been produced anywhere.

Mr. SNELL. If the Liberty motor has not been tried on the western front, I was wondering——

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Because the same air is there that there is here, and the same men who can drive it here can drive it there, and when we see these planes perform here we know they will do the same thing in battle.

Mr. SNELL. I was simply wondering how it would do until it was tried out in actual fighting?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We do not know that Gen. Pershing is going to win this war until he overcomes the enemy in battle. Still we have every confidence that the American soldier is going to win this war. We only know how this plane is going to perform in battle by what it has done here.

Mr. SNELL. How long before you expect a Liberty motor to be on the western front?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. As far as I know, they are there now.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman does not know?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have not been informed; we do not get the information.
Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The only difference in the test of the Liberty motor is that over there they get shot at?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is about the difference.
Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for one question in connection with the Browning gun? The gentleman said we had a whole lot of Browning guns. Where are they?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They are in the Army of the United States.
Mr. MADDEN. How many Browning guns have we got?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am going to say something to the House about the Browning gun and I do not want to make my speech now.
Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman might tell us now if his speech is good.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say this: We produced more heavy Browning guns in 1918 than the United States had efficient machine guns at the declaration of war. We are producing right now at the rate of a thousand a month——
Mr. MADDEN. The heavy Browning gun?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.
Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will.
Mr. REAVIS. I understand the Liberty motor is used in a fighting plane?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Not in a single-seater; it is too heavy for that purpose.
Mr. REAVIS. It is to be used as a combat plane, for the purpose of bombing?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is used as a combat plane where you want to carry more than one man.
Mr. REAVIS. A combat machine is not necessarily a one-seater fighting machine?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No.
Mr. REAVIS. And the Liberty motor is to be utilized in that kind of a machine?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is the idea. A fighting machine has a smaller engine, much smaller wings, and flies at tremendous rate of speed and can not use as heavy a motor as the Liberty motor.
Mr. REAVIS. Does the gentleman know what engine is to be used in connection with the fighting machine?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The Hispano-Suiza, the Bugati, and several foreign makes are to be utilized for that particular purpose.
Mr. REAVIS. Are we manufacturing any engines in America now.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We are starting to produce the Bristol fighter. There has been a great deal of change of orders in reference to the matter. The gentleman understands we are not trying to fight this war in this country. We take orders from those men who have to fight it in Europe. Finally we have come now, I am told, to a type of rapid fighter, in substance the Bristol fighter.
Mr. REAVIS. Is it not true the rapidity with which these aircrafts are changed makes any hard-and-fast proposition of a fighting plane rather inadvisable?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes. The art is new and being changed rapidly, and one reason why it was advisable to buy these fighting planes over there is because of the fact we are so far away it is difficult for us to change our manufacture as rapidly as the art of flying over there grows. It has been told us one of the great troubles of the British army in perfecting its fighting plane has been the little strip of water only 30 miles wide, the Straits of Dover, which separates them from France. So they do not have as immediate contact with the war as the French. And if that has been a stumbling block to them, the fact that we have 3,000 miles of water between us and the seat of war has been a greater stumbling block to us.
Mr. REAVIS. Is not that condition partly responsible for the somewhat deplorable condition the aircraft situation is in now?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not believe it is as deplorable as we have been led to believe. I will say to the gentleman that the Chief of Staff of the United States Army, a man in whom I think we have absolute confidence, has told us that there never has been a time when the fighting units of the American Army have not had all the battle planes to protect them that they could use. We have not 150 miles of front to defend yet. If we had, we would not have enough planes now.
Mr. REAVIS. Is it not true that such protection is from machines they furnished?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is furnished by machines asked for and bought from them.
Mr. REAVIS. And to that extent we have not done probably what we should have done in reference to the aircraft defense?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If we would admit that we could make a better machine and a better plane, there might be considerable force in the gentleman's argument. I think the wise thing is to buy the best and equip our men with them while we are experimenting with the machines over here.
Mr. REAVIS. What I have asked is not in the spirit of criticism, but in order to get the facts. I would like to ask the gentleman one further question while he is on the subject of aviation.
The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] yield further?
Mr. DENT. For one more question; but I would like to finish my statement.
Mr. REAVIS. What I wanted to ask is this: There is a claim of a discrimination against the reserve military aviator to the effect that the aviator in the Regular Establishment receives rapid promotion, while the reserve military aviator is not given promotion beyond the rank of junior military aviator. What is there in that?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I looked into that matter, and I found the fact is that as soon as a man is commissioned into the Army now, whether in the reserve force or in the Regular Army proper, his opportunity for promotion is exactly the same. The only advantage the Regular Army man has over the man who has come in as a reserve officer is that his number in that particular grade is higher on the list generally, and so as the opportunities for promotion occur they come, of course, to the men at the head of the list; and so far as advancement is concerned, that is occurring now in the Aviation Department in particular, because a man is a better flier than another it is no handicap to him that he is a reserve aviator rather than a junior military aviator in the Regular Army. I am informed, so far as that particular thing is concerned, that there is no distinction in the Army whatever. I sympathize with the gentleman and his idea in asking that question. I took particular pains to go into it and inform myself, and I think that matter is thoroughly taken care of.
Mr. REAVIS. A member of the Regular Establishment having a higher number has some advantage over the regular military aviator, and the higher number is because of circumstances and not because of design?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is because he is in the service prior to the other man.
Mr. REAVIS. And, as I understand it, a reserve military aviator is entitled after six months in the service to become a junior military aviator?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. He is, if he passes to the satisfaction of a board that gives him that certificate.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to impose on the chairman of the committee, but this is a matter that has been brought to my attention several times, and if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] will yield for a question or two I would appreciate it.
Mr. DENT. I will yield.
Mr. REAVIS. He is entitled to no further promotion, until at the expiration of two years he is made a military aviator?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes, sir.
Mr. REAVIS. But that has no increase in rank.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is an increase in pay only.
Mr. REAVIS. But not in rank.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No, sir.
Mr. REAVIS. The regular is entitled to promotion up to the rank of major in the Aviation Service?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is higher than that now.
Mr. REAVIS. I received a letter two or three days ago from Capt. Reynold that the limit——
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have an officer, Gen. Foulois, who is the only senior military aviator we have in the Army, and because he is a man that has been a flier for three years they have advanced him to the rank of military aviator, and now he is a brigadier general. I think the general statement the gentleman makes is a fact.
Mr. REAVIS. Now, can a reserve military aviator—that is, an aviator in the Reserve Army—hope for the attainment of that rank as will enable him to attain an equal footing with the rank?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think he can. I think the fact of his proficiency as a flier is just as valuable to him in one service as in the other, and the fact that he has to take his chances of seniority of service is one that is inevitable in every line of the Army.

Mr. REAVIS. And the gentleman's observations have led him to believe that the stories of discrimination against reserve officers are not correct?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not think there is any discrimination. The fact that a man has lately come into the Army as a reserve aviator and learns to fly quickly, of course means that he is inevitably low down on the line of lieutenants who are to be promoted, but it would be the same if he came in in the Regular Army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I doubt if there are as many opportunities to become general fliers, as our friend Maj. Foulois was permitted to be, because those men occupy administrative offices, and the grade is not widely given up to numbers.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is as the gentleman from Nebraska says.

Mr. McKENZIE. If my colleague will permit an interruption, in the interest of the truth brought out by the gentleman from Nebraska in regard to the failure of our country to get airplanes, I would like to have it go into the RECORD that a part of our trouble has been in the matter of the failure of contractors on the other side of the water to make deliveries. As a matter of fact, we contracted for something over 13,000 machines in France and England, and up to this time we have got only a few hundred, so that the fault is not all in our own country in bringing down the total.

Mr. REAVIS. Why do we not manufacture them in this country, if they can not furnish them on the other side?

Mr. McKENZIE. Because we can not or could not do it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the committee will allow me to proceed with my statement. I only want a few more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, it must be recognized that the aircraft program, which was inaugurated last summer, was an entirely new proposition in this country. The fact is that it was a comparatively new proposition in the world. And while there have been some mistakes and some delays, I think the War Department has done remarkably well in accomplishing upon this project as much as it has.

I wish to state that the Committee on Military Affairs began hearings on the Army appropriation bill the first week that Congress met in December. In fact, I think it was the second day after Congress convened. We remained in practically continuous executive session upon the estimates until the 8th day of February, except during the brief period of the Christmas holidays. During those sessions we were considering estimates for an Army of 1,600,000 men. We finished our work on the 8th of February and would have been ready to report a bill within a few weeks had it not been for the fact that the Secretary of War informed the committee that he expected to go to the western front and make a personal visit and desired that the committee should not take any official action until his return. He returned some time in April, and it took some weeks for the supplemental estimates to be prepared. He appeared with the Chief of Staff before the committee on the 3d day of May. We had hearings up to the 7th day of May on the supplemental estimates, which carried something over $4,000,000,000 in addition to the original estimates, and which provided for an Army ultimately during the next fiscal year of some 3,000,000. whereas we had been working heretofore upon an Army of 1,600,000 men.

The committee had to call again, before we took final action, a number of officers of the Quartermaster Department and the Ordnance Department, where the increases lay, in order to ascertain the facts in regard to those appropriations.

I mention these facts because it has been stated that the Committee on Military Affairs has worked under the spur of the War Department, and I think it is only fair to the committee that it should go into the RECORD that we worked morning and afternoon whenever we got these estimates, whenever we got the facts, until we finally brought out a bill that increased the original estimates from about $7,700,000,000 to practically $12,000,000,000; and the last estimate came in on the day before we reported the bill out, by which we were asked at the last minute to add $100,000,000 to the Medical Department, which the committee did, on the recommendation of the Secretary of War, indorsed by the Surgeon General of the Army. In other words, Mr. Chairman, this committee has substantially given to the War Department what they have recommended. We have gone into the question of expenditures which have been made under the appropriations that were made last year, and we have taken that as a basis in order to determine whether or not we ought to give to the War Department that which it is asking. We have discovered that there were some duplications—not many. These have been corrected. This committee is unanimously of the opinion that this war must be won and that we must rely upon the War Department's estimates, largely, as to what is necessary to appropriate in order to win it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to reserve the remainder of his time?

Mr. DENT. Yes; I desire to reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs had no intention of shutting off debate or questions respecting this bill, which carries approximately $12,000,000,000. We thought that time could be saved by having a very full discussion of the various paragraphs of the measure under the five-minute rule. In formulating a bill of the vast magnitude in amount of this one the committee proceeded in an entirely different method from any that had heretofore been used. For every paragraph in the bill carrying a large appropriation there was appointed a subcommittee, consisting of one member of the majority and one member of the minority, and each subcommittee has made it a special point to become thoroughly familiar with the items contained in the particular paragraph over which it had jurisdiction. And so, as the bill is read under the five-minute rule, I feel the Committee of the Whole will be able to get more information on this proposed legislation than the House has ever received on any military appropriation bill that has ever been reported to the House heretofore. Some criticism has been made regarding the aeroplane program. Why even to-day on this floor the statement was made by one of the Members that we have practically no aeroplanes, whereas the truth is that we had entered into contracts with manufacturers on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean, who had been building aeroplanes for practically three years before we got into the war, to turn out machines for this country. They have been delivering machines to our forces in Europe right along. I believe it is only fair that these facts be stated.

Our country was notoriously unprepared for war. For years some of the Members on this floor, realizing how absolutely unprepared we were to defend American rights, tried to make the House see that we were living in a fool's paradise; but the light did not strike in on the minds of the majority of the Members of this House. And so we drifted, even "while the sparks were flying everywhere," and refused to make appropriations so that we could become, at least in a measure, prepared for a possible conflict. Eleven months before this country entered the war I offered an amendment to the military appropriation bill asking that the Army be increased to 250,000 men. That was on May 8, 1916. That was voted down by a substantial majority. Repeatedly I had offered amendments to increase the appropriations for ordnance, for small arms, for ordnance ammunition, for small-arms ammunition.

The amendments were voted down, because many of the Members thought that because we were the United States of America no nation on earth would ever want or dare to fight us. Some gentlemen probably thought we could prevent war by handing out religious tracts or high-sounding pacifist phrases to those who might become our enemies, and thus ward off the conflict. But we refused to make the necessary appropriations. So when we got into this war we were notoriously unprepared, and that very knowledge was in the minds of our enemies. They knew how criminally unprepared we were. They thought that we would never fight, no matter what they did to us. That is what they banked on. So when this war started, so far as our entrance therein was concerned, we had to commence at the very beginning of things. We had to create many war industries, because there were none in existence in this country. That was especially true of airplanes. We have had criticisms from the beginning. Honest criticism is a good thing. It has not been amiss, because when honest criticisms were made the War Department exerted every effort to correct the evils that had been pointed out. So at the outset we were criticized about the building of the cantonments and the camps and the location of the cantonments and the camps. But they were located, they were constructed, and you hear very little criticism of that kind nowadays.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I notice, however, that the department has abandoned the cost-plus principle upon which these cantonments were built. That was one of the principal criticisms against the building of the cantonments. That was where the graft was and where the thing was of which the country and the people complained.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, when this country began the construction of 16 great military camps, each one capable of housing from 25,000 to 40,000 soldiers, when we began the construction of 16 National Guard camps, capable of housing anywhere from 20,000 to 30,000 men each, it was a serious problem to get the contractors who had the necessary force, the necessary equipment, and the necessary organization to undertake this great work. It had to be done in a great hurry. The troops were to go to the cantonments a very few weeks after they were started. The cost-plus proposition was the one that appeared at that time to the officials in charge of the work to be the best plan that could be utilized for the speedy construction of these camps. They found out later that they could construct to better advantage by letting contracts, and they have done that. I will not say that mistakes have not been made. I know mistakes have been made, and serious mistakes. But in a great war like this, when you start off with nothing to guide you, when you start off on an uncharted sea, it is inevitable that mistakes will occur. The surprising thing is that so few mistakes have occurred. The gentleman speaks of graft. I have here a clipping from the Liverpool Weekly Post of April 13, 1918, showing what real graft occurred in England, and England had been practically three years in the war before we got into it.

I ask unanimous consent to insert this clipping in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the clipping indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

[From the Liverpool Weekly Post, Apr. 18, 1918.]

WAR CONTRACTS—DISCLOSURE OF BUNGLING BY MUNITION MINISTER.

The accounts of the ministry of munitions, overhauled by the auditor general, disclose several very remarkable items.

In one case, although the ledger showed £230,000 had for some months been due to be refunded by a firm under a contract since canceled, no active steps had been taken to recover this sum.

Upward of £500,000 was overpaid on one contract.

Overpayments involving over £250,000 were made to the same firm.

A contract ledger recorded payments of £1,400,000 only; the payments made totaled £4,700,000.

An abatement of £10,000 due from a firm in respect of a departure from contract conditions could not be traced.

One contractor was overpaid £111,362, and to the same firm £21,450 was issued, that sum having previously been paid.

The following table is given showing the extraordinary differences between estimates and actual costs in the erection of national factories, the first figure being the estimate, the second the cost:

	Estimate.	Cost.
A filling factory	£264,100	£1,153,000
A filling factory	632,800	2,200,000
A filling factory	250,000	915,000
A filling factory	350,000	781,000
A filling factory	200,000	626,000
A rolling mill	680,000	755,000
A projectile factory	627,000	900,000

There have been large stocks of defective shells owing to defects revealed at firing. Directions were given for the breaking up of some 3,000,000 complete rounds of 18-pounder ammunition. It was apparently impossible definitely to locate the fault in such a way as to justify a claim against the suppliers. The cost involved in breaking up the ammunition and in repairing the cartridge cases will be very considerable.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Graft in England does not justify graft in America.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman know of any graft? It is his duty to present it to the proper officials of this Government if he does. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I accept the statement of the gentleman. I know this: I know that the cantonments have cost much more than they ought to have cost. I know that there were delays in construction by reason of the fact that the longer it took to construct them the more they cost and the more the contractor got out of it. Everybody knows that. I know that criticism in the country has caused the department to abandon the cost-plus system

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, as I recall the facts, the percentage that was to be allowed would not permit a profit beyond a certain small percentage, and the total profit in any case was limited to a certain rather moderate figure. But I submit further that if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] knows of any case where contracts were delayed in order to make profits, as a good, loyal citizen it is his duty to call the attention of the prosecuting officers of the Government to such violation of the law. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Gentlemen will recall that when Gen. Liggett was before the committee, testifying touching this matter of profits, he stated that while some contracts allowed a profit of 10 per cent the actual profit received by all the contractors in toto was less than 4 per cent.

Mr. KAHN. I recall that testimony very well, and that is what I had reference to in the statement I have just made to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the case of the cantonment at American Lake, Tacoma, Wash., where a 10 per cent plus cost profit was allowed, the people themselves gave $2,000,000 worth of property to the Government, and the contract was so reduced that finally the profit was less than 3 per cent.

Mr. KAHN. I thank the gentleman for his information, and I want to say to this committee that the average profit on all of the cantonments, as stated before our Committee on Military Affairs, was practically 4 per cent.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. QUIN. I want to say that the gentleman from California has stated it exactly right. The gentleman from Kansas knows that if there have been overpayments or mistakes they have all been corrected. The cantonments have been constructed in good faith, the Government is prosecuting the war, and what does the gentleman want to dig up an old carcass for and disgruntle the patriotic people of America? I ask that in good faith.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, there was criticism in the beginning on account of lack of proper clothing for soldiers. I myself have believed that the criticism in many respects was justified. I think the officers of the Army were too much bound up with red tape. If they had cut the red tape in those terrible days of last winter when the thermometer was way below zero, if they had gone out and bought in the local markets warm heavy underclothing, socks, and overcoats, the country would have applauded and accepted their action. The Congress would have voted the funds to pay for those articles, and much suffering would have been saved. But at this time there is plenty of clothing for all the men that we now have in the Army. Indeed, we now have a large reserve on hand. No soldier has been sent to Europe at any time without a full equipment of everything he requires.

In regard to the aeroplane proposition, much time was lost in the beginning in trying to create an engine that could be standardized and whose parts could be multiplied many times, so that if the smallest part was destroyed it could be easily and readily replaced.

The Liberty engine was tried out for every possible defect. Let me call to the attention of the committee this fact: Your aeroplane starts from the ground where the thermometer registers, for example, 75°. In 12 minutes after it begins its flight it is 15,000 feet in the air, with the thermometer registering several degrees below zero. The changed conditions of the atmosphere naturally affect the metal in the machine, and all these problems have to be worked out carefully, so that there shall be no mistake.

The Liberty engine, I am informed, on the final test was taken to the top of Pikes Peak and was allowed to run there, I do not know how many hours, so as to be sure of its action in that high altitude.

But the production of the engines in this country was in a measure limited at times by the action of the cobelligerent nations.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentlemen yield?

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will let me finish this statement. For instance, the War Department received a cable dispatch saying that a foreign type of engine was desirable, and a factory in New Jersey, which was known, I believe, as the Dusenburg factory, was equipped entirely for the manufacture of the foreign engines. They had just been equipped to build Liberty engines, although they had not started to manufacture them. But they promptly stopped their work on the Liberty engines. It took some weeks to change the machinery, and just as they became ready to start the new work they received another cable saying that it was not desirable to build that foreign engine and they should go on and build the engines that it was originally intended they should build. Still later on another cablegram was received directing that work proceed on the foreign engine. That is some of the evidence before the Committee on Military Affairs, and assuredly we should not blame the manufacturers in this country on account of the conditions at that time. They were unforeseen conditions. We are at war, and during war it is the unforeseen condition that is most troublesome.

The Chief of Engineers told us that of the large amounts that were asked by him for his department, I think something like $892,000,000, that many things would have to be duplicated three and four and possibly six times. He explained, for instance, that the Engineer Department has run tracks right up to the trenches, so that the soldiers in the trenches can be furnished with necessary food, ammunition, and supplies. A charge or drive of the enemy might drive our forces back 5 miles, 10 miles, or even 20 miles.

The railroad tracks, the cars, and locomotives would all have to be abandoned, and as soon as our troops made a new stand new tracks would have to be laid immediately, new cars would have to be furnished immediately in order that the troops could still receive the necessary food, ammunition, and supplies. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What I wanted to ask was in reference to aeroplanes before the gentleman left that subject. What explanation was made to the committee why we have only two battle planes in France out of the $640,000,000?

Mr. KAHN. We never had that information before the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the information of the country and the public generally.

Mr. KAHN. Because some newspapers have chosen to publish that particular piece of misinformation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman state that there are more battle planes than have been published to the country by the investigation made in another body and statements made by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee in another body?

Mr. KAHN. I have not been able to follow all those matters carefully.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would be glad to know, and probably the country would be glad to know, that we had more battle planes as the result of the expenditure of the $640,000,000.

Mr. KAHN. Let me appeal to the gentleman's own common sense. The gentleman has read that the American fliers have been bringing down enemy planes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In French and English battle planes.

Mr. KAHN. No; battle planes owned by this country. We have 323 fighting battle planes on the other side. We have now on the other side quite a number made in this country and shipped abroad, but we have nearly always had fighting planes on the other side, made, it is true, on the other side, because they had the factories to construct them at a time when we had practically no factories in this country.

These battle planes have been used with remarkable success by our American fighters. They will be materially augmented in the future, I have no doubt. And they were paid for out of the appropriation of $640,000,000 that has been spoken of on this floor. Of the total sum for aviation, about $755,000,000, only about one-third has been paid out. The other two-thirds is still in the Treasury to be used in the payment of additional planes and such accessories as may be delivered to the Government from time to time. They have been contracted for, but have not been delivered as yet.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman just stated that only one-third of the $640,000,000 had been paid out.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] stated that $316,000,000 had been paid and that is more than one-half.

Mr. KAHN. I am speaking of the total amount allowed for the Signal Corps last year, which was $755,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. All that still remains is obligated, is it not?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; of course. And I want to say that more than what remains is obligated. The testimony before the committee was that in order to speed up they had been compelled to go out and contract for planes, plane materials, and engines, in the hope of securing speedy manufacture and prompt delivery of the new planes.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, this money we speak of as being obligated is for the purchase of aeroplanes both in this country and on the other side.

Mr. KAHN. Not only aeroplanes, but dirigible and stationary balloons.

Mr. SNYDER. That are to be delivered?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. And at the present time the understanding is that the manufacturers who are building these various types of equipment are delivering and are prepared to deliver from day to day in larger and larger quantities. Is not that a fact?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly; in ever-increasing quantities.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the aeroplane factories which we had in this country have been utilized to the best advantage in the manufacture of planes? My information is that the two largest factories—the Curtiss and the Standard factories—were for several months practically at a standstill, with nothing being done in them.

Mr. KAHN. I can tell the gentleman something about that from personal observation. When this country announced that it was going to manufacture aeroplanes on a large scale Washington was flooded with men who wanted to get into the game and who promised all kinds of things in the way of their ability to manufacture promptly if they could only get contracts. When the contracts were not forthcoming they would complain that the Curtiss company and the Wright company, the two companies that were actually in existence, were getting it all, and that no new company had any chance. So that my friend from New York seems to have been misinformed as to what was being done with the two companies that were then in existence.

Mr. HUSTED. I happened to meet a gentleman who had been at the Standard plant and at the Curtiss plant, immediately after he returned from an inspection of those plants, and he told me that when he was there, in one of those large factories, he saw but 10 planes that were approaching completion. They were 10 Bristol planes in the Curtiss plant, and he found about half the benches in that plant idle, with no workmen at the benches at all.

Mr. KAHN. I am under the impression, though possibly I am in error, that no Bristol planes have been completed as yet. Am I right about that?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I understand they are just beginning to have them produced now. They have not been approved up to date.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. For the sake of the RECORD, in order that there may be no mistake about the figures, I would like to put the correct figures in the RECORD in regard to the appropriations made for aircraft. It was not only $640,000,000 but it was something over $700,000,000.

Mr. KAHN. Seven hundred and fifty-five million dollars, I think.

Mr. McKENZIE. And on the 30th of April, 1918, there had been expended $316,517,000, which left a balance of $433,369,000.

Mr. KAHN. I thank the gentleman for that contribution to this colloquy.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I want to state partly in answer to my colleague from New York [Mr. HUSTED] that less than a month ago I went through one of the Curtiss plants at Buffalo, and at that time I think less than half of their capacity was being utilized in turning out aeroplanes, and a number of Bristols were then being put on the block to be tested, and that plant, I think, was not being operated in anything near its full capacity.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, in this connection I want to say that I hold no brief from the War Department. I have no desire to cover up anything or to apologize for any mistakes, but I believe it is the province of a Member of the House to give the facts truthfully and fairly and fearlessly.

There was another disappointing thing in connection with the manufacture of aeroplanes, and that was the question of lumber. It became a very serious question at the beginning. It was found necessary to get spruce lumber in large quantities. It might be supposed that every spruce tree that was felled would furnish necessary lumber, but that was not the case. The tree has to be of a certain grain, so that a number of trees might be felled before the right grain would be secured. The "I. W. W." in the West were fighting this Government's preparation for war. They committed notorious acts of sabotage. They broke the teeth on the saws that were used to cut this timber. They put emery dust into the oil that lubricated the bearings of the machinery in the mills.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. How many of those men have been sent to the penitentiary—any?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think that a single man was caught or arrested.

Mr. MADDEN. Have they prosecuted any of those men?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think they have captured any. But I want to say to the gentleman that there is a bill pending in this House for the giving of medals for efficient work done in connection with the war. The War Department sent Col. Disque to get out spruce lumber in the West. He found the "I. W. W." in control of the lumber camps.

He made inquiries and was told that many men had joined the I. W. W. simply on account of their desire to have some social life. They felt that here at least men got together and found some entertainment. Col. Disque asked them whether they would join an organization that he would found. I believe he called it "The Loyal Legion of Loggers." He got up his own ritual, and thousands of these lumbermen joined this new organization. It was founded in the territory occupied by the I. W. W., and I am informed now that the L. L. of L. have practically driven the I. W. W. from the field. That man, Col. Disque, deserves a medal for what he has done. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. For the purpose of information, would it be proper for the gentleman to state what the output now of the three character of planes is—the pursuit, the combat, and the bombing plane—per day and how they are going over to Europe? Would it be proper for him to state that?

Mr. KAHN. The figures were given me on Friday morning. I confess to my friend that they have escaped my memory, but we were told at the same time—for the committee was present when the statement was made at the war council up in the War Department Building—that in the vessels that have been going over these two or three weeks last past quite a number of planes were being shipped on every vessel.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have some figures here on that. Up to April 1, total number of bombing planes produced were 14; in the week of May 11 we produced 34; in the week ending May 18 we produced 37; so we are producing now very much more freely than before.

Mr. KAHN. I thank the gentleman for the statement.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. That is the bombing plane?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is the completed plane.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Now, as to the pursuit, the combat plane, does the gentleman have any figures on those?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; I have not. The Bristol fighter has just practically been approved, I understand.

Mr. MADDEN. One question, if the gentleman will permit. What is the life of a plane in active service; that is, the average life? I do not mean of any particular plane.

Mr. KAHN. It is only a few weeks, at most.

Mr. MADDEN. So that a plane put in actual service, say, the 1st of May and continued in service all during May would have to be renewed the 1st of June and a new plane substituted?

Mr. KAHN. Practically.

Mr. MADDEN. So the life of a plane is only 30 days, about?

Mr. KAHN. Practically that is so. It may be destroyed on the first occasion it goes into the air and it may last for many months, but it is all a matter of chance.

Mr. SNYDER. It has been stated here that England was producing about 5,000 aeroplanes per month and that France was producing about 5,000 per month.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman quoting me? If so, the gentleman is repeating what I said to him privately, but I did not make that statement. I said that England was producing about 3,000 and France about 2,000, making in all 5,000.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman's information in reference to the construction of aeroplanes lead him to confirm such a statement as that?

Mr. KAHN. I have no doubt that it is entirely correct. But that does not exceed the demands. It probably does not equal the demands, because the more men we can get into the air the more likelihood of victory for the allied forces. That is what this country had been led to believe and that is where the mistake has been made. We were told by the officers in the War Department that we would have machines in the air by the thousands; that we would drive the enemy, within a year, off the air; that we would blind the armies of the enemy, because, after all, the aeroplanes are the eyes of the Army.

As I have said, many unforeseen events contributed to the breakdown of the program. Take the question of linen. Linen has been the cloth used on the plane itself, on the wings.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Irish linen?

Mr. KAHN. Irish linen; yes. The supply became exhausted. There was not a yard of it to be had in this country, so the War Department was put to the expedient of inventing or devising some substitute for that material. They did invent a substitute. It is now being produced in great quantities, but naturally there was some delay before they were able to get that substitute. I am satisfied that from this time on the aeroplane program will proceed expeditiously.

My colleague on the committee from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] calls my attention to the question of lubricants. It has been found that practically the only oil that will not freeze when an aeroplane with a rapidly revolving propeller mounts 10,000 or 12,000 feet into the air is castor oil. It does not freeze; it keeps the bearings lubricated, and yet it is almost impossible to get the quantity of that oil that will be required. The farmers all over this country have been appealed to to raise the castor bean. I am inclined to believe that the Government itself is now taking up that matter, so that we ourselves will have to produce that lubricant.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. My understanding of the difficulty with the motor was that the lubricating section of the motor that was added to the Packard machine did not work, and it was found that that part of the Liberty motor had no place in the Packard machine and nothing would lubricate it except castor oil when it got up in the rarer atmosphere, and that because of that fact we were obliged to open castor-bean farms throughout the United States in order to raise the castor bean to make that oil.

If somebody had not displayed a selfishness in the make-up of the motor by insisting on having his lubricating section added to the Packard machine, no such condition would have arisen; and we would not have been put to the expedient of compelling the American people to wait until a crop of castor beans could be raised before we could put our motors in the field and have them lubricated.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. HICKS. I would like to make this statement: I think, in the last four weeks, probably, a substitute for oil has been found which utilizes 10 per cent of castor oil and 90 per cent of the raw oil for the use of the Liberty motor. And that comes to me from the highest authority, I think, and I believe it is a statement we can take as a fact.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope it is true, but the fact is just as I have stated, that we would not have had any trouble whatever in lubricating the Liberty motor if it had not been for the combination of conditions which forced the Government to accept the lubricating section of the machine that had no place on the machine itself.

Mr. WALDOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. WALDOW. If it is true that castor oil is the only oil we can use on our motors in this country, can the gentleman explain what grade of oil they are using over in France at the present time?

Mr. KAHN. No; I can not inform the gentleman; but I understand that castor oil is used on all machines where the propellers revolve very rapidly. It is not only the Liberty machine but any machine that has a propeller that revolves very rapidly that has to be lubricated with castor oil.

Mr. WALDOW. That is the point I was trying to make, to see if my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] was correct in his contention or not.

Mr. MADDEN. I am correct.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman [Mr. KAHN] has stated that certain kinds of rotary engines must have this kind of lubricant; that those that revolve very rapidly must have this particular kind of lubrication. And so in France engines of that type have to have that kind of oil. Other engines use other kinds of oil.

Mr. WALDOW. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. If it is not entirely out of line with the subject that we are discussing, and while talking about motors, has the gentleman from California heard anything about that mysterious force called "Garabed"?

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman that the Military Committee took no chances with that. They made the proposition to the inventor that he could call any two or more members of the committee to witness his exhibit, and that if he convinced them that he had something of value to the Government we would pass his bill, and that if he did not convince the committee they would not take any action on it. This was not satisfactory to the gentleman, and the Committee on Military Affairs had nothing further to do with the matter.

Mr. CANNON. I believe that no part of the $12,000,000,000 in this bill or the $18,000,000,000 or $20,000,000,000 appropriated last year—not one cent of it—has been paid to Mr. Garagossian.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is quite right about that. I sincerely hope that the inventor will make good, however.

Mr. MADDEN. So do I. I hope somebody will make good.

Mr. KAHN. But he would not exhibit before any members of our committee, and we thought he ought to be willing to do that before we took any chances on his proposition.

Mr. HARDY. I want to really understand whether or not on this particular matter some injected machine caused the requirement for castor oil or whether that is the case with all rapidly revolving machinery, whether it be the Liberty motor or anything else?

Mr. KAHN. I understand in all rapidly revolving machines castor oil is used.

Mr. HARDY. What I wanted to get is a clear answer to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that it was some special self-interest.

Mr. KAHN. It is only fair to say about the Liberty engine that Gen. Squier, when he was before our committee as Chief of the Signal Corps, stated that it was the desire of his department to evolve a standardized motor. It seems that Germany, of all the warring nations, has used practically one motor, the Mercedes. I believe in a later period of the war they evolved a second motor. But I feel that probably, while the Liberty motor was being evolved and developed, we might have gone ahead manufacturing some motor that had been recognized as a success on the European battle fields.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Did we not in effect do that by sending our material and men over to Europe and making contracts there for the old kinds of machines?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is quite right. We did that. Although I want to say that the European governments, of course, are so hard pressed in this war that the demand upon their own factories for their own planes is very great, and it has been a hardship for them to manufacture machines for us.

Mr. HARDY. But was not part of our appropriation expended in sending material and men over there for that work?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, yes; there is no question about that.

Mr. MADDEN. Just a statement in connection with that. My information is, based on thorough investigation, that the motor-plane factories of England and France are possible of expansion to nearly twice their present capacity. They have the motive power with which to work factories of more than twice the size they now are, and all that is necessary for us to do in order to get all the planes we need is to supply them with the fabricated steel and the spruce which we have contracted to supply and have not supplied, and have thereby retarded the expansion of these factories.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, I do not know the source of the gentleman's information, but when the matter was before the committee the committee was informed by the officers of the War Department that it was a hardship on the foreign governments to manufacture machines for our Government.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman made his statement a little while ago to the effect that the Dusenburg Motor Co., of Elizabeth, N. J., had been manufacturing a foreign machine.

Mr. KAHN. No; it had been preparing to manufacture some machines for these countries, and then a cable came to have them stop the manufacture of that machine.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Why?

Mr. KAHN. Because the belligerent nations wanted to try out a type of machine that they wanted, and they thought we could manufacture it over here more expeditiously than they could manufacture it over there.

We then got that factory into full preparation to turn out that particular engine, and just about the time it was ready to begin the manufacture of those machines a halt was called and none of them were manufactured.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. I know that my colleague wants to be entirely correct in that statement, which he has made before here.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I called up the War Department and was informed by them that they were still manufacturing the Bugati machine at the Dusenburg factory, and that the order has never been countermanded, and that the Bugati has been substituted for the Liberty motor, and is being turned out by the French Government.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is true.

Mr. KAHN. I think that is true; but the original order—and I think the other members of the Committee on Military Affairs will bear me out in what I have stated—was to turn that plant over to the manufacture of the engines desired by our cobelligerents, and just as they were ready to begin the manufacture of those engines the order was countermanded, at least for the time being, and all that time was lost. That was cited to our committee as one of the things that contributed to the delay in the turning out of engines. I think the chairman and other members of the committee who were present will bear me out in that statement. They were present when the statement was made.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman has the Dusenburg Co. mixed up with some other company. I took the trouble to call up Mr. Potter's office, and that was the information I have just given.

Mr. KAHN. I asked Mr. Potter specifically about the Dusenburg case in the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. It was stated that the French Government had substituted for the Bugati motor the Liberty motor. Now, I understood that the French Government had never proceeded with the manufacture of the Bugati motor, and that that order was countermanded. I understand they are still manufacturing the Bugati motor.

Mr. KAHN. When Mr. Potter was before the committee a few days ago I asked him whether the statement about the Dusenburg Co. was correct, and he said that it was.

Mr. ANTHONY. Has not the gentleman got the Dusenburg Co. mixed up in this instance with the Curtiss Co., which started out early to manufacture Spad machines, and that that order was countermanded after they had gotten well along in the manufacture of Spads, and they substituted the Dusenburg?

Mr. KAHN. No. The gentleman at my right [Mr. CRAGO] was present, and he heard Mr. Potter's statement as I have substantially stated it.

Mr. CRAGO. One was an order for the manufacture of a certain type of plane which had been countermanded by Gen. Pershing, saying that they no longer needed that type of plane, and one factory was stopped for production, and one month later an order came in for that particular type. The whole conversation was on the motor that the Dusenburg plant was manufacturing.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am informed that the Aircraft Production Office has just stated over the phone that they are no longer making the Liberty motor but the Bugati motor.

Mr. SNYDER. Are they not turning out Liberty motors?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What inference is there to be deduced from the statement that they are turning out the Liberty motors instead of the Bugati?

Mr. CRAGO. They had not started to produce the others, but Mr. Potter informed the committee that it was at the specific request of the French Government that the manufacture of the Bugati motor was undertaken by the French Government.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. I happen to know something about this, because the Dusenburg people established a plant in my district and took the machinery down to Elizabeth, N. J., to manufacture the Bugati motor. I think they are still manufacturing that motor.

Mr. KAHN. I have no doubt they are manufacturing it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McKENZIE. In order that this matter may be straightened out I will read a few questions and answers brought out in that matter before our committee. I read:

Mr. ANTHONY. I have read statements to the effect that the War Department had canceled those contracts for Liberty motors and substituted in their places orders for the manufacture of foreign motors.

Mr. POTTER. That is not so.

Mr. ANTHONY. The statement was made—did you place an order with the Dusenburg Co.?

Mr. POTTER. I believe so.

Mr. ANTHONY. Why was that order canceled?

Mr. POTTER. It must have been before my time, because I never heard of it. I can tell you why it was canceled. It was canceled because the French Government was very enthusiastic to have us build a motor called the Bugati, and the Bugati has more power, or is supposed to have more power, than the Liberty motor.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is a lighter motor, is it not?

Mr. POTTER. No; it is a heavier motor, but it is rated at 511 horsepower, while the Liberty is rated at 400 horsepower. The Bugati motor weighs over 900 pounds and the Liberty motor weighs 800 pounds. But the Bugati motor has some very peculiar qualities, and the French were very desirous to have us make it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Are those for the French Government or for our own?

Mr. POTTER. They were very anxious to have us do it.

Mr. ANTHONY. It was considered more desirable to use the Bugati, in view of the recommendation of the French Government, than the Liberty motor?

Mr. POTTER. I presume this is why they wanted it—and the Signal Corps was anxious to accept their suggestion—they thought the Dusenburg Motor Co. would be a good concern to make it, as they had not got actually started. I presume that was the reason.

Mr. ANTHONY. Notwithstanding the claims put forth for the Liberty motor, we yielded to the desire of the French Government in that case?

Mr. POTTER. To put in one factory for the development of another motor.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in addition to that, that the last time Mr. Potter was before the committee I again called his attention to this case, and he again stated that the effort to produce the Liberty motor in the Dusenburg factory had been stopped and that the machinery had been changed so as to produce this other motor.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I think the House has gained the impression that a large amount of material has been shipped abroad for the manufacture of airplanes?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. And that those shipments have been going on for some time. Now, as I understand, as a matter of fact, we have shipped comparatively little material and the earliest shipment made was only a few weeks ago, so that the largest part of these airplanes that have been made for our use in France have been made from materials obtained over there.

Mr. KAHN. I believe the testimony shows, as my friend on the committee from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] reminds me, that four-fifths of the spruce that is now cut for airplanes goes to European countries and only one-fifth is used in this country.

There is a peculiar thing, even about the spruce. It has to be treated in a peculiar way. It is what they call "laminated" before it is used.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended as long as he desires, within one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California be extended one hour, or as much thereof as he desires to use. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. The spruce is cut into thin strips, and then the strips are glued together with a specially prepared glue so as to prevent the warping of the wood. That also takes some time in the preparation of the wood for the machines.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman answer one question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. SNYDER. Giving the Signal Corps credit for all they are entitled to, and giving the manufacturers in the country credit for all they are entitled to, is it not a fact that if it had not been for the facilities offered us in England or France we would not have any aeroplane service at all on the fighting line now?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is entirely correct in that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question on a slightly different branch of the subject?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I observe that there are some 12,000 officers in the Aviation Corps and only about 4,000 fliers.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is not that a relatively small number of fliers as compared to the total number of officers in the Aviation Corps?

Mr. KAHN. No. The testimony before the committee is that the moment a machine lands it requires quite a force to inspect and repair it. I believe the testimony shows that about 30 men are required for each aeroplane. They rush forward to seize the machine as soon as it lands and inspect its every part, even to the minutest. Of course, these men must have officers over them. I believe the testimony before the committee is that there are a large number of officers in what they call the ground, or nonflying, service. The men go to training schools and learn how every part of the engine and the machine are manufactured and put together. They must take intensive training for anywhere from three to six months. Of course, when a man goes into the air the machine has to be as nearly perfect as human ingenuity can make it. So every little part of the machine is minutely scanned by a large force of mechanicians and laborers, with officers in command of those mechanicians and laborers. That is why there is a large force of officers in the corps. They are nonflying officers, although I am told that an effort will be made to teach many of these officers the art of flying, so as to make them more efficient.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman tell me how many of these 4,000 fliers are really expert fliers, in the same class as some of these English, French, and Italian officers who have lately been here—competent to fight in actual battle?

Mr. KAHN. Naturally, that is a hard question to answer. Every man who has been commissioned is able to manipulate a machine in the air, to fly, and he must be a competent flier or he would not have received his commission. He is a cadet before he is commissioned. He is taught to fly while he is a cadet and not a commissioned officer. The moment he becomes proficient in flying a machine he receives his commission.

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is a great deal of difference between being able to fly a machine and being able to do those various things that they say are absolutely necessary in battle. I did not know whether the gentleman could say approximately what proportion of our fliers are expert in that way.

Mr. KAHN. I presume it is all a matter of practice and experience. These so-called "stunts" come only after a man has absolute confidence in himself in the air. Probably some men acquire the knack of doing those things almost immediately, while others learn them only after some considerable time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But it is stated that the very object of these exhibitions here by Col. Lee, of the British Army, and by Flashaire, of the French Army, was to show that a man who could not successfully do these various stunts would be absolutely helpless in an actual battle.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I suggest that that must apply, of course, to solo flying, because observation, bombing, reconnoissance, and other similar work is somewhat more commonplace and not so spectacular.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course, that is true.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And still it is all combat flying.

Mr. KAHN. Observation work, of course, is just as important in its way as the other, because a man must have the ability to fly his machine across the line for the purpose of getting photographs of the terrain over which the enemy is operating. A man must be a skilled flier in order to do that, although I take it he would not have to be able to do those spectacular feats which we admire so much, and which we can see from this building every afternoon.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman state approximately how many fliers there are on the allied side?

Mr. KAHN. I asked that specific question at one of the meetings of our committee with the War Council, and our Chief of Staff informed us that the cobelligerent nations would prefer that that be not known.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that they are doing these stunts, like the falling leaf, and the spiral dip, and so forth, in our Aviation Service?

Mr. KAHN. All our fliers are being taught these things, and I rather think that before they are commissioned they have to show some expertness in those particulars.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Of these 4,000 fliers, are any of them privates? Are they not all officers? Do they not get a commission when they are able to do these stunts?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; they are all commissioned officers.

Mr. WALSH. So that none of the 4,000 fliers listed in the report are privates in the Aviation Corps?

Mr. KAHN. No; they are all commissioned officers. The pilots and fliers in the Aviation Corps are all commissioned officers. I should state, however, that there are some civilians who are employed as instructors in flying connected with the corps. The privates in the corps are the mechanicians, of whom I have spoken, the laborers, motor-truck drivers, and men who perform services of that kind.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. We created the grade of aviator below the grade of commissioned officer. Are we utilizing that grade?

Mr. KAHN. No; we are not utilizing that grade. I proposed that provision in the national defense act myself, and it was adopted by Congress; but when this war began we had not received any great number of applications for that position, and so the department established the position of cadets. Cadets are men who apply for duty with the Flying Corps, and so long as they continue as students they are listed as cadets. When they graduate they are given commissions as second lieutenants. And by the bye, there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction expressed about that very proposition.

At the beginning of the war, or soon after we got into it, a number of young men in this country who desired to go into the flying section of the Aviation Corps were told that if they would go abroad for their instruction and training they would be commissioned as first lieutenants. A number of applicants were selected from each of the training camps and they were sent abroad. When they got on the other side and took the training they were finally given commissions as second lieutenants. It created a great deal of dissatisfaction.

In the meantime, men who went into the corps on this side, I understand, have been promoted much more rapidly than those who went abroad to be trained in the art of flying. It has given rise to some dissatisfaction in the corps, and I hope that something may be done to straighten out the matter, because if any promises were held out to the young men to go into this corps to the effect that they would be commissioned as first lieutenants by going overseas and taking the training there the Government ought to keep its promises to these young men.

Mr. LONGWORTH. One question more and then I will not further embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is not embarrassing me.

Mr. LONGWORTH. About how many machines ought there to be for each aviator?

Mr. KAHN. Opinions vary. When we first took up the matter we were told that to support one machine in the air there ought to be three additional machines on the ground; that each serviceable machine really represented four machines in all; or, in other words, that a fully equipped squadron, which is made up of 18 machines, should in fact have a total of 72 machines.

But recently, before the committee, I asked one of the officials of the department whether there had been any change in that respect, and my recollection is that he stated that, all told, now six machines were required as a basis, so that a squadron now ought to have about 108 machines.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, roughly speaking, our 4,000 men ought to have something like 24,000 machines.

Mr. KAHN. Twenty-four thousand aeroplanes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have taken up more time than I had intended; but there is just one thing that I want to call to the attention of the committee before I close.

This bill calls for approximately $12,000,000,000, and we are just entering on the second year of the war. It is hoped by every loyal American that in the coming year our military forces will be largely augmented. It is to be hoped that the heavy ordnance and the large quantities of materials and supplies that will be required for larger armies will be forthcoming. This practically is but the beginning of the terrific drain that will be made upon the financial resources of the country.

It was stated yesterday by the President that we must prepare a new revenue bill to provide for the increased expense. I hope that if there is any graft in this country by anyone who is turning out any material for this Government, or who is furnishing any supplies to this Government, that there will be prompt indictment and swift punishment for the malefactor. [Applause.] In this extremity, when the country is fighting for its rights, and possibly for its very life, there must be no graft and no excessive profiteering at the expense of this Government. [Applause.]

I sincerely hope that another committee in this House will bring in such provisions in the new revenue legislation which it will propose that will make it extremely hazardous for any man in this country to levy excessive profits in this crisis at the expense of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from California or the gentleman in charge of the bill a question.

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DENISON. Some days ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] made a speech on the subject of our military forces, in which he gave the number of men in the Army, the number of men actually sent to Europe on the western front, the number that had been taken during the month of April and the number during this month, and gave figures that were very interesting. I notice it caused a great deal of comment all over the country. Since that time the Secretary of War has given out a statement cautioning the people of the country against accepting statements by anybody except those that came from the Secretary of War. I would like the chairman to state whether the figures that were given out by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] the other day were in any sense authorized by the Military Affairs Committee or any department of the Government, and whether or not they can be relied upon.

Mr. DENT. I will say that they were not authorized by the Military Committee of the House. Whether they were authorized by the War Department I can not state. I will state frankly to the gentleman and to the House that we entered into a consideration of the appropriation bill and we agreed to consider it in executive session, and that there should not go out anything except that which was authorized by the committee through the chairman.

Mr. DENISON. I was at home recently making some speeches on the war during the liberty-loan campaign, and I gave out something in the nature of a statement as to the number of men we had over there and what I thought was the number of men that we were transporting each week. I had gotten my information in a general way, and it was not exactly authentic, but the newspapermen came and said, "We are glad to have the information, because we have been forbidden to publish it."

I was wondering, if the newspapers of the country have been forbidden to publish this and the people have been forbidden to speak about it, why a member of the committee should come before the House and give out the whole thing.

Mr. DENT. The newspapers certainly published it.

Mr. DENISON. Since he gave out the statement, of course.

Mr. DENT. I do not know whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] is here, but if the matter is to be discussed, I think it ought to be discussed in his presence.

Mr. DENISON. The point about his remarks particularly interesting was as to the number of men that we are carrying over there each month. I was wondering whether that was correct.

Mr. DENT. I have no statement to make with regard to that, and if any question is to be raised about the gentleman's remarks I think it ought to be made when he is here. I am perfectly willing to make a statement about it when he is present. Mr. Chairman, I would like to put these figures into the RECORD as coming officially from the office of The Adjutant General to the Military Committee. At the time that we declared war we had an Army in the Regular Establishment of officers and men of a little over 127,000. We have now an Army of 2,037,000. The estimates in this appropriation bill are based upon an Army of 3,000,000 men by the end of July, 1919. The average for the Army and Navy is 2,600,000 men and 145,000 officers. The number of staff officers is 64,522 and in addition to that there are 6,881 staff officers not on active duty, and, therefore, not drawing pay. The number of line officers of the line is 75,611, and in addition to that there are 1,314 officers of the Reserve Corps not on active duty.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1919:

Contingencies of the Army: All contingent expenses of the Army not otherwise provided for and embracing all branches of the military service, including the office of the Chief of Staff; for all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, including the employment of translators and exclusive of all other personal services in the War Department, or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., or in the Army at large, but impossible to be anticipated or classified; to be expended on the approval and authority of the Secretary of War, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, including the payment of a per diem allowance not to exceed $4, in lieu of subsistence, to employees of the War Department traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated posts, $250,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the item where it provides $4 per diem allowance. Is that correct? It has been usual to pay $3 allowance, has it not, for officials of the Government traveling outside of the city of Washington on official business?

Mr. DENT. That is on account of the increase in the cost of living.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. That provision has been in the bill heretofore; we have been allowing $4 per day for some years back.

Mr. DENT. That increase was made a year or two ago.

Mr. KAHN. Three years ago.

Mr. MADDEN. I just wanted to inquire about it. I thought it was a change in the law.

Mr. DENT. No; no change in the law.

Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] indicated that he intended to be liberal in the discussion of this bill under the five-minute rule. I ask unanimous consent—and I desire to talk on the bill—that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, some time in July, 1917, I introduced a bill (H. R. 5410) to render possible the return of the bodies of our soldier dead to their home burial grounds in a sanitary and recognizable condition.

That bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5410) to render possible the return of the bodies of our soldier dead to their home burial grounds in a sanitary and recognizable condition.

Whereas the articles of convention for the purpose of mitigating the evils inseparable from war agreed upon at the convention concluded at Geneva, Switzerland, on the 22d day of August, 1864, known as the Geneva Convention, as well as the articles of convention for the amelioration of the condition of the wounded of the armies of the field concluded at Geneva, Switzerland, on the 6th day of July, 1906, known as the International Red Cross Convention, were limited solely to matters and things relating to the care of the sick and wounded excepting only to the protection of the dead from robbery and illtreatment and the identification found upon the bodies of the dead; and

Whereas the purposes of the corporation known as the American Red Cross, a corporation incorporated by act of Congress approved January 5, 1905 (33 Stat., p. 599), is to furnish volunteer aid to the sick and wounded of armies in time of war, in accordance with the spirit and conditions of the conference of Geneva, and does not undertake to provide for the care of the dead; and

Whereas there has been incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia a volunteer organization known as American Purple Cross Association, the active membership of which is limited solely to those who have made the professional care of the dead their life work; and

Whereas the object of the said association is to furnish volunteer aid in recovering, caring for, preserving, transporting, and burying the bodies of those who die in the military or naval service of the United States; and

Whereas the said association has offered itself as an auxiliary to the Quartermaster Corps of the United States Army for the purpose of rendering a trained professional service in the care of the dead similar to the service rendered by the American Red Cross to the Medical Department of the Army in the care of the sick and wounded; and

Whereas the said association has offered to raise, equip, train, and maintain at its own expense such units of embalmers as may be necessary, and further has offered to provide automobile service for such necessary units, to the end that the bodies of our soldier dead may be scientifically embalmed and permanently preserved, so that eventually they may be returned to their home burial grounds in a sanitary and recognizable condition: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept the said offer of the American Purple Cross Association and to avail himself of the said service subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That the expenses incident to this service shall be borne by the American Purple Cross Association.

The bill became known as the Purple Cross bill. It is fair to the House and to the organizers of the Purple Cross movement also to say that a great deal of correspondence has resulted from the introduction of the bill and from the desire of the embalmers and undertakers of the United States to have it passed. The bill contemplated the introduction into the Army of a volunteer service somewhat akin to that of the Red Cross, the idea being that whereas the Red Cross is an organization which ministers to the sick and the wounded, the Purple Cross would undertake to preserve the bodies of the soldiers who fall in battle or die in the field, in order that they might be returned to their relatives in a sanitary and recognizable condition for decent burial in home burial grounds. Against the bill it has been suggested that there was a mercenary purpose behind it and that the enforcement of it might inure to the advantage of the embalmers and undertakers. Before introducing the bill I satisfied myself that there was no advantage the embalmers and undertakers could derive from the passage of the bill and the establishment of the Purple Cross except that bodies would be intrusted to them in the regular way when the Army or Navy delivered them back to the shores of the United States. In other words, if there was any advantage that an embalmer or undertaker might derive from this organization it would be only such as he would derive in the ordinary way through his employment by members of the family to preserve the body or conduct a funeral.

The study of embalming is interesting, dating back, as it does, to the preservative methods of the Egyptians. They had their way of preserving bodies, but in recent times, times of so-called civilization, the nations at war have made little scientific advancement in the matter of embalming. The United States apparently has taken the lead in this matter; but modern warfare in foreign lands does not contemplate the exertion of any great effort to do much for the soldier hero after he is dead. It has even been suggested that the quicker the body is disposed of the better it is for those who survive. That is the harsh military view.

During the great Civil War in the United States bodies much sought after following the war were lost upon either side. Confederate dead were dropped in the wilderness and Union dead in the mountain fastnesses. But after the war closed efforts were made by relatives on one side or the other to recover the remains with a view of giving them decent burial. Men and women have a natural interest in their kin and the desire to preserve the remains of loved ones, or at least to mark their final resting places, is certainly commendable. It is neither unnatural nor improper, and it is certainly intensely human, for the father or the mother, or the brother or the sister, who has given up a son or a brother to the service of the country, who has submitted to the sacrifice of a life, to desire to have the body returned for decent interment or to receive such reverence as may be paid even modestly to the memory of a hero.

Gentlemen may look askance at the suggestion that we can introduce the element of humanity into warfare, but I am inclined to think that even the soldier, stubborn and stern as he may be, has some touch of sympathy in his make-up for the mother, the wife, or the child who is afflicted and despoiled by the ruthlessness of war.

Certainly it is not unfair to suggest to a great department, charged with the keeping of millions of lives of our men, that some effort shall be made at least to preserve the bodies of those who die in order that those who loved them may regain possession of them at some time or another.

The advocates of the Purple Cross unhesitatingly declare that it would be perfectly feasible and practicable to preserve the bodies of our dead heroes in France. It was in evidence before the Committee on Military Affairs, which courteously gave a hearing on this matter, that bodies could be preserved under the modern embalming system for an almost indefinite period, There was some testimony that bodies had been preserved, for the purpose of evidence, for 10, 12, and 15 years. The thought underlying this Purple Cross movement was that men volunteering their services, contributing of their own funds, buying their own uniforms, contributing their own equipment and their own automobiles, their own scientific instruments and fluids, would go to France or England, or wherever our troops may be, and in the event of some dying or being killed would preserve the bodies, not necessarily for immediate shipment home but to be laid away so that when the ships were ready, or after the war, the bodies might be returned to the relatives in the United States for decent burial. The Committee on Military Affairs, following its usual course, conferred with the Department of War upon this subject and found the department unfavorable to it. I think there are members of the committee who were entirely sympathetic to the proposition and who believed in it, but who believed in the regular order and were inclined to think that no such measure should pass without the indorsement of the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War expressed himself to the Committee on Military Affairs and to others. He wrote sympathetically and congratulated those who had offered their services in this way. That originally was as far as the department would go.

In other words, the military view of this matter of preserving American bodies that might fall in a foreign land was that to establish any system looking to their recovery and their preservation would be in the nature of impedimenta, not to be encouraged.

The Red Cross continues its operations. That deals, of course, with the living. The Purple Cross was intended to deal with the dead, and so far as the dead were concerned that was the end of it. The War Department view was that while it might sympathize with the relatives of dead soldiers, unfortunately it did not have time to pick up the remains of the dead and preserve them for home burial.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. DENT. It is only fair to state the Secretary of War made his recommendation upon this proposition upon the recommendation of experienced Army officers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly. I think the Secretary of War, while sympathetic, deferred, of course, to the judgment of skilled men of war. I think it is fair to him to say that.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman state whether or not the War Department is doing anything at all to preserve the bodies of soldiers to be returned afterwards?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The War Department has adopted a system which they call the "graves-registration service," and has put that service in charge, I think, of a chaplain of the Army. The function of that service apparently is to appear as speedily as possible wherever a dead soldier may be, check up his body, give him a marker probably, and pass him on with a few kind words. That is all there is to it. His body remains where it falls in France.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENISON. The reason I asked that question was a young man in the district of my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] died in France and his parents wanted his body returned here, and I happened to call upon The Adjutant General's office, and I was informed that precautions were being taken so the body could be brought over after the close of the war. I was just wondering in reference to that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am about to give the gentleman the very latest information on that subject. I do not think it is intended to bring the bodies home.

Mr. McKENZIE. I understand the gentleman does not intend to intimate that the Secretary of War or the Army officers or the Committee on Military Affairs are governed in any way by no feeling of humanity or from an inhuman instinct, but from the fact it is absolutely impracticable to do the thing this organization desires to do?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have stated my belief that the Secretary of War is sympathetic personally, and I have also stated, so far as I have observed, that the members of the Committee on Military Affairs are likewise sympathetic, but some of them regard the proposition of preserving and returning the bodies as impractical, and feel they should be guided by the skilled men of war; that is to say, men in the field who have charge of the welfare and the safety of the fighting forces. Some time ago I asked the Secretary of War for an interview on this subject in order that we might come to some final determination of it, so far as his official action was concerned. As a result of that interview, which lasted for an hour, it was decided that Gen. Pershing for a second or third time should be consulted upon this question. Gen. Pershing had already indicated that the graves-registration service might not be altogether the best thing when the exigencies of war demanded the quick movement of troops, and he had disapproved of the Purple Cross.

In other words, gentlemen, as the practical soldier in the field sees it, you may yield your boy up to the draft; you may send him from your home; you may sacrifice the time and care you have given to his training and education; you may put him in the ranks at $30 a month; you may live in the hope and expectation that he will return to you and be an honor and an ornament to your home or to the city or the State from which he hailed, but if he has the misfortune to die, then, in the language of George H. Boker, all you can say is:

Lay him low, lay him low,
In the clover or the snow;
What cares he, he can not know;
Lay him low.

It is the end of it. It is the end of the boy in whom you have placed your hopes and expectations. He has gone from you and he is dead. What does the Army care? What does the world care? You miss your boy, but still that makes no difference. He is dead. You have nothing but the memory left.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. I do not think the gentleman wants to leave the impression that that is the purpose of the thing. It would be for the saving of other young lives.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is to be considered. The gentleman was a soldier himself, and a good one. He fought in the Philippines, and he knows what it is to command men, to save men, if you please, but he also knows what it is to hear the appeals of the fathers and mothers back home who hope and expect to have their boys return to them.

Why, gentlemen, on one occasion I saw Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, come over to my city to pay homage to the memory of two boys who were among the first to die down there at Vera Cruz. They were poor boys; they had not been conspicuous in the community; but they died for their country at Vera Cruz, and the President came over to honor them and to say kind words to the widowed mother of one of them. But their caskets could not be opened, and their mothers could not see the faces of these boys. They were encased in the Stars and Strips, and it was a glorious funeral, but the truth of the matter was that their caskets could not be opened. Their bodies, which might have been embalmed and preserved, were unfit to be seen.

I could produce here, if I had the time, letters from men in different parts of this country who have been called upon to open caskets in order that loving relatives might once again before eternity look upon the faces of those whom they cherished, but it could not be done. The proud forms they once beheld were putrid. They were already the prey of the worms. Mr. Chairman, those bodies could have been preserved. They could have been brought back in recognizable condition. They obtained decent home interment, but their relatives never dared to look upon them even for the purposes of identification.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not finding fault with the Committee on Military Affairs. It must be guided by the wise heads of the Military Establishment. But in order to show that there is something human about this proposition, that it ought not to be turned aside lightly, that we who are flesh and blood ourselves should have some consideration for the flesh and blood of those who go forth in battle never to return, I shall read a letter. It came to me this morning, and it is a coincidence that I should receive this letter at the very moment that the Secretary of War forwarded to me a cablegram from Gen. Pershing on this subject. When I have read the letter and the cablegram I am willing to leave the matter with you, because it seems to me I shall then have done as much as may be expected of me to bring this matter to public attention. I can not force the passage of a bill requiring these soldier bodies to be preserved. I can not induce the Committee on Military Affairs to do anything the War Department does not want to do, but I can at least call attention to the human side of this great question of the kinship of Americans if not the kinship of the nations.

I read the following letter:

PHILADELPHIA, May 27, 1918.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: We, the parents of Capt. Frederick David Clair, United States Medical Corps, killed in France a few days ago, most earnestly and respectfully beg your assistance in having his body returned to us at the earliest possible moment.

There is a bill before Congress authorizing the Purple Cross to embalm bodies of our soldier dead and to make this service possible, but in the meantime may we beg that you will take this matter up with the War Department and do all that is possible to give us this last comfort and satisfaction, and that by your assistance in the passage of suitable legislation you will facilitate the similar service to parents of those others who in the future lay down their lives for their country?

Yours, very truly,

HENRY CLAIR.

That is from the father of Capt. Clair, one of my constituents, who was killed in France last week.

Gentlemen, that is an appeal to a Member of Congress such as many of you will receive. I have received other appeals of this kind, because I have taken some interest in this effort to preserve the dead; but you will have numerous appeals of this kind from your constituents, asking you to help bring back the body of some one who was loved by those whom you respect in the districts you represent.

That letter from Mr. Clair came to me this morning. I felt it was opportune to bring it up to-day. It is the appeal of the parents of a brave young American officer killed in France, begging for an opportunity of looking again upon his face and to lay him away in the family burial ground. But with the same mail came the answer to that appeal—not specifically, but as affecting any and all appeals of the kind.

I shall put the correspondence in the RECORD. It contains the reply of Gen. Pershing to a cablegram of Adj. Gen. McCain asking if it is possible or advisable that such an organization as is contemplated by my bill, no matter what its name, but looking to the preservation of the bodies and their return may be properly instituted in the Army.

Here it is:

"WAR DEPARTMENT,
"Washington, May 27, 1918.

"DEAR MR. MOORE: Confirming our conversation this afternoon over the telephone in regard to the proposed legislation on embalming bodies of soldiers who die in France, I beg to hand you herewith a copy of an inquiry cabled to Gen. Pershing (No. 1293, par. 8), together with his reply (1162, par. 6).

"Very truly, yours,

"F. P. KEPPEL,

"MAY 25, 1918.

"MEMORANDUM FOR THE THIRD ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

"1. These papers relate to the question of embalming the remains of soldiers who die in France.

"2. At your request a cablegram (copy herewith) was sent to Gen. Pershing requesting his opinion in the matter.

"3. His reply (cablegram 1162, par. 6) is herewith.

"H. P. McCAIN,

"PERSHING,
"Am. Ex. Force, France:

"No. 1293, paragraph 8. Legislation now before Congress looking to embalming all bodies of soldiers in France who die in hospitals or are brought behind lines for burial. Your recommendation is requested as to desirability of such legislation in view of character and location of conflict.

"Paragraph 6. For the Chief of Staff. With reference to paragraph 8, your cablegram 1293, proposed legislation not desirable. Due to conditions beyond our control, it is ordinarily impracticable to embalm bodies anywhere in the theater of operations. It would be wise for us here to conform to the customs of our allies in this respect. The additional noncombatant personnel and additional supplies necessary to put into effect proposed legislation are factors to be considered.

"PERSHING."

That is the end of the story, gentlemen. I presume the Secretary of War will stand by Gen. Pershing. I think if I were Secretary of War I probably would do the same thing. But I wish to observe in passing, and before leaving this subject, that, though it may be expedient, it is a cold-blooded proposition to take the sons of American fathers and mothers away from their homes, away from their firesides, rush them into war, which is for liberty and democracy, to be sure, have them shot up—and they are the real heroes, those who die and do not come back—and then, when their bodies have been thrown into the ditches, adopting the course of the allies, refuse their American relatives the chance to recover and decently bury them. I repeat, it is a cold-blooded proposition but if it is required by the exigencies of war, we must submit. But there should be no deception about it; those who are going forth to battle, to yield up their lives on foreign soil, should understand the seriousness of their undertaking. They are doing brave and patriotic work, but the supreme test is not all. Those who fall may not expect to be returned to the land they love. Even their mortal remains shall not know the places where they once roamed as free-hearted American boys. It may be no monument for them, not even the humble inscription we are wont to engrave on common marble for those in civil life who pass away. It is the somber contribution they make to the world's welfare. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word and asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to pay a tribute of respect at this time to the nonpartisan, loyal support which has been given to these great measures by the men of Congress on both sides of this aisle. There is nothing more heartening at this time to the American people than that unanimity of sentiment and unanimity of loyalty which prevails among Representatives of the right sort. As a recent example of that I want to read to the House a little extract that I noticed in a paper from a speech of our blind colleague, Mr. SCHALL, of Minnesota, made recently, I think, in this city. The Minnesota Member is a man whom we all respect and admire, and who commands the complete confidence of this House because of the fearlessness of his opinions. The newspaper report of his speech is as follows:

"I believe that God has placed his hand on the head of President Wilson as a leader of nations. We as a Nation must have no other thought; we must stand back of that man as a unit."

These statements of Congressman THOMAS D. SCHALL were made in an address on war affairs at the Calvary Baptist Church last night. The blind Minnesotan admitted that he had long been an opponent of Wilsonian policies and told how war had changed his attitude. He is a Republican.

"Two years ago I opposed President Wilson with all the strength I possessed, because of his Mexican policy," said the Minnesota Congressman. "I did not know then what I know now.

"I believe he was chosen because he is peculiarly fitted to master the peculiar circumstances of this great crisis," said the legislator, in closing a eulogy of the Chief Executive.

Those words, coming at this time from one who is politically an opponent of the President, and following the great speech which the President made yesterday upon the absolute necessity of Congress putting aside all idea of politics and devoting itself wholly and single-heartedly to the work of winning this war, must be of great encouragement and a reflection of the true spirit of the American people in uniting against a foreign foe without the slightest division of party or partisan sentiment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Coast Artillery School, Fort Monroe, Va.: For incidental expenses of the school, including chemicals, stationery, printing, and binding; hardware; materials; cost of special instruction of officers detailed as instructors; employment of temporary, technical, or special services; extra-duty pay to soldiers necessarily employed for periods of not less than 10 days as artificers on work in addition to and not strictly in line with their military duties, such as carpenters, blacksmiths, draftsmen, printers, lithographers, photographers, engine drivers, telegraph operators, teamsters, wheelwrights, masons, machinists, painters, overseers, laborers; for office furniture and fixtures, machinery, motor trucks, and unforeseen expenses, $12,000.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, there has been some reference in this discussion to criticism of the war program, and I wish to refer somewhat to criticism; some of it is constructive and some of it maliciously destructive. There has been a new publication coming to the desks of Members of Congress and circulated no doubt largely throughout the United States, called "The North American Review's War Weekly," by George Harvey. It is edited by Mr. Harvey, or at least that is indicated by the title of the publication. The North American Review has been one of America's standard publications, and therefore what this particular publication publishes receives weight in public opinion because of its name.

I find on page 4, of the issue of May 18 of this so-called war weekly, an article under heavy black headlines entitled, "Playing politics in England." This article deals with the attempt of Gen. Maurice and others to drive Lloyd George out of the British Cabinet and charges that the allies have failed to win the war because politicians in the allied countries have interfered with the conduct of the war. To quote from the article in part, it says:

The allies have not won the war, they have not won it and the cause of failure no man can dispute. England, France, and Italy have made war, but they have not silenced the guns of domestic politics. The politicians have sniped at Governments, dragging down a cabinet or driving out a minister, not with the hope of bringing more competent men into office, but simply with the contemptible purpose of forcing their own party chiefs into power. This may sound harsh, but it is true. England and France and Italy have been the victims of intrigue, of chicanery, of political huckstering, of the sordid tricks of the professional politician, but the people have remained sound to the core; but for the unbreakable will of the people the war would have been lost by the politicians.

In the very issue in which occurs the article about Gen. Maurice and the attempt of the politicians of Europe to weaken the efforts of the allied armies to win the war is an article headed, "Now as to guns," in which the following language occurs:

The total inability of Secretary of War Baker to deal truthfully with the American public is forcefully illustrated by his recent statement with regard to production of machine guns. The War Department has completely fallen down in the production of the heavy type of Browning guns. This fact was disclosed through questions addressed to Army officers by members of the House Committee on Military Affairs.

The charge is plain in the above that the Secretary of War was dealing untruthfully with the public in this matter. But the fact is the shoe is entirely upon the other foot. The untruth is in this printed article which I have quoted. No Army officer made such a statement. As chairman of the subcommittee upon ordnance, I have heard the testimony upon this matter and no such statement was made nor would be made by an Army officer because it would be untrue. Further on in this same article occurs this statement:

Brig. Gen. Tracy Dickson gave the exact figures to the committee and he and other officers admitted that the War Department's program had collapsed completely.

This statement also is at variance with the truth. The statement was that the Colt Manufacturing Co. had failed to come through according to contract.

And to complete its likeness to the charges of Maurice and his coconspirators, this article concludes with the following paragraph:

And more discouraging to millions of Americans than all the rest is the last-named fact, for it proves conclusively that Mr. Newton D. Baker does not and can not learn; that repeated exposures of mendacity and duplicity on his part teach him nothing; that his conception of his important duties is to devote his energies and ingenuity to camouflaging and deceiving the American public, rather than to making the performance of his department conform to the expectations of the people and the necessities of war.

In the issue of May 11 of this same War Weekly this same charge of attempted deceit by the Secretary of War as to the production of heavy Browning guns is published in the following language:

Apparently the nine little Browning guns, of which our pacifist War Secretary so smugly boasted months ago, were in fact little ones; to wit, light guns. The heavy Browning guns are not even nine. Although deliveries of them in quantity were under the contract to have begun last month, none are now likely to be furnished until next year.

The charges which I have read, which are published in this War Weekly, can not be misunderstood. They charge the Secretary of War with having deliberately misstated the facts for the purpose of deceiving the public, and that no heavy Browning guns have been delivered and that none were likely to be furnished until next year.

Now for the facts as shown by the records of the War Department, and which records were as available to George Harvey, editor of the North American Review and the War Weekly thereof, as to anyone else. From May 1 until May 18 of this year, in 18 days, 659 heavy Browning machine guns were produced and delivered to the United States Government by the Remington Arms Co. and the Westinghouse Co.; and May 18 is the very date of the publication of this untruthful and slanderous article aimed at the Secretary of War. At the time that this article was being published, charging that not even nine heavy Browning guns had been produced and that none were likely to be produced in 1918, in 18 days more heavy Browning machine guns had been produced than the United States Army had accumulated of machine guns of recognized efficiency from the date of the invention of machine guns up to the time of our declaration of war. In January, 1917, our entire stock of effective machine guns for the United States Army consisted of 353 Lewis guns and 282 Vickers-Maxims. We had on hand something over 600 old Benét-Mercié guns, but no one uses them in modern battle. At the same time that the heavy Brownings are being produced at the rate of more than 1,000 a month, deliveries of the light Brownings for May will be 2,500, and in a short time will rise as high as 10,000 a month, if necessity requires it. The Colt automatic pistols, one of the greatest weapons for close combat in trench warfare ever invented, are now coming at the rate of 40,000 per month.

The machine-gun units of the United States Army that are in Europe are fully equipped with the best modern machine guns that are available. Our troops training in this country are being rapidly equipped with the heavy and light Brownings as they come from the factories. The fact that we are manufacturing the Browning machine guns has not delayed for a minute the sending of our troops into action fully equipped with the best machine guns to be had. It means that when we have them armed with the Browning guns our troops will be equipped with machine guns superior in battle efficiency to those of the other armies of the world.

In John Browning we have the recognized greatest armorer in the world, the greatest inventor of rapid-fire and automatic machine guns and pistols. Of course, we could not equip our Army immediately with the latest Browning inventions, because they were invented since we went into the war.

Our experience with machine guns is an exact parallel with that as to the service shoulder rifle. Six months ago Col. George Harvey and other detractors of the efforts of the administration to put this Nation upon an efficient war basis made the welkin ring and the pages of the public press fairly shriek with charges that we had no rifles, that we were drilling with broomsticks and wooden guns, and that we should have rushed into the manufacture of the obsolete British Lee-Enfield rifle. But the Secretary of War and his advisers stood fast against this assault, with the result that now we have in the new improved service rifle of the model of 1917 the best rifle in the world. We are producing them in such floods that production is being slowed up.

From May 1 to May 18, 659 heavies were produced.

MACHINE GUNS.

Browning heavy machine guns are being produced at the rate of more than 1,000 a month. About one-quarter of this production is from the Remington Arms Co. and about three-quarters from the Westinghouse Co. Manufacture in the Colt plant is somewhat delayed. The present rate of production began early in May; 26 were produced by April 27; 659 had been produced through May 18. There is every prospect that the rate of production will increase rapidly during the next few weeks.

AUTOMATIC RIFLES.

Five hundred and fifty-eight Browning automatic rifles were delivered in March and 368 in April. The expected delivery in May was 2,500 and the production is expected to rise as high as 10,000 per month. Requirements are now being met by deliveries of Chauchat guns from the French.

Three thousand four hundred and twenty-six light guns by June 1, 1918.

PISTOLS.

Pistols are being produced at the rate of 40,000 per month. Production is considerably behind theoretical requirements, because, as the result of this year's experience, it is planned to arm a much larger per cent of the forces with pistols.

Production records are:

To January	107,000
During January	27,000
During February	32,000
During March	46,000
During April	39,000

New capacity is being created to bring manufacture well up to needs later in the year.

January, 1917, machine guns on hand:

Lewis	353
Vickers	282
Total	635

And 665 old Benét-Merciés, making a total of 1,200.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. When I have finished.

They are coming in such numbers that we can fully equip an infantry division of 27,000 men every three days. Even the North American Review's War Weekly has to doff its hat to this achievement, but it covertly refuses to give credit to the Secretary of War, who is responsible for every important determined action of the War Department. In this same publication I read this paragraph:

The one redeeming light in the whole ordnance business is the production of rifles and cartridges—the best in the world—away ahead of time and in such quantities that manufacturing is now being checked to release skilled labor for other pressing war needs. To Col. John T. Thompson, who quietly achieved the whole thing, the whole country, no less than the Government, owes a debt of everlasting appreciation and gratitude.

Col. Thompson is an efficient and valuable officer and he is entitled to credit for carrying out successfully the orders of the Secretary of War, and those who have charge of the production of machine guns are going to be entitled to the same plaudits for the production of these wonderful Browning guns, which are going to make possible and bring certain victory to the American armies.

Mr. Chairman, these attacks upon the Secretary of War for failure of ordnance production are just as false and made for exactly the same purpose as were those made by Gen. Maurice and those associated with him in their lying assaults upon the prime minister of England. They are for political purposes, and for political purposes only. To quote the language of this very publication, they are full of the "sordid tricks of the professional politician." They are as false as were the charges of Maurice against the British cabinet; but "the people are sound to the core" and can not be misled.

This so-called War Weekly has a very familiar sound, though it wears a different face. In the character of its assaults upon the American Government it reminds us of those formerly appearing in a weekly dealing with the war and published by one George Silvester Viereck. It has all the earmarks of a new "Bonnet Rouge," and I would suggest to the Department of Justice that it search for another Bolo Pasha lurking somewhere in the shadows. These evil shafts of political malice are not aimed primarily at the Secretary of War. The hope is that through him they may strike the President in the back. The American people are not easily deceived. They know that this war is going to be won by our soldiers fighting upon the battle fields of France. They will make short work of these political bushwhackers and faultfinders who fire at our Commander in Chief from safe ambush here in Washington. [Applause.]

Now, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman stated the guns were being made in such floods that they had to slow up.

Mr. GARNER. Twenty-seven thousand in three days.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; 27,000 in three days.

Mr. GARNER. Nine thousand a day.

Mr. MADDEN. How many men have we in the field?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Something around 1,800,000.

Mr. MADDEN. How many guns does it take to a man?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It takes about 17,000 to a division, but every man in the division is not armed with a rifle.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the average or percentage of construction?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is estimated that there should probably be a rifle and a half for each man. That is, for a million men we should have a million and a half rifles.

Mr. MADDEN. We lose some?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. In battle?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes. The wastage is about 40 or 50 per cent per annum.

Mr. MADDEN. So that the information that the committee has leads to the conclusion not only that we have all the guns we need now, but that we are making all that we may need, no matter how large the Army may be?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The information that we have is that we are producing rifles more rapidly than we have assembled men to carry them, and in order that these skilled toolmakers and mechanics may be used in other lines of production they are slowing up somewhat the production of rifles; although I will say to the gentleman that with the increase of a million men that we are voting in this bill, I understand they will have to again speed the production of shoulder rifles. But there is no question but that the capacity of our manufacturers for the manufacture of rifles has developed to such an extent that we have now put any danger of a shortage of rifles behind us.

Mr. MADDEN. We have plenty of rifles and plenty of machine guns?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have plenty of machine guns for the men who are fighting in Europe. As to machine guns and other ordnance that goes with them, we think that in this Browning gun, which was invented by an American inventor, we have a better gun than we ever had, and that they are coming in quantity sufficient to meet all needs.

Mr. MADDEN. Have we plenty of ammunition?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have plenty of small-arms ammunition.

Mr. MADDEN. What other have we?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The other ammunition is in the charge of the Committee on Fortifications, and our information is that that is supplied by the allied Governments. We are using their artillery, and they are furnishing us their ammunition.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Have the Browning guns been tried out in battle?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Not in battle, but they are being used by our troops in America now.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then they have not yet been tried in battle?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No. The Browning heavy rifle is very much such a rifle as the Vickers or Hotchkiss. It has this one quality that we think makes it superior to all other machine guns, that it is very simple in its construction, has very much fewer parts, which can be standardized and produced in quantities, and the parts can be assembled much more easily, and it will be a more efficient rifle when it gets into the service.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Have any of the lighter Browning guns been placed on aeroplanes?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Not that I know of. The light Browning gun is a gun to be used by troops when advancing, and to be fired from the shoulder or the hip, and used largely as an automatic gun.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Can the gentleman from Nebraska inform us whether the light Browning gun or the heavy gun should be used on an aeroplane?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I saw in the public press that the heavy Browning gun has been tried out on aeroplanes and found to be a gun that can be synchronized; that is, so arranged as to fire its stream of shots between the revolving blades of the propeller, the same as several other machine guns will. The one fault found with the Lewis gun in this country, although we are buying them for use on aeroplanes, is that on account of the length of the stroke of the firing pin, or on account of some other feature of the mechanism of the Lewis gun, it is not adapted to synchronization. It can be used for the purposes of what is known as a flexible gun; that is, a gun to be fired from some other angles than directly through the propeller; but the heavy Browning gun has been found to be adapted to synchronization with the propeller, the same as it has been found to be adapted to everything else, so it is apparently an all-round gun.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. My purpose in asking the question is to know whether or not our machine-gun production will keep pace with our aeroplane production, or whether or not when we really get 50,000 or 100,000 aeroplanes we will have enough machine guns to place upon them. Does the gentleman think we will have?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; our machine-gun program provides over 200,000 machine guns for aeroplanes. I will say to the gentleman that we have now something like 15,000 of the Marlin aircraft guns. That also is a gun that is available for use on airplanes the same as the others, because it can be synchronized to be fired through the propeller if necessary.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What gun is generally used by the allies on their airplanes?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In Europe the Hotchkiss gun, a heavy machine gun similar to the Browning gun.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for five minutes more, in order to answer these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will remember, when the Committee on Military Affairs of the House were invited to see the demonstration of the light Browning gun there were present quite a number of officers from foreign countries. Those officers told members of the Military Affairs Committee that that light Browning gun was the best machine gun they had ever seen—better than anything they had on the other side.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. A French officer who had been wounded a number of times while in the trenches working machine guns told me the light Browning gun was the best light machine gun he had ever seen—the most effective.

Mr. DICKINSON. The gentleman is speaking about the Browning gun. Is it being delivered——

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Delivered to our soldiers in this country for training.

Mr. DICKINSON. I was going to ask whether that gun was being delivered to the soldiers in the cantonments in this country.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is my information.

Mr. DICKINSON. Are any of them being sent abroad as yet?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not think they are. I will say to the gentleman that we have something like 4,000 Vickers machine guns. The Vickers gun is a first-class heavy machine gun, probably just as effective as the Browning gun, but having many more parts, and therefore much more difficult to manufacture. Our troops going over there have been supplied with that machine gun and also with the Hotchkiss machine gun, purchased in Europe.

Mr. DICKINSON. The reason I ask is that from my section there are some machine-gun battalions which expected to get the Browning gun.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not think they have gone over. I know they were sent to Camp Meade and some to Camp Pike in Arkansas.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman state how many machine-gun battalions there are at each cantonment?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. BARKLEY. At each training camp there is at least one machine-gun battalion, is there not?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. There are several at each camp, and I am informed that each one is being supplied with machine guns.

Mr. BARKLEY. At each training camp there is at least one machine-gun battalion?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what advantage it will be to disclose down to the minutest detail the information which I understand appears in the hearings and has not yet been published?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman refer to the Browning gun?

Mr. WALSH. The Browning gun, the number of machine-gun battalions, and so forth.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say that I have not been one of those who believed that it was best for the country to conceal from the public the actual state of our Military Establishment and the fact of production of these things essential to the war. I think a great deal of misinformation and pessimism has been scattered through the country because we have not given out as much of this information as might have been done. But I will say to the gentleman, as he no doubt knows, that the modern military men seem to think it necessary to keep as much information as possible from the public about military affairs, and therefore the Military Committee as a rule have deferred to it. But as to the matter of production of these guns the public is entitled to know the facts, and the information can be of no value to the enemy because they are not yet made in sufficient numbers to be dangerous on the other side. But I want to give the country the information that the production is now organized and the guns are rapidly being furnished that have been decided by our military men to be the best guns.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate that the gentleman has acted in good faith, and I did not seek to criticize him but only wondered if it was to offset any rumors or reports that we were not making progress.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That was my idea in making the speech.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman thinks it is necessary to divulge minor details in many respects in order to offset the reports, I assume?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say that I think the speech of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the statement made by the chairman of the committee this afternoon giving detailed information about the aircraft were valuable contributions to public information, and if the information I have given about the production of machine guns shall in a small way serve some such purpose also I shall be content. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the gentleman stated for the benefit of the committee that even though we had not sufficient light Browning guns to arm our troops, nevertheless we have had thousands of the French guns furnished to us by the French Government, the Chauchat gun, to arm the troops on the other side, and our troops are equipped with that gun.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I thank the gentleman from California.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, just a word more in explanation of the rifle situation and as to machine guns. The rifle situation is that at the time we entered the war the manufacture of the Enfield rifle in this country was said to amount to about 15,000 a day. When it was decided to modify the Enfield rifle and make it the "United States model, 1917," chambered to shoot American ammunition, the change was comparatively slight, although it took three or four months to make the new tools and gauges necessary to begin the manufacture of the Enfield rifles chambered for American ammunition. The change is comparatively slight, however, compared to what it would have been to make an entirely new rifle. Therefore we had available a potential capacity for the manufacture of rifles of 15,000 a day. It was necessary only to make changes of tools, gauges, and fixtures for the few minor changes necessary to shoot American ammunition instead of the British.

Thus far it has not been considered necessary to tool up beyond a daily capacity of 9,000, which has been thought to be quite sufficient. However, if it be necessary to tool up, it can be done easily to the maximum capacity that we were producing of the British rifle at the peak of production.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman just answered what I was about to ask him. I was going to ask how he reconciled the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] that we were making 9,000 a day with the statement that he has just made that we can make 15,000 a day.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman will see that we must tool up for the additional 6,000 a day. The gentleman understands what it is to put into production any article of this kind which is made of metal and which has to function as perfectly as a gun. In order to tool up for the manufacture of such an article, it takes a great many special tools of very fine material and workmanship, with all the necessary dies, jigs, and fixtures. Then there must be a large number of dimension and limit gauges which are necessary to production in large quantities.

Mr. MADDEN. We have the machinery with which to make the maximum number, and all we need to do is to tool up our machinery?

Mr. TILSON. It will only be necessary to tool up our machines for the modified parts in order to increase our capacity to, say, 15,000 a day.

Mr. MADDEN. Or to add the necessary number of tools to the machinery that we already have.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; and it would not take a very large number of special tools, because we already have the tools for a maximum capacity of some 15,000, except for the comparatively few modified parts.

Mr. MADDEN. And we have the factory space?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And the machines themselves?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, all we need is the added number of tools?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And we also need the material?

Mr. TILSON. It has been decided, and I think correctly, that we should not take toolmakers, who are scarce, and the gauge makers, who are still scarcer, off other necessary work, where tools are necessary in the manufacture of artillery and ammunition, and put them to making tools for rifles when we have already a daily capacity of 9,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That is, if that is enough.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman is entirely correct, and if it is not enough it will be necessary for us to tool up further.

Mr. MADDEN. Are the toolmakers limited in number?

Mr. TILSON. They are decidedly limited. The number of toolmakers and gauge makers in this country is quite limited. Every one is worth his weight in gold. A good toolmaker or a good gauge maker is a very important and valuable man just now.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose we get an Army of 5,000,000 men on the other side, how many more toolmakers would we have to have in the United States than we have to-day.

Mr. TILSON. We are now training toolmakers every day. They are beginning at the simpler work of toolmaking and are going on up to the more complicated and difficult work, but we are training them every day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. TILSON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. I wish to say a word about the machine-gun situation. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] has referred to it. I can best add a word in regard to the use of guns on airplanes. He described to you that there are two kinds of guns used on an airplane. On a single-seater machine, and these are usually tractors, it is necessary to have a gun that will shoot between the propeller blades in order that the pilot in piloting his machine can also sight his machine gun. Therefore, the machine gun should be built right into the fusilage of the machine, so that in order to aim the gun he maneuvers until he gets his cross wires across the enemy machine, then his machine gun is aimed and to discharge it he has only to pull the string and the gun operates.

The Lewis gun, though fine as a flexible gun, can not be adapted to shooting between the propeller blades, since it can not be synchronized, but we have a gun already in production and now being turned out in quantities that serves that purpose well. I refer to the Marlin aircraft gun. The aviation section of the Signal Corps took no chances as to machine guns and, therefore, chose for a fusilage gun the Marlin aircraft gun which synchronizes perfectly. They gave an order for 40,000 of these, I believe it was, or about that number.

At the same time an equal number of Lewis guns were ordered for use as a flexible gun—that is, a gun which is mounted on a swivel pedestal where the observer can turn and use it in every direction from an airplane.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is not there some objection to the Marlin gun on account of its weight for use in an aeroplane?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman means the gun being too heavy?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I do not believe so, because later on they are going to substitute for it the heavy Browning gun, which is not much different in weight.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The Lewis gun, at all events, is a much lighter gun?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; but it will not serve at all as a fusilage gun. You can not synchronize it to shoot between the propeller blades. It is not made so that you can use it for that particular purpose.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman made a very astounding statement, I thought, when he said that they had made a contract for 40,000 guns for single planes and 40,000 Lewis guns—that is,

80,000 guns, 80,000 aeroplanes—and then you are going to substitute the Browning gun for it. No wonder——

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that is not all. The bill contains an appropriation for 220,000 more aeroplane guns.

Mr. GARNER. How many are we going to have, 300,000?

Mr. KING. Four hundred thousand, I hope.

Mr. TILSON. The order was, I think, for 38,000, to be exact, in each case, of the Lewis gun and of the Marlin aircraft; but I believe it has been increased as to one, if not both, of them.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman another question in connection with this? I happened to see the newspaper report, I think, on this report of the Committee on Military Affairs, stating that it took about 30 men to each aeroplane. If we are going to have 400,000 aeroplanes and multiply that by 30, I want to know how many men we are going to have. That is one of the things that strikes me.

Mr. TILSON. I think the gentleman is somewhat askew on his original calculation. He can not figure the number of airplanes from the number of machine guns to be used in airplanes.

Mr. GARNER. I may be getting a little high, but the gentleman suggested that there were 40,000 guns of one kind and 40,000 of another kind already ordered——

Mr. TILSON. On the same plane there may be a number of guns.

Mr. GARNER. On a single seater, I understood, you could not use any gun except one that is fixed in the machine.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; but every machine is a fighting machine, and every machine must have at least one gun on it. If you have one, two, or three observers, the number of guns carried increases very rapidly.

Mr. QUIN. And some carry larger guns.

Mr. TILSON. There are larger machines. They have as high as seven guns on a single airplane.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman will suggest also that the wastage must be accounted for.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman must figure that the wastage of the airplane is very great and that the wastage of these guns is very great.

Mr. McKENZIE. And is it not true that these guns can be used by the Army, and if they are not used on flying machines they are not lost.

Mr. TILSON. That is correct to a certain extent. The fusilage gun can not be used very well. It is made for the fusilage and without any wood on it at all, so that you could not use it after you had fired a number of shots. It would be too hot. Such a gun is built into the machine.

The heavy Browning gun is going to be used for the fusilage gun later on; that is, the regular heavy Browning gun with the water jacket left off. The gun we are going to use for defensive purposes on the ground is the same gun with the water jacket on it to cool it off.

Mr. GARNER. How many guns are we ordering in this bill for aeroplanes?

Mr. TILSON. I would not be able to tell the gentleman. I recall the original order as 38,000 each of the Lewis and the Marlin aircraft.

Mr. DENT. I hope the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him.

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. I ask for another minute in order to answer the question.

Mr. DENT. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENT. I hope the statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that we are going to have over 400,000 aeroplanes will not go into the RECORD. Nobody contemplates anything like that.

Mr. TILSON. It will go in the RECORD hitched to the name of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield? I did not suggest that you were going to have 400,000 aeroplanes.

Mr. DENT. Nor did I.

Mr. GARNER. Somebody else suggested it, and I was merely making calculations as to how many guns and men you would have to have to equip them.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman did not draw any such inference from anything I said.

Mr. DENT. As a matter of fact, I said this afternoon, in my original statement on this bill, that I thought it was all right to state what has been accomplished under this service, but not to make any promise as to what would be accomplished, and I thought that had been the mistake that had been made. But certainly there is nothing now like 400,000 aeroplanes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The esteemed publication known as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may quote me as wishing that there were 400,000 on the front now.

Mr. DENT. If that was the case, you would not have any sunlight there at all.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, to have any such statement go into the RECORD as appears to have been made, to the effect that we are likely to have 300,000 or 400,000 aeroplanes in the service. Of course, before the war ends it may be necessary to make that many, but we will do that because it takes only 30 days to destroy an aeroplane. If we put in 5,000 planes a month we will have to put in 5,000 the month succeeding that, because the first 5,000 will be worn out. So that if the war lasts any particular length of time we will have a good many aeroplanes, and, of course, we will have a good many guns. But it does not follow that every time an aeroplane is worn out that the gun on the aeroplane is worn out—not at all; because the aeroplane may be operating and the gun never fire a shot. But the experience of the war has shown that the governments that are operating aeroplanes are required to renew their output of aeroplanes every 30 days. For example, if the allies already have 5,000 aeroplanes on the western front, or any place else on the battle line, they will have to put 5,000 new aeroplanes in service within the next 30 days. For the record goes to show that every aeroplane is totally destroyed, not necessarily because it is shot down, but because it is worn out, within 30 days. And the average life of a motor in an aeroplane is only 200 hours of active operation. We need 14 men for every aeroplane that is placed in the field. If we had 400,000 aeroplanes we would have 400,000 times 14 men in the Aviation Service, which is absurd, of course, and ridiculous to think about. If we ever get to a point where we have 2,500 battle planes on the battle line, managed by American aviators, I think we will be able to prove that we have done something.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think, in line with that very suggestion, the figures which the public and Congress should watch are as to the number of machines that are ready to take the air at any given time, and in addition to that there is always this constant reinforcement on the way.

Mr. MADDEN. We will never have enough men on the other side, in my judgment, to require more than 2,500 aeroplanes in active service at any one time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope that is true.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true. It certainly can not be more than that, because with the allied armies of France and England they have not more than 5,000, and do not expect to have more than 5,000, and if they only need 5,000 surely America will not need more than 2,500. But we will need the 2,500 every month. That is the point. So that when we say we need 2,500 aeroplanes that means twelves times 2,500 every year, or 30,000. That is the point.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. As I understand it, the ultimate limit of life of an air motor is 40 air-hours, and if those motors are up say 5 hours a day, a motor will last only 10 days.

Mr. MADDEN. They will not last very long. The average time required to destroy a motor under all conditions that may obtain is 200 hours of active use. Of course, if they are up in the rarefied atmosphere they will wear out quicker than they will down below, because the work is a good deal harder on them; but if we get our Army organization to a point where we can be certain that we are going to be able to supply 2,500 aeroplanes every month for use in France, then I will say that the Army organization is getting to be what it ought to be.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois and Mr. QUIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] a member of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. QUIN. I will wait until the gentleman from Illinois gets through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have no amendments to offer to this bill. I am satisfied to take the judgment of the committee. Its members have labored long and faithfully to provide by this bill the sinews of war. The amounts appropriated and authorized are very large, but undoubtedly not more than is necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. That is the one thing we are interested in now—to win the war. I believe it is time that the people should understand—and they do understand, and the world understands, and by and by even the thick-headed German Imperial Government will be made to understand—that we are in this war to the finish, with all the man power and all the resources necessary to win. The whole people of the country are united and determined as never before on the one great proposition to win the war, that not only ourselves but the other peoples of the world shall be free to govern themselves and that autocracies shall never again be permitted to rule on this earth by frightfulness and force. The American people are a peaceful people, and they love peace to the extent that they are willing to fight for it, and to fight until the Prussian military power is crushed never to again attempt the conquest of the world. The great question now is not how long will this great war last, but how will it end? And it never can end and never will end until the present German Government is defeated and overthrown. There can be no talk of peace without victory or by compromise of any kind. When peace does come it will not be of the kind that is "made in Germany." It will be a peace based not on conquest, not on the robbery of territory from other weaker powers, but based on the immutable principles of right and justice to all nations, great and small. And this is impossible until the central powers are absolutely defeated and humbled to the point where right, not might, shall be accepted as the basis of enduring peace. As a member of this House, I propose to stand by the administration in the vigorous prosecution of the war and to give to the administration whatever and everything that is necessary or helpful in conducting the war. Neither do I approve of faultfinding and criticism if some mistakes are made, as inevitably there have been and will be, but, notwithstanding that fact, we have done more and accomplished more in the short space of a little more than a year since we entered the war than the most optimistic man in all the country could have hoped for or thought possible. We have in that time organized a great army, fit to meet and conquer a like number of any army that ever existed. From a quiet, peaceful people we have become a great military power that will make itself felt in the cause of justice and humanity and the liberation of the world from tyranny and oppression.

Mr. Chairman, I have no fear of the final result. We are not in the war for any selfish purpose. We covet the territory of no other people. We are not seeking to rob any nation of its lands or its resources of any kind. We are not seeking indemnities. It is said that in Germany the question is being discussed as to how much indemnity, how many billions of dollars, they will be able to collect from us when the war is over. I can tell them now. It was said some time by some one that we had "millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute." We can go better than that now. We have billions and hundreds of billions, if need be, to carry on this war until victory is won, but not a farthing for indemnities, so long as an American citizen is left alive, so long as a building in all this country stands, so long as a dollar is left, or so long as day follows night or night follows day. No; America has never yet been defeated, and it never will be so long as it never espouses a cause that is not just and right. The sooner the Imperial German Government understands this fact the better it will be for it and the German people. Let us pass this bill quickly and any other and every other necessary measure, counting not the cost till victory is won.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, since Congress convened in December your chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], and the other 20 members of that committee have done much irksome and tedious labor in order that they might present this bill, which amounts in round numbers to about $12,000,000,000. This is the largest appropriation ever made in one bill by any nation of the whole world. In the consideration and formulation of this measure our colleague from California [Mr. KAHN] has given much able and I may say thoughtful assistance and advice. Our committee, unselfish in its work, unselfish in its devotion to duty, has brought this bill before you and asks this Congress to pass it as it has been brought out here. It is in our judgment all necessary to properly prosecute and win the war.

You have read in the press of this country many mendacious and slanderous articles against the Secretary of War and the whole War Department. The country has had a flood of billingsgate and misinformation scattered upon it from one end of it to the other since this committee began the consideration of this measure. We started out with a program of about $6,775,000,000. The Secretary of War, after we had completed those hearings, was called to the battle front in France and asked us to hold this measure up until his return. He then came forward with another program, which gives the bill a total of about $12,000,000,000.

You have heard numerous charges against the War Department, assertions that it had fallen down and had ceased to function. You have had mendacious lies told about the airplane program. I do not say that the airplane program was carried out as successfully as was suggested or expected or intended by the Congress, but I do not believe, gentlemen, that the fall-down of the Aircraft Board is as complete and total as some newspapers have endeavored to make it appear. It has made fine progress in many respects.

Whatever fault may be found concerning it, it can not be attributed to this committee, nor can it be attributed to Congress. I know that the Ordnance Department has been mendaciously slandered and the public deceived as to the ability of this Government to prosecute this war with the proper amount of light and heavy artillery. I know further that many slanders went out against the War Department, especially the Quartermaster Department, touching the equipment of our soldiers in the way of clothing. True, there was some shortage. Very true, mistakes were made. But where is the honest, patriotic critic in this Republic who would not concede to the President and to the Army officials, to the Cabinet and to Congress, that some mistake would inevitably follow in the sudden organization of a great army, with all this country at peace, with all of our industries running on peace programs, when suddenly, over night, everything was transformed to a war footing? To-day you have two million and thirty-odd thousand soldiers. You have more than four hundred thousand sailors. You have all the industries of this country changed from a peace to a war basis. It has been done in less than 12 months. You have every one of your soldiers well equipped, and a splendid surplus. You have, in addition to that, all of your sailors well equipped, and a surplus for more. You have, my friends, the Republic organized in better shape to carry on a war than England was two years after they started into the war.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is one of the most patriotic and hard-working members of the Military Affairs Committee, and I am, of course, very much interested in his statement; but I want to ask him if he does not think that a great deal of the dissatisfaction which has been expressed throughout the country has resulted from too rosy promises and predictions being made in certain quarter from time to time, which caused people in their enthusiasm to believe that greater results could be obtained than were humanly possible?

Mr. QUIN. I will say in response to the gentleman from Massachusetts that there is a certain psychological method by which the American people must be reached. All of us know, for instance, that the Aircraft Board painted rosy pictures that we knew were not true. Yet I believe they were honest in painting those pictures, in portraying to the public what would be done, in order to arouse that enthusiasm throughout every quarter of the United States that is necessary for this war to be a success. And if any department of this Government have overplayed what was actually being done, I am patriot enough to concede to them honest motives and a purpose that every man who has studied the situation knows is bound to prevail in order for the American people to appreciate properly the task before them and to get in their hearts the war spirit, the spirit of success. Why, do you know that in April, 1917, when we declared this war, and for several months thereafter there were rumblings in every quarter of the United States, faultfinding against the President, against his Cabinet, and against the Congress for declaring war. To-day, as demonstrated by the Red Cross drive in every quarter of the United States, the humblest citizen up to the most intellectual, and even to the man of great affairs in finance, has shown absolute patriotism, a spirit of patriotism pervading this Republic that should make every man in this House and throughout the American Republic proud that he is an American. Do you know, my friends, that in the psychological method in which all of these departments have handled this matter—I might include the Congress in that—the American people have been awakened and aroused so that there is to-day as much enthusiasm 40 miles from a railroad as there is right here in the Halls of Congress? The Red Cross drive shows that. All of our people in the South are patriotic. And I want to say that I live in a country where we have the poor black man. He is partaking of this patriotic devotion to his country just as the white man is. The poor, ignorant black man there contributes to the Red Cross. He gives to the Y. M. C. A. for the Army. He buys liberty bonds. He will not agree for any man to stand up and talk against this Government in his presence. That same spirit that is in the hearts of the South is found also everywhere else in this Republic, and if it had not been for the damnable I. W. W. bug you never would have had any disturbances in this country. You do not have disturbances anywhere in this Republic where the people are real Americans and want to see this Government carry out the aims, intents, and purposes as proclaimed by that great American, President Woodrow Wilson, who is the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. That purpose, as expressed by him here yesterday, is to bring old Kaiser Bill and that whole crowd to their knees and make them realize that this great giant of the West stands ready at all times not only to defend itself but to protect the poor and weak everywhere that the sun shines. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman's very interesting observation, but he has spoken of psychology. I would like to ask him if this is an instance of the psychological method which he thinks should be invoked in arousing patriotism? I quote from his colleague on the Military Affairs Committee to this effect:

Surely your Uncle Sam is a modern Aladdin, who when he wants a thing devoutly rubs the lamp of American patriotism, and the genius of America produces overnight all that he requires.

Is that the psychological method that the gentleman thinks should be used to arouse American enthusiasm?

Mr. QUIN. I can not comment on what any other gentleman thinks psychology might be.

Mr. WALSH. I wondered if that was following that method.

Mr. QUIN. I follow what we all consider sensible and legitimate and practical, and that is all that the War Department has done. That is all that any branch of this Government has pursued to-day. The Congress is aware of the fact and recognizes the fact that this committee, and especially the War Department, has had a wonderful task to perform, and at no time has it endeavored to shirk any duty or responsibility. Standing against the shaft of criticism, standing against the onslaught of designing politicians, your Secretary of War has withstood it all, and to-day stands out a leader of this country, sending our boys across the Atlantic ocean, guaranteeing, so far as the great Republic can guarantee, the fathers and mothers that these boys shall be protected with all of the great Government resources back behind them. Every patriotic citizen of this Republic in his heart feels that the soldier who has offered to immolate himself on the altar of his country should have the solid support and backing of the people behind him. [Applause.] That no man should have the right to quibble, grumble, and throw any stumblingblocks in the way of the successful winning of the war. No soldier nor sailor should in anywise be handicapped or hindered by any man in public or private life by any man of no means or by any man of the greatest means in this Republic. [Applause.] America is going to win this war and bring the bloody butcher to his knees and crush forever the Prussian ideals and destroy for all time military despotism. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase, equipment, operation, and repair of military, telegraph, telephone, radio, cable, and signaling systems; signal equipments and stores, field glasses, telescopes, heliographs, signal lanterns, flags, and other necessary instruments; wind vanes, barometers, anemometers, thermometers, and other meteorological instruments; motorcycles and motor-driven vehicles for technical and official purposes in connection with the construction, operation, and maintenance of communication or signaling systems, and supplies for their operation and maintenance; professional and scientific books of reference, pamphlets, periodicals, newspapers, and maps for use in the office of the Chief Signal Officer; telephone apparatus, including rental and payment for commercial, exchange, message, trunk line, long distance, and leased line telephone service at or connecting any post, camp, cantonment, depot, arsenal, headquarters, hospital, aviation station, or other office or station of the Army, excepting telephone service for the various bureaus of the War Department in the District of Columbia; electric time service; the rental of commercial telegraph lines and equipment and their operation at or connecting any post, camp, cantonment, depot, arsenal, headquarters, hospital, aviation station, or other office or station of the Army, but not including payment for individual telegraph messages transmitted over commercial lines; electrical installations and maintenance at military posts, cantonments, camps, and stations of the Army; fire control and direction apparatus and matériel for field artillery; salaries of civilian employees, including those necessary as instructors at vocational schools; supplies, general repairs, reserve supplies, and other expenses connected with the collecting and transmitting of information for the Army by telegraph or otherwise; experimentation and research for the purpose of developing improvements in apparatus and methods of signaling, including machines, instruments, and other equipment for laboratory and repair purposes; purchase, lease, construction, alterations, and repair for such buildings required for storing or guarding Signal Corps supplies, equipment, and personnel when not otherwise provided for, including the land therefor, the introduction of water, electric light and power, sewerage, grading, roads and walks, and other equipment required, $105,946,054.77.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, when we reach the end of this bill I intend to offer the so-called "stop-watch" amendment. Members of the House will recall that this amendment has been carried on the military and naval appropriation bills for the last four years.

It is a part of the naval appropriation bill which passed this House a few weeks ago. It should be in this bill.

I will present the amendment in the exact form in which it appears in the naval appropriation bill, which is as follows:

That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop-watch or other time-measuring device, a time study of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant.

The object of the amendment is to prevent the introduction of the so-called "Taylor stop-watch system" into Government plants. The subject has been pretty thoroughly thrashed out during the last few years, but I want to trespass long enough on the patience of the House to make two or three points.

CAMOUFLAGE ABOUT "EFFICIENCY."

The opponents of this amendment will tell you that it is a blow at efficiency, and they will endeavor to convince you that you can not have efficiency in Government plants unless you have the Taylor system. Now, we are all in favor of efficiency, and we are all willing to make whatever sacrifices may be required of us in order to bring about the efficient prosecution of this war.

But the Taylor system and efficiency are not synonymous terms. The supporters of the Taylor system have been clever enough to seize upon that word "efficiency" and to exploit it to their own advantage.

I think I can dispose of this question of efficiency by reading a letter from the Secretary of the Navy addressed to a Member of this House, Mr. GOULD, of New York. Referring to the stop-watch amendment in the Naval appropriation bill, the Secretary says:

This provision is a continuation of one incorporated in the naval appropriation act approved March 3, 1915, and carried in all subsequent naval acts, and while its inclusion in the bill now pending was made without the recommendation of the department the department is not opposed to it, and, in fact, advocated it at the time the naval act of March 3, 1915, was under consideration.

Its continuation from year to year has not operated to prevent satisfactory ascertainments by other means of the comparative efficiency of employees.

I would particularly call your attention to the concluding paragraph:

Its continuation from year to year has not operated to prevent satisfactory ascertainments by other means of the comparative efficiency of employees.

I think we can all agree that, judged by achievement, the Navy Department is one of the most efficient departments of Government.

REAL OBJECT OF "TAYLOR SYSTEM."

Analysis of the Taylor system reveals the fact that it is merely a clever device for speeding up workmen. Gentlemen who are experts in its use seem to regard workers as machines which should be driven to their utmost capacity until some one of the "parts" gives way. Then the machine should be tossed into the junk pile and a new machine substituted.

That this is not a harsh description of the system is shown by a familiar extract from the treatise entitled "Shop Management," written by F. W. Taylor, the "inventor" of this system. Mr. Taylor first installed his system in the Bethlehem Steel Works, and his methods in that establishment won him fame and fortune. In his book he boasts of his achievement in the following paragraph:

When the writer left the steel works, the Bethlehem pieceworkers were the finest body of picked laborers that he had ever seen together. They were practically all first-class men, because in each case the task which they were called upon to perform was such that only a first-class man could do it. The tasks were all purposely made so severe that not more than 1 out of 5 laborers (perhaps even a smaller percentage than this) could keep up.

"Only 1 out of 5 could keep up!" I wonder what became of the other four, and I wonder what would become of a society based on a speeding-up system where the workers' tasks were deliberately made so severe that only 1 out of 5 could keep up?

SELFISH INTERESTS URGE SYSTEM.

Certain interests are taking advantage of the fact that we are at war to urge the restoration of this pernicious system. They claim to be actuated solely by patriotic motives, but the fact is they are more interested in establishing this system in the workshops of the Nation than they are in their country's safety. If they were unselfishly considering the Republic's welfare they would not attempt at this time to interfere with the President's handling of our very complex and delicate labor problems.

And allow me to diverge here for a moment to say that the President's management of the labor question since we have entered the great war has been one of the most marked triumphs of his administration. Neither the President nor any of his responsible lieutenants are clamoring for the Taylor system. On the contrary, at the very beginning of the war the Council of National Defense, presided over by the Secretary of War, issued an appeal to the legislatures of the country urging the maintenance of the various safeguards which had been thrown around labor. This declaration was approved by the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense on April 6, 1917, and is as follows:

That the Council of National Defense urge upon the legislatures of the States, as well as all administrative agencies charged with the enforcement of labor and health laws, the great duty of rigorously maintaining the existing safeguards as to the health and the welfare of the workers, and that no departure from such present standards in State laws or State rulings affecting labor should be taken without a declaration of the Council of National Defense that such a departure is essential for the effective pursuit of the national defense.

President Wilson has made his position so clear that no one can misunderstand it. In a letter to Gov. Brumbaugh, of Pennsylvania, on June 4 last, the President said:

I take pleasure in replying to your letter of June 1. I think it would be most unfortunate for any of the States to relax laws by which safeguards have been thrown about labor. I feel that there is no necessity for such action and that it would lead to a slackening of the energy of the Nation rather than to an increase of it, besides being very unfair to the laboring people themselves.

PRESIDENT WILSON EXPRESSES ALARM.

The President expressed the same thought in a letter addressed to the Committee on Labor of the Council of National Defense on May 15, 1917, from which I quote the following paragraph:

I have been very much alarmed at one or two things that have happened: At the apparent inclination of the legislatures of one or two of our States to set aside even temporarily the laws which have safeguarded the standards of labor and life. I think nothing would be more deplorable than that. We are trying to fight in a cause which means the lifting of the standards of life, and we can fight in that cause best by voluntary cooperation.

Members may say that if labor is so confident concerning the attitude of the Executive, why insist upon these limitations in the appropriation bills? The answer is that if you strike out this "stop-watch" amendment, the advocates of the Taylor system will immediately herald the result as a mandate from Congress in favor of the Taylor system, and they will prosecute a campaign for the installation of the system in the Government workshops and in the plants which are doing Government work.

While these efforts may not be successful, they will disturb the workers who are now doing everything humanly possible to turn out the things needed to win this war.

We were all tremendously pleased the other day when we read how a riveter in a New Jersey shipyard had broken the world's record for the number of rivets driven in a single day. He was not working under the Taylor system. He had not been subjected to the stop watch. The only spur he required was love of country and determination to aid in what he regarded as a holy cause. His unselfish patriotism was demonstrated when he tossed the prize given to him by a New York newspaper into the coffers of the Red Cross, together with the wage he had received for a remarkable day's work.

What will that hero and his fellows think if the Congress of the United States goes on record as indorsing the proposition that workingmen engaged on work vital to the safety of the Nation can not be depended upon to do their duty unless they have applied to them an industrial thumbscrew?

And right here allow me to call attention to the "Decision as to wages, hours, and other conditions in the Delaware River and Baltimore shipyards," rendered by the shipbuilding labor adjustment board on February 14, 1918. It was in a yard governed by this decision that the rivet-driving record was smashed the other day. I find on page 5 of the decision the following language:

We, the board, therefore direct that no bonus or premium in addition to the rates of wages prescribed in this award shall in future be paid.

Mr. Chairman, let us put an end to this policy of "nagging" labor. No good can come of it and much evil may result.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I shall not occupy the whole five minutes. I only want to make a few observations upon the subject of the address just delivered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING]. The instance which he cites in the Bethlehem Steel Works to show that the Taylor system is a system of driving men beyond endurance and to undermine their usefulness, was, it seems to me, exceedingly unfortunate if it was intended to prove his case, because in the case he cites everyone of the men were pieceworkers. They did not have to perform any particular task; they were actually paid for what they did and no more. If a man did not want to perform the highest task and could not do it without injuring himself, he was at liberty not to do it. He was simply paid for what he did.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman understands that the quotation I just read from Mr. Taylor said that the task was purposely made so difficult, according to Mr. Taylor's own language, that only one man out of five could perform it.

Mr. GORDON. And the gentleman wanted to know what the other four did. Why, the other four performed less work than the maximum. Any man that has had experience with men knows that they are not of equal capacity. That is my criticism of the philosophy of the gentleman from Colorado and many others, who mean well. They assume that one man is equal to another and can do as much as any man that has had any experience in the work. Now, any man who has had experience in working with men or has had men work for him knows that men are not equal; they are no more equal in capacity to perform work than men in this House are equal in capacity to decide and present facts on public questions.

Mr. KEATING. I hope the gentleman will not put me in the position of saying that I have said that all men are of equal capacity in their performance either of mental or physical tasks.

Mr. GORDON. I never charged the gentleman with saying it, but his whole position is based on that theory. The example which he cited was piecework, and no man was required to perform any allotted task.

He simply got paid for what he did. Of course they have sheared and clipped it in the Navy Department so that it is utterly innocuous. They still have a system there by which they have drawn the teeth out of this amendment so that it does not do any harm.

Mr. KEATING. Does the gentleman claim that the Navy Department is any more inefficient than the War Department?

Mr. GORDON. No; I do not.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the record show that the Navy Department, if anything, is more efficient than the War Department?

Mr. GORDON. I do not think it does.

Mr. KEATING. It is at least as efficient.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion about that.

Mr. KEATING. How does the gentleman account for the fact that the Navy Department is efficient if an institution can not be efficient unless they have the so-called Taylor system?

Mr. GORDON. I did not say it could not be. I desire to say that it has clipped and shorn the gentleman's amendment so that it is no longer objectionable; that is to say, that the essential thing in the Taylor system is still being applied in the Navy Department. That is the real truth about it. The whole theory of this time study and premium payment is to pay men according to what they do; and men who are working for the Government, especially in a time like this, the greatest crisis in the history of the United States, ought to be satisfied to have the product of their labor measured by a stop watch or any other kind of measuring device, so that at night the Government would know exactly what each man has performed and pay him for what he does. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12281, the Army appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein an article written by my colleague, Mr. ALEXANDER, of Missouri, and printed in the Scientific American, upon the Government ship-purchase bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CASH HOLDINGS OF THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which the Clerk proceeded to read.

Mr. MADDEN (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading be dispensed with and that the report be printed and referred to the appropriate committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading and that the same be printed in the RECORD and referred to the appropriate committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The communication is referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The communication referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 22, 1918.

SIR: In compliance with resolution of the House of Representatives under date of May 13, 1918, a copy of which is hereto attached, there is transmitted herewith a statement showing the distribution of the cash holdings of the Treasury as of the beginning of business on April 1, 1918, and the Treasury balance on that date.

The location of the cash holdings of the Treasury offices are not shown in the statement transmitted by reason of the fact that it is not believed to be compatible with the public interest at the present time to disclose such location in this report.

Interest on deposits in special depositaries (war-loan accounts) under the act of September 24, 1917, on deposits in Federal land banks, and on deposits in national-bank depositaries as per items (3), (4), and (6), respectively, in the inclosed statement, is collected at the rate of 2 per cent per annum on the average daily balance in each case. In this connection attention is respectfully invited to the fact that deposits in special depositaries under the act of September 24, 1917, are of a very temporary character, being withdrawn, as a general rule, between three and five weeks from dates of deposit.

Should any further detail information with reference to this report be desired, I will be glad to transmit it as promptly as possible.

Respectfully,

W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
May 13, 1918.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the House the amount of the Treasury balance on the 1st day of April, 1918, where the same was on deposit, and the rate of interest being received thereon from each depositary.

Attest: (Signed) SOUTH TRIMBLE, Clerk.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 29, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, Heavenly Father, our salvation and our strength, a very present help in trouble, we thank Thee that in pursuance to a concurrent resolution passed by the Congress the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, has set apart a day of prayer and fasting for the success of our arms and those of our allies in the great struggle for liberty, truth, justice, righteousness; and we pray that from every heart, in every home, in every State throughout the Union, a fervent prayer may ascend to the Throne of Heaven in behalf of a just and righteous cause, that peace may smile upon the world, its pursuits, make it blossom as the rose, joy and happiness reign in every home, and war be forever banished; and we will praise Thee forever in the name of the world's Great Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 12280. An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3790) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following House concurrent resolution:

House concurrent resolution 43.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed as a House document 1,500 copies of the Journal of the Fifty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the year 1918, not to exceed $1,700 in cost, with illustrations, 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House and 500 for the use of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the transportation of men and women in the military service of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the transportation of men and women in the Army. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12281.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12281, the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And also, for the establishment, equipment, maintenance, and operation of aviation stations, fields for testing and experimental work, including (a) the acquisition of land, or any interest in land, with any buildings and improvements thereon, by purchase, lease, donation, condemnation, or otherwise: Provided, That by order of the President any unappropriated or reserved public lands may be reserved from entry, designated, and used for such aviation stations or fields for testing and experimental work; (b) the improvement of such land by clearing, draining, seeding, and otherwise making the same suitable for the purpose intended; (c) procuring and introducing water, electric light and power, telephones, telegraph, and sewerage to aviation stations, testing or experimental fields, and buildings and structures thereon by the extension of existing systems or the creation of new systems and their maintenance, operation, and repair, installation of plumbing, electric fixtures, and telephones, fire apparatus and fire-alarm systems, and the maintenance, operation, and repair of all such systems, fixtures, and apparatus; (d) purchase of stoves and other cooking and heating apparatus, kitchen and tableware, and furniture and equipment for kitchens, mess halls, offices, quarters, barracks, hospitals, and other buildings, screens, lockers, refrigerators, and all other necessary equipment; (e) purchase of special lubricating oil, fuel, and all supplies of every kind and character necessary or advisable for maintenance and operation of aviation stations, and airplanes and motor vehicles, including electric light and power, telephones, water supply, and sewerage service; (f) purchase and manufacture and installation of all kinds of machinery, tools, material, supplies, and equipment for construction, maintenance, and repair of aircraft, buildings, and improvements at aviation stations and testing and experimental stations, or property or appliances used in connection with aviation.

OUR MEMORIAL DAY.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, on the morrow, in accordance with long-established custom, the Nation will pause to pay homage to its honored dead and to place silent yet eloquent tributes upon the graves of those heroes who in the dark days of sixty-one went forth to battle for the preservation of the Union.

But, sir, the day at this time has a peculiar significance. Our President has by proclamation designated this hallowed occasion as a day of fasting and prayer and so in venerating the memory of its fallen soldiers we may also be mindful of the soldier boys of to-day, and unite in breathing a prayer of thanksgiving for the achievements of the soldiers of other days and of supplication for those of to-day.

As the President has so nobly expressed it in the words of his proclamation:

And whereas it has always been the reverent habit of the people of the United States to turn in humble appeal to Almighty God for His guidance in the affairs of this common life:

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim Thursday, the 30th day of May, a day always freighted with sacred and stimulating memories, a day of public humiliation, prayer and fasting, and do exhort my fellow citizens of all faiths and creeds to assemble on that day in their several places of worship and there, as well as in their homes, to pray Almighty God that He may forgive our sins and shortcomings as a people and purify our hearts to see and love the truth, to accept and defend all things that are just and right, and to purpose only those righteous acts and judgments which are in conformity with His will, beseeching Him that He will give victory to our armies as they fight for freedom, wisdom to those who take counsel on our behalf in these days of dark struggle and perplexity, and steadfastness to our people to make sacrifice to the utmost in support of what is just and true, bringing us at last the peace in which men's hearts can be at rest because it is founded upon mercy, justice, and good will.

We are reminded of those early days of 1775 and 1776, culminating in that immortal document the Declaration of Independence, and as the fathers were then imbued with the spirit of liberty so we to-day are inspired not only to vindicate our rights as a free people to protect our flag and our citizens but we go forth to battle for humanity and civilization and to preserve those principles without which the world must lapse into darkness and barbarism. [Applause.]

The United States of America has long been hailed as the "land of opportunity" for every well-meaning individual and as a haven for the oppressed. But in these days the Republic meets with its opportunity and with the spirit of the early days hovering over us, with the inspiration of the sacrifices of the heroes of the Civil War, sacrifices by the men in the blue and the men in gray, for both were prompted by their convictions of the righteousness of their cause, we go forth to avail ourselves of the Nation's great opportunity.

Ah, my colleagues fortunate we are that we have as Chief Executive and the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, one who can so magnificently express the aspirations of America, the ideals of the Republic, and the hopes of the liberty-loving people throughout the earth. He may truly be called "the spokesman of liberty." However much men may differ on economic policies or on questions dividing the two great political parties in our country to-day, how patriotically these partisan matters have been put aside.

Our purpose, our desires, and our understanding in this terrible crisis have been set forth by our President, clearly and unselfishly, and we as a united people rally about our banner, now the model of a world emblem, with confidence and courage and with pure vision.

We know that gloom and depression may await us from time to time as we proceed along war's highway, but we know also that the pages of history show no permanent setback or pause in the march of progress and civilization.

For our boys now facing the enemy and for those on the sea, and for those in preparation, and those to be called let our fervent prayers go to the Almighty, for their preservation, success, and guidance and for our own confidence and steadfastness, and that the victory which awaits us may not be long delayed.

Let us as a people unite in thought, word, and action.

Let us recall the sentiments of the signers of the Declaration of Independence and apply them to our present situation and to our declaration of war, passed by the Congress in the early days of April, 1917; and for the support of that declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence we pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

And also, for creating, maintaining, and operating at technical schools and colleges courses of instruction for aviation students, including cost of instruction, equipment, and supplies necessary for instruction, and subsistence of students while receiving such instruction, $884,304,758.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We are about half way through the aviation language as near as I can tell by hastily turning over the pages of the bill. This appropriates now or reappropriates or makes available all unexpended balances, as I gather from a hasty glance, heretofore appropriated for aviation, adding to it also $884,000,000 plus. I can not with a hasty reading conceive of anything that is not covered in the way of authority for preparation of this service, including creation of schools, colleges, instruction anywhere and everywhere without limit. I am not criticizing that, perhaps it is necessary. Of course, we have got to have faith in making these appropriations, as well as other appropriations, in the administration in the expenditure of the money. If it is not a wise expenditure we are in a bad way, because you can not conceive of anything in connection with this service that can not be done, and perhaps ought to be that way; but I would like to know how much there is now unexpended, how much contracted for that has not been paid, and is being appropriated for either in this bill or by the deficiency bill.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, there are so many figures involved in this bill that my memory may not be exactly accurate. I put in the RECORD on yesterday the amount that had been actually spent up to the 30th of April, and the balance that had been contracted for, and my recollection is that the amount expended was about $316,000,000, and the amount contracted for was about $433,000,000, in round numbers.

Mr. CANNON. That makes——

Mr. DENT. Makes about $749,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. Seven hundred and forty-nine millions, and there is yet available for expenditure, how much?

Mr. DENT. Four hundred and thirty-three million.

Mr. CANNON. Yet available?

Mr. DENT. That has all been contracted for.

Mr. CANNON. I do not ask the gentleman to be exactly accurate, but there has already been paid out of the Treasury——

Mr. DENT. More than $300,000,000 of the appropriations made last year.

Mr. CANNON. More than $300,000,000.

Mr. DENT. Three hundred and sixteen million dollars.

Mr. CANNON. And there have been contracted for $400,000,000?

Mr. DENT. More; $433,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. And there is available by authority of legislation and appropriation and authority to contract, how much?

Mr. DENT. All that is contracted for.

Mr. CANNON. Is the whole of it obligated?

Mr. DENT. The balance that has been unexpended.

Mr. CANNON. And only about $316,000,000 actually paid out?

Mr. DENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. And then we add thereto $884,000,000, $304,000,000 being additional appropriations?

Mr. DENT. That is in order to carry out the air program for next year, the total program.

Mr. CANNON. This is available in foreign countries and available in the United States and covers everything, being enough and general enough to cover any possible expenditure that might be made for this service?

Mr. DENT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CANNON. Including education and that kind of thing?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. How many aviation stations are there now?

Mr. DENT. Twenty-seven.

Mr. CANNON. Twenty-seven, in round numbers. Is it contemplated, if the gentleman knows from the hearings, to expend any more money to erect additional aviation stations? In fact, there is power, of course, to erect 27 or even 100 more stations.

Mr. DENT. My recollection is not distinct upon that subject, so I would like to consult the record.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. If the gentleman will permit me, Gen. March testified before the committee that it was not the intention to construct any more aviation camps, although we might possibly have to construct one or two more. They expected filling and refilling what they had as fast as possible.

Mr. DENT. And possibly they would construct two or three more, but that program has not been agreed upon.

Mr. CANNON. That being the case, did the committee consider the wisdom or possibility that there would be two or three more constructed, to be added to the 27? Did they take into consideration the propriety of limiting the construction of additional plants, say, to 2, 3, 5, or 10?

Mr. DENT. The committee never considered putting any limitation on the War Department in that matter.

Mr. CANNON. Still, the committee is satisfied it will not be done.

Mr. DENT. All the committee knows is the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT], a member of the committee, as to what Gen. March said.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Gen. March did say that there would be from two to three?

Mr. DENT. Probably; but that program has not been agreed upon.

Mr. CANNON. Was he asked?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that he expressed himself more on the point that there would not be any, but if men were called out more rapidly than now anticipated there might be two or three more.

Mr. CANNON. Well, in peace we would not think of doing anything more than to appropriate for the present, and the two or three or four more, as the case might be; but there is absolutely no limitation here.

Mr. DENT. No one made any suggestion to the committee that there ought to be any limitation put upon the War Department in this matter in time of war.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If I may be permitted to suggest, I think we will find that there is a natural and automatic limitation because of the scarcity of men who are competent to teach fliers. There are not enough men now for what aviation camps we have in service, and there are not likely to be any for some time to come in excess of the number now sufficient for the camps we have established.

Mr. CANNON. I notice, however, that we can get those who are not American citizens. We can get them from our allies, and pay them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois be given five minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I just want information. I thank the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If I may be permitted to continue, those additional men we get occasionally from our allies are simply the few that can be spared from the front and who have perhaps made some distinguished record and are entitled to a change and rest and whose splendid accomplishments make them splendid teachers. But they are limited in number and, of course, could not take care of the great bulk of the men.

Mr. CANNON. It is the condition that limits?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Was he asked if it was contemplated to take men and educate them from the ground up? He has power to send them to college.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. The provisions contained in the bill permit him to send them to college for special training for aviation purposes. The Aviation Section has organized some schools where they teach men to be mechanicians, so that they can become proficient in the art of producing planes and repairing planes. The matter of fact is that the Aviation Section now has on its rolls more applicants for training as fliers than they can accommodate. It will take many months, I am told, before all those who are now on the rolls awaiting an opportunity to be trained can be sent to the various schools for training. Their school facilities are all taken at the present time. Of course it takes some months to train them in the ground school; it takes some months to train them in flying. I think in flying it takes all of six months, and probably longer. In the ground schools they generally take three months. But those schools are kept going and are turning out men for the service just as rapidly as they can be turned out.

Mr. CANNON. I did not intend to offer any amendment to this bill, but I wanted to be informed. If it had been possible in the judgment of the committee reporting this bill to have made ample provisions and put some limitation in, whatever it might be, it seems to me that possibly it might have been wise. I am not one of those who seek to make trouble by word or interview in any way as to Army expenditures. But suppose there is somebody that has unlimited authority who is so inclined, might that criticism have been avoided by placing an ample limitation instead of giving unbounded authority, as the department would have, to take 10,000 or 50,000 or 100,000? I am not intimating that they would.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If I may say so, of course there would be no purpose in establishing a school in addition to those already in existence if there were no persons to teach in that school, and they are hard up for teachers now in the schools that they have. It is a peculiar art and one that requires such a time in which to acquire proficiency and competency that it is evident it will be at least several months before they will be even threatened with a surplus of competent teachers.

Mr. CANNON. In the present condition as to aeroplanes and engines there is much of criticism, and I do not know whether it is well founded or not. I hope and trust and believe that it is not well founded. However, it may be well founded to some extent. The query is: If there had been greater care in placing limitations, if that had been possible, in the appropriation of the great lump sum, might we not have avoided, perhaps, much of useless criticism?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The trouble is that in aviation it is literally true that the sky is the limit. Nobody knows exactly how much you can or must provide for.

Mr. CANNON. That is all. I beg the gentleman's pardon for not having read his remarks in the RECORD, but we are all so busy, you know, and the print is so fine, that gentlemen have to be more industrious than I am to get outside of everything that is going on.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the trouble with last year's appropriation was not the fact that there were no limitations on the expenditure of the money, but the trouble was due to the lack of business judgment and common sense on the part of the men in whose charge those great appropriations were placed. The mistakes were that they did not proceed at once with the manufacture of approved types of foreign engines and foreign planes, but instead wasted five or six months of valuable time in trying to develop an engine of their own.

That, in my opinion, is the one and only reason why we have not secured the adequate supply of combat planes that we were promised by the War Department when they asked for the big program of last year, and, in my opinion, it is explained in no other way. But this House and the committee have got to place some degree of reliance in the hope that those responsible will avoid the errors of last year, and from the fact that they have recently really made some progress, as I believe they have, gives me confidence that from now on we will get dollar for dollar in airplanes out of the immense sum we are again appropriating for this year.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Is it not a fact that time was necessary to build these factories and to create this organization and prepare these men and officers to train the fliers? Was not that one cause of the delay?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but the vital mistake the department made was that it did not take advantage of existing manufacturing facilities to secure immediate production. For example, a contract was placed with the Curtiss Co. for Spad machines, an approved type of French pursuit machine. That factory was making good progress toward the manufacture of those machines and the fulfillment of the contract when the order was countermanded and they were put to work at something else. Mr. Potter told us the other day that he would have been glad if the Curtiss Co. had been permitted to carry out the original contract, because we would then have had these Spad machines by now in actual use on the American fighting lines in France, where they are so badly needed.

Mr. GORDON. Was that not one of the contracts countermanded by command of Gen. Pershing, who ordered them to stop?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not care who made the order. It was a fatal blunder. There is no reason why the department should have given or approved such an order on somebody else's say so.

Mr. GORDON. I understand they gave it on Gen. Pershing's order.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. At what point have they arrived in the preparation now?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is my understanding that they have developed a large number of plants, and that from now on production will come through in fairly good shape. Blunders have been made in the past through the lack of the exercise of common business sense, as I stated.

Mr. LITTLE. How soon will they begin to turn out the planes?

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe the production of Liberty engines is beginning to show results, and the production of planes is beginning to make itself felt.

Mr. LITTLE. I mean finished machines.

Mr. ANTHONY. We are getting some finished machines. Of course, you have got to get the engines first. We can not give the definite figures as yet, but we have to rely on the statements of the aircraft people.

Mr. LITTLE. That is the trouble. We can not get any definite figures.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. In the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] on yesterday he gave the latest figures of production that the gentleman is calling for.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is one thing that the members of the Committee on Military Affairs should not want to do. We do not want to gloss over the blunders of last year. I do not think this House should put itself in the position of apologizing for blunders that have been made and our almost complete fall down in the actual production of fighting aircraft. The War Department promised us 22,000 planes on the battle front in July for the $640,000,000 that we appropriated. Congress did its part; we gave them the money. Instead of the 22,000 promised, we will have inside of 500 battle planes on the fields of France by July 1.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It is much easier, in connection with anything that has been attempted, to criticize, looking through the hindsight, than it is to construct without mistake in the future. Now, I am not criticizing, because if there be mistakes I am not familiar enough with the subject to know whether or not they might have been avoided. I am not criticizing until I have further knowledge, and the only object that I had in asking the question that I asked was to ascertain whether the committee has investigated and thought that there might be limitations placed upon the language.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman from Illinois suggested that limitations be placed on this appropriation. What limitations would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. CANNON. I know that you have spent the time since last December on this bill, while I have been busy since last December upon other bills that took up all my time as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I am not suggesting limitations at all, because I know that sometimes "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." I am merely asking the question whether it was considered that this general authorization that covers, touching this branch of the service, all things, might not have been limited. I do not say that it ought to have been, but the question arose in my mind. I have eased my mind and will sit down.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois that it is the impression of the committee that the aircraft work is now in competent hands. As one member of the committee, I was greatly impressed by Mr. Potter, the civilian who has been placed in charge of the aircraft production. He strikes me as a high-grade type of American business man, who is going to bring some order out of that chaos, and is going to give us airplanes. I do not believe there has been any criminal graft in the dispersion of that $640,000,000 that we gave them last year. I hope that the President has not limited the scope of the Hughes inquiry to violations of law alone. I hope this investigation will be broad enough to fix complete responsibility for the failure of our aircraft program. I think Mr. Justice Hughes will be sent on a wild-goose chase if he expects to find criminal graft in the work of American Army officers. They are not men, as a rule, who do that kind of business. Their business methods will be found clean. For many years no scandal has attached to the administration of the business side of the Regular Army. There may have been and were mistakes of judgment, but I do not believe graft will be found in the military administration part of the program. I believe that we can safely intrust the expenditure of this $884,000,000 to the men now in charge, and I believe we will get results from now on.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman emphasizes the lack of efficiency in the past. Nearly every day we read in the newspapers of the loss of life at these flying schools. Is that a result of defects of the machines?

Mr. ANTHONY. We are informed that it is not due to defective machines, but that it is due to defective judgment of the men themselves. I have also been told by French officers that the loss of life which we sustain in our training activities is no greater than that which is sustained by the French in their training, and that when a man loses his life it is generally due to his own error.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is there any way of correcting that by more efficient supervision?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not. I think it comes largely from overconfidence of the man himself.

Mr. GORDON. If the gentleman will yield, Gen. Squier said before our committee that every precaution had been taken to safeguard the lives of these men, and that the loss of life in this country, in proportion to the number engaged, was less than in any other country in the world.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oftentimes it occurs that the machine collapsed, which shows that there must have been some defect in the construction of the machine. Are these machines which are furnished to these student aviators of a type that will reasonably insure safety in these experiments?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that perhaps one trouble is that we have had too large a variety of training planes. The department was compelled to order them from every available source, and instead of having a few models that they could absolutely rely upon and understand, we probably had a dozen or twenty models of training planes. There is perhaps some error there.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The subject is engaging the attention of the department, and they are trying to diminish the loss of life, are they?

Mr. ANTHONY. Unquestionably they are trying to extend every safeguard.

Mr. CRAGO. It was testified before our committee that the percentage of accidents to the number of men engaged in training was less than among the men who are driving automobiles in the country; that more men, in proportion to the number engaged, are killed by automobile accidents than by aeroplane accidents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman or some member of the committee a question. What bureau or individual will have actual authority over the expenditure of the $840,000,000?

Mr. DENT. The Aviation Section of the Signal Corps, recently reorganized by the President.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman refer to the reorganization made under the Overman law?

Mr. ANTHONY. Is it not a fact that the reorganization was made two weeks before the Overman law was passed?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to know whether the reorganization has been confirmed under the authority given in the Overman law.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the reorganization of the Aircraft Board took place several months ago, but that Mr. Potter took charge some time in February or April.

Mr. GORDON. In February.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was after the breakdown?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; and there has been no reorganization since Mr. Potter took charge. I should say perhaps Mr. Ryan, for of course he is at the head of the department, although Mr. Potter is doing the work.

Mr. DENT. I understand the reorganization is to be continued, it may have been announced, but it is to be continued as now constituted.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The $840,000,000 is mostly for the production of aircraft. Who has the actual authority over the expenditures of that money; is it Mr. Ryan?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; Mr. Ryan and Mr. Potter.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This appropriation comes in the provision with regard to the office of the Chief Signal Officer. As a matter of fact, will the Chief Signal Officer or any member of the military branch of the Government have the authority to spend this money?

Mr. DENT. I do not know that I can answer the question definitely. It is my understanding that they have separated the officers of the Regular Establishment of the Signal Corps from the aviation.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will it not be safe to say that it will be apportioned by the Chief Signal Officer but not spent until they get the authority from the Secretary of War?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Now, the gentleman says the Secretary of War.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is my opinion that the Secretary of War passes finally on every great expenditure.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It seems to me that a direct answer ought to be given as to who spends this money.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will refer back to page 8, line 8, he will find that $105,946,054.17 are appropriated for the Signal Corps. This appropriation is for aviation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Precisely; and that is the appropriation I refer to and the question I am asking. The chairman of the committee says the Chief Signal Officer has control, the gentleman from Kansas says the Secretary of War, and the gentleman from California says Mr. Ryan. Which is right?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman did not understand me to say that the chief signal officer had control of expenditures.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman said the most of it would be expended under the chief signal officer.

Mr. DENT. I said it would be expended under the men who had charge of the aviation section.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is that right?

Mr. DENT. Gen. Kenly is at the head of one branch; Mr. Ryan at the head of the other.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Have they concurrent jurisdiction?

Mr. DENT. No; one has jurisdiction of the personnel and one of the production.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman said that this was almost entirely for production.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Potter is chief of the aircraft production and, in my opinion, would have charge of the money for the aircraft production. I believe that on all of these expenditures the Secretary of War finally passes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman says that Mr. Ryan has not control, is not the actual head of the new organization; that he has not the disposition of the funds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask for five minutes more; I think we ought to know something about this. I am seeking for information, and I think the House and the country ought to have it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No two members of the Military Affairs Committee agree.

Mr. DENT. I do not see any great difference between us.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Kansas says that Mr. Ryan thinks he has the authority, but he does not; that it is the Secretary of War.

Mr. DENT. He thinks finally that it goes to the Secretary of War, and of course it does, because they are all under the Secretary of War.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Potter is the real man, although Mr. Ryan is nominally the head.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The excuse given for the breakdown of the aircraft program has been that there was no definite authority at the head of it; that there was red tape; that men would make contracts and then revoke them. That is what the gentleman from Kansas said. I want to know whether under the new reorganization that has taken place that red tape is to be avoided and that there will be a responsible head who can go ahead and make contracts and have the contracts carried out and expend the money. Is that true or is it not under the new organization?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that an additional member of the Committee on Military Affairs can give any additional information.

Mr. LONGWORTH. We would like an additional authority.

Mr. TILSON. I will give the gentleman such information as I have. Woodrow Wilson is not only President of the United States, but is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. Mr. Baker is the Secretary of War and, under the President, has complete control over military matters, including these appropriations. The Aircraft Production Board is an arm of the Secretary of War in carrying out the orders of the Commander in Chief, the President.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not under the Overman Act.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, yes; exactly that—under the Overman Act. That is just what that act is.

Mr. LONGWORTH. At any rate, that is not done under the Overman Act.

Mr. TILSON. It has not been done as yet. I wish to go further and say that it will depend upon the Secretary of War as to which one of these officials really has the final say, because, after all, the Secretary of War has that authority under the Commander in Chief. Therefore, if the Secretary of War shall direct that Mr. Ryan as head of the Production Board shall control it, then Mr. Ryan will control it. If the Secretary of War says that Mr. Potter shall control it, he will control it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the Secretary of War not yet spoken? Has he not made any order of that sort?

Mr. TILSON. I have not seen any order of that kind.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, so far as the gentleman understands it now, Mr. Ryan is not in control and has not authority over expenditures or the making of contracts.

Mr. TILSON. I have this information: That Mr. Ryan has been placed, by the direction of the Secretary of War or by the President, in control of the production of airplanes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The President has designated him. but, as the gentleman says, the Secretary of War has power to say whether he shall have power or not, and he has made no such declaration.

Mr. TILSON. The Secretary has the power under the President, as I have stated. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is quite possible that the carrying out of these contracts will run further than the Secretary of War. I am told that Mr. Ryan is going west in a short time to investigate some said-to-be necessary railroad building into the Federal domain—the forest reserves—involving in one case the expenditure of nearly $3,000,000, and the final authority for the appropriation of that $3,000,000 may come from the Secretary of the Treasury, in his capacity as Director General of the Railroads, upon the recommendation of Mr. Ryan. To secure still more spruce than the Government is getting it is thought to be necessary to build railroads into the forest reserves. Otherwise a great supply of spruce for airplanes next year can not be guaranteed. I mention this to show how, of necessity, the authority divides.

Mr. TILSON. I do not know as to that or whether it includes any appropriation in this bill. If so I do not know about it. So far as the appropriations in this bill are concerned, they are under the direction of the Secretary of War ultimately—that is, subject to the orders of the Commander in Chief.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have had a very large amount of variegated information upon this subject, but as I gather from what I now know the authority to expend this $844,000,000 is in the hands of a certain number of persons unknown.

Mr. SNYDER. Possibly the same ones that had it before.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then where have we gotten?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in response to what was said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS]. I agree substantially with most of what he said; I agree heartily with his suggestion that we ought not to exaggerate or become hysterical in the criticisms of what is done by the departments. I do not believe that an investigation of this Aircraft Board is going to reveal graft. I do not think the officers in charge, either of the Regular Army or those drawn from civil life, have been grafters. But that serious mistakes have been made we all know. I wish to say a word about them from a little different angle than the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

What seems to me a subject for criticism is that after we had vested in the administration these enormous sums, soon after the outbreak of the war, for the first six or seven or eight months in which they were being expended, there was an attitude on the part of those who were spending them that everything was going smoothly and perfectly, and that all criticism was wrong; that no one should venture to make any suggestions; that there was nothing that needed investigation. That, it seems to me, was the attitude in all of the departments of the war, or of those who had control of these enormous expenditures, until the investigation and disclosures by the Senate Military Committee, and then because the country had been given to understand that everything was going so perfectly a revulsion came, and the country was probably overcritical, because beforehand they had not been allowed to be critical at all. It seems to me that there was the mistake, and now we find there have been blunders in other branches. This comes forcibly to my mind because I remember that on the 1st of February I went home to Springfield to make an address. I then told my people that whereas there were obviously deficiency and mistakes and sad delays in most of the war preparations, there was one department I was assured was up to schedule and doing splendidly, and it was the one bright spot in our military organization, and that was the aircraft production. I said that because only a few days before the Secretary of War and Gen. Squier had been before the Committee on Appropriations and had given us that assurance. I have since looked up the record of that hearing, and I find that what was said was not sent back to us and printed. I do not condemn the Secretary of War and Gen. Squier for stating that. I suppose one of two things was true—either they did not know the conditions of the aircraft production at that time, or else they saw good and sufficient reasons why it was not wise that the Committee on Appropriations should know, and I appreciate that sometimes it is not well for military reasons that department heads should take Congress into their confidence.

Now, I do not know which of those two was true; but I do know I felt rather mortified after I had made this very encouraging and I thought assured statement at home to find I was wholly mistaken and misled. And I think, as the gentleman from Kentucky says, it is not strange, it is inevitable, that mistakes should be made; but I suspect the trouble probably was that all the departments did not for several months appreciate the tremendous magnitude and intensity of the struggle, did not appreciate how valuable time was, and did not devote that intense energy and earnestness of purpose that the crisis demanded. And I think it was unfortunate that a policy was adopted of concealing from Congress and the country the conditions that existed, of discouraging and deprecating investigation, instead of recognizing that it was better that the truth should be known and mistakes admitted and remedied as they occurred. It was not until these revelations came from the Senate committee that the departments did wake up and appreciate and perhaps themselves for the first time find out that there were things in their jurisdiction that needed investigation and overhauling, and since then I am happy to believe that there has been quite a change of attitude. We know there has been an important change of personnel, and I am hopeful that during the last few months and at present our war preparations are going on not only on a larger scale but with greater speed, intensity, vigor, and perfection than they were before.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, replying to the last statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that the amount of money called for in this appropriation is to be managed or controlled by some unknown person, I do not think that statement should go into the RECORD unchallenged. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], a member of the committee, answered the gentleman completely when he said that this appropriation, as all other appropriations making provision for the Army, comes directly under the Secretary of War. Aside from the declaration of war and the act providing for the raising of the Army, fixing the age limit for the draft of soldiers, the number of men to be called into the service, and so forth, all other powers for the conduct of this war lodged with the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, assisted by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him. Is the objection of the gentleman to this appropriation that the person who is going to sign the draft or warrant is not named? If so, I ask him when did this House ever pass an appropriation bill of any kind where, when it made an appropriation, it specified the name of the person or individual that was to superintend or supervise the expenditure of the money?

Would the gentleman go out here in this 10-acre lot of new buildings, filled with hundreds of officers and clerks for the Quartermaster's Department, and when we reach that item in the bill would he have you specify the head of each of those departments to spend the money for fuel, forage, horses for the Artillery and Cavalry, and the thousand and one other different items, all of which come under separate items, all of which are controlled by rules and regulations prescribed by the War Department for their payment and for their settlement? If that is what the gentleman objects to, then I think his objection is wholly unfounded, and if he objects to the appropriation itself how much does he object to and how much would he want it to be?

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, I desire to say I am not objecting to the appropriation. I am simply asking for information, and I have received from various members of the committee different information. The chairman of the committee told me that this was to be expended by the Aviation Section. Another gentleman told me that it was to be expended by Mr. Ryan, another by Mr. Potter, and now the gentleman says it is to be expended by the President. I am in favor of the appropriation. I was in hopes that this new organization was one so that the members of the Military Committee at least could tell me as to whether the red tape had been abolished, the power to contract put in the hands of one man or one bureau, and that they now ought to be relieved of the chaotic conditions that broke down the former aircraft production.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I will give the gentleman, to the best of my ability, the information for which he is asking. It is in the hearing. On May 7, when the Secretary of War first appeared before us, a statement was made in reference to the reorganization, and in the first place it was stated—

> So far as the production end of it is concerned we have Mr. John D. Ryan, who is at the head of that, and he will be prepared to give you the information you want in regard to that phase of the subject.

Mr. John D. Ryan is at the head of the production department. On page 90 of the hearings the chairman of the committee asked Mr. Potter—

> What is your position?

He replied:

> I am chief of the equipment division of the Signal Corps.

He makes no claim whatever that he is the head of the production department. He states specifically that he is chief of a particular division under the control of the chief of production, Mr. John D. Ryan, and he is responsible to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War is responsible to the President of the United States. There is no conflict of authority, but it is very clearly and definitely defined, as I have stated it to you.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then the gentleman thinks Mr. Ryan would have power under this to make contracts himself and find the money to carry out those contracts?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. He has authority to make contracts and authority, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, to disburse this fund.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Just like under all the other departments, the Quartermaster's Department. They have civilians in various branches here occupying positions of this kind with reference to the Army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit me, I think it is the policy with this appropriation, as it is with all others, that something like a tentative allotment is made in the council of the General Staff, that allotment being based on the existing state of the military situation and different necessities as they are called for and given from time to time with constantly augmented information. They tentatively set out sums of money to be expended for certain purposes. Of course, they probably do not exercise direct control over the expenditure in its detail afterwards.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee admitted very frankly yesterday that there were more student aviators that had gone through the ground school than there were training planes for their use. Of course, that is a very unfortunate situation. That condition has existed, to my knowledge, for several months, and in order to relieve that condition the Signal Corps stopped all enlistments in the Aviation Section. I do not know whether they have opened up again or not, but they were stopped for a long time.

Mr. DENT. I understand they have not been opened up.

Mr. HUSTED. They have not been opened up. They were stopped in the early part of the winter. Of course, that is a bad situation, a very serious one, and it is one of the respects in which the partial failure of the Aircraft Production Board has injured the cause. But certainly the student aviators were not responsible for that condition and they should not suffer for it. Yet they have been made to suffer for it. Those men enlisted in the Aviation Section with the understanding that they would receive $100 a month and 60 cents a day for rations. Well, when it became known that all of these men could not be used in the flying training schools they were drilled as privates in Infantry companies, and their pay was reduced from $100 a month to $33 a month and their ration allowance was reduced from 60 cents a day to 39 cents a day. Now, if that had only continued for a week or two it would not have been much of a hardship, but it continued longer than that; it continued for a month or two, and it has worked a very great hardship.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. In just a minute, when I get through.

I have in mind the case of a young man who enlisted. He was 30 years of age and had a wife and two children. He enlisted with the understanding that he was to receive $100 a month and 60 cents a day for rations until he received his commission as a lieutenant in the Flying Corps. He was drilled as a private for a couple of months at $33 a month and 39 cents a day for rations, and if he had not had a little money saved up it would have created a very serious situation for his wife and his two children.

Now, I only mention this in order that it may receive the serious attention of the committee and that something may be done to relieve this condition. But, of course, it should have been relieved by producing more aeroplanes. That is the basis of the trouble. We did not have planes enough, and I think there are a good many reasons why we have not planes enough other than causes absolutely beyond the control of the Aircraft Production Board.

I think, in the first place, that they have wasted altogether too much time in experimentation; that they have not been practical; that they have devoted their whole energy, for example, to producing a better aircraft motor than any other aircraft motor in the world, without knowing whether that experiment was going to be a success or a failure. The practical thing to do, as any manufacturer in the country would admit, was to go ahead and build those types of motors and those types of planes which were known to be practical for war service, and then to carry on the experimentation work on the side in the hope of developing something better than anybody else had ever yet produced. That was the practical thing to do, but during this long period we did not produce any planes. They were experimenting on the Liberty motor. They were not practical in their work in the Aircraft Production Board.

And there is another respect in which they made a great mistake. They waited a long time before they would adopt any particular class of planes, and the reason they gave me for not doing it was, as they said, "You know the Germans have only two types of planes. Everybody knows that the allies have about 50 types of planes, and these types are changing so constantly that it is impossible for us to tell what type of plane to adopt." And I suggested to them if it had ever occurred to their minds that the time might pass by when planes of any type were needed while they were making up their minds as to the types of plane to adopt. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Of course, I am not authorized to speak for the War Department's policy, and it probably requires no explanation to this House why I will not. At the same time, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and present from time to time at the hearings in consideration of these appropriation and other military bills that have engaged our attention through the past winter, I have heard repeatedly the announcement from some apparently authorized witness that this change was made, or this plan was undertaken, or this system was adopted, or this method was experimented with, because Gen. Pershing sent word from France that he would like to have it done. And little by little it grew upon the consciousness of the committee that the War Department was deferring in most, if not all, of these matters to the advice, counsel, suggestion, or request of Gen. Pershing. By and by this idea materialized to such a substantial extent that it was officially stated in so many words that the War Department did not undertake to run the war in France from this distance; that it did not seek to impose upon Gen. Pershing any limitations that might not be well conceived at the distance of 3,000 miles across the sea; and that it proposed to leave his hands free and his judgment untrammeled, so as to be able to say at the close of the war that whatever happened to Gen. Pershing or his military adventure it could not be argued that he had been hampered or restrained or limited in any mischievous way by any War Department policy initiated on this side of the ocean.

Now, of course, that is a very wise, a very practical thing to do. All we have to do to obtain anything like a confirmation of our judgment as to that is to turn back to the pages of the story of the Civil War and to see how our generals in the field through those four bloody years were handicapped right and left, harassed and pursued, limited, hampered, and sometimes utterly defeated in their military purpose by the intrigues at Washington. I say it is undoubtedly a wise thing for the department to adopt that substantial basis for its policy—that Gen. Pershing shall have, humanly speaking, what he asks for, and with that, of course, we make no question.

But I am reminded, however, of a very natural and a very insidious tendency of human nature in this connection. I wonder if from time to time it has not already displayed itself rather covertly in the departments of the Government and whether we may not again expect to see it from time to time as the future develops.

Those of you who read and love the works of Charles Dickens will remember that in David Copperfield he had a firm of attorneys, Spenlow & Jorkins, and that it was the policy of this firm of lawyers to let Mr. Spenlow do all the business with the public in the front office, while Mr. Jorkins lurked down the corridors in an obscure office in the building and never was in sight. Every time anybody went to Mr. Spenlow for something that Mr. Spenlow wanted him to have it was all right; but any time that anybody went to Mr. Spenlow for something that Mr. Spenlow did not want him to have, Mr. Spenlow, to his great regret, and pathetically expressed regret, would say, "I would be glad to do this thing for you if I could, but Jorkins is obdurate, stubborn, and unyielding, and Jorkins will not let me do it." And so for years and years this firm carried itself along the primrose path of legal dalliance by Spenlow always charging off to Jorkins what Spenlow did not want to do. But one day David Copperfield, having, as he thought, a very serious errand to Spenlow & Jorkins, and being confronted with this customary statement by Mr. Spenlow, turned right out of the office, went down the hall, and faced the lion in his den. This was the first time it had ever happened to Mr. Jorkins. Mr. Jorkins was a mild, modest, peaceful little man, who did not dare say his soul was his own, and when David laid the case before him Mr. Jorkins took his hat and fled and was not seen there for a month. [Laughter.] This was the monster Jorkins upon whom all those things for years had been laid by Mr. Spenlow.

I will not follow up the moral and apply it, because I am speaking to men who have undoubtedly read it ahead of me. I do not know how many of the things that have happened and the things that will happen in the War Department have been and will be laid upon Gen. "Jorkins" Pershing in France, but I fancy that things that can not be explained in any other way here in America may be explained by the idea that Gen. Pershing wanted it.

In making this remark I do not want to be charged with any sinister intention. I am making it in all good faith. I think it is wise to give Gen. Pershing a free hand in all matters in a common-sense way, but human nature is human nature, and I doubt very much whether that policy, so announced and frequently announced, can always be conjured up as the proper and only reason why things are done on this side of the water that perhaps turn out to be failures. I think maybe if this struggle goes on and we are required from time to time to look into and investigate the conduct of the war we may very well keep in mind this suggestion. I believe it may yet prove to be a touchstone by which we can test out the origin of or responsibility for certain policies and satisfy ourselves about their character and reason for being. [Applause.]

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALDOW. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALDOW. Will the gntleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. WALDOW. Has the gentleman any information relative to the orders from Gen. Pershing, or anyone else in France, asking us not to build training planes at this time?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I recall no specific instance. I know only now and then that some particular thing is passed off at the moment by saying, "This is as Gen. Pershing wanted it."

Mr. WALDOW. Does the gentleman know of any specific instance?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am not referring to any specific instance, and I am making no charges as to particulars. I am merely making this suggestion in good faith. It is something that it will be well to remember and keep in mind when various important matters more or less certain to develop in this war are brought to us that we shall have to determine with great care.

Mr. KAHN. The fact is that the manufacture of training planes has been discontinued because they have as many as they require.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There is no trouble about making the training plane, relatively speaking. I understand its production has gone on quite satisfactorily.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. SNOOK. Can the gentleman tell me whether the $884,000,000 covered by this item includes everything incident to the support and expense of the aircraft program?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not know of any considerable sums in other places in the bill that could be charged off to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps.

Mr. SNOOK. Does this include the pay?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No. That is in the Quartermaster's Department. There may be some items which in a bookkeeping way trace themselves back to the Aviation Section.

But that suggestion leads me to another phase of this subject, which I hope I may be pardoned for dwelling upon for a moment. The gentleman's question was, in substance, "Does this cover all probable expenses of the Aviation Section for the coming year?" We mean to be thoroughly frank and open and candid with the committee in making the statement that, reduced to its plainest terms, the figures we have brought in in this bill are the last guess of the War Department, refined perhaps at places, certainly moderated a little bit in places now and then, by the guess we added to it. Of course such items as pay and the specific allowances that are set down to be spent for this and that and the other thing established by law are all regulated by the law itself, and the figures simply follow automatically in the bill. But when it comes to providing supplies for the Army and for unusual and sometimes unexpected contingencies for the maintenance of the armies in the field we have simply got to guess, and guess with a prayer in our hearts as we do it. There is no other way. One may very easily lay down, for instance, in peace times a certain definite sum of money, well limited by what practical experience and observation have shown to be a reasonable policy, and say that this part of the Army or that part of the Army shall have that sum of money, and no more, for its maintenance and maneuvers, for drill and training, and so on. That is easily done, because even if the sum shall not prove to be sufficient it is not a great hardship that the activities should temporarily cease along that particular line. But, involved in this great war, no man can foresee from one day's end to the other what sums may be necessary for one particular item incident to the support and maintenance of an army in the field. It is utterly impossible.

For instance, we will direct your attention very soon to appropriations which are asked by the engineers in the field. In normal times we could try to build up not only the amount of property in the shape of engineering field material that was necessary for drilling and training but a certain amount that could be added to the reserve supply always properly to be kept in store. But in the active operations in the field the engineers to-day, for instance, are trying to lay down some piece of engineering work. It is characteristic of this work that the material is largely expended in its use. There is no recovery. There is no reclamation of it under ordinary circumstances, especially when it is used in tactical operations in the field. But even at that, our engineers may lay down perhaps $100,000 worth of property of a substantial nature ordinarily likely to be serviceable for some time.

To-morrow morning the German has made his raid, he occupies that terrain, and that property is all abandoned into his hands and must be charged up to our appropriation account. Next week perhaps our engineers are laying down a pontoon bridge across a stream. They are starting it systematically, with material enough apparently to perform this very necessary task in the midst of a conflict. Then all at once they are surprised by the Germans, and the first attempt of the Germans is to prevent the laying of the pontoon bridge. It is so urgently necessary to the security of our troops or to the advance of our strategic program that the engineers persist in their attempt to lay this pontoon bridge. The Germans meanwhile are shelling it and destroying much of the material almost as fast as it is laid down. Before that bridge is completed perhaps there has been destroyed in the work leading up to its completion enough material to have laid that bridge several times over, all gone in the twinkling of an eye, as one might say.

To-day we have a million dollars' worth of shells in an ammunition dump somewhere in France. To-night an enemy aeroplane drops a bomb on it, and it is no more.

Those are only sample suggestions, but I hope they illustrate to you quite plainly how utterly impracticable it is for men to sit down here together, even in the gravest council, and try to see if they can approximate with anything like a sensible determination how much money we shall place against every item in this bill. It seems to me the only thing we can do is to be governed by the instinctive patriotic purpose that wells up in the heart of every one of us, and let so much of the restraints of bookkeeping go for the present. The only thing we can be assured of is such certainty of honesty of accounting as will show us by and by where every dollar went, and that every dollar went for an honest purpose through the hands of honest men.

Something has been said about the size of this appropriation, and the question has been asked as to whether the committee has employed its opportunities for examination of witnesses and other methods sufficiently to be reasonably certain that these appropriations have been prepared with something like proper scrutiny and care. I need perhaps only to suggest to you that as this item which we are now considering came down to us by estimate it was for $1,038,000,000. We have, through counsel with those who appeared before us and through some investigations as to the purposes for which these things were likely to be used or must necessarily be used, scaled that down to $884,304,758. Of course, that is no guaranty that the sums we have set against the items in the bill will be the limit of the expenditure, because certainly you and I know that if it became necessary to spend more in order to keep our Army in the field in this emergency we would shoot against the wall the man who obstinately and needlessly waited until Congress convened before he spent the money. There would be no question about that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did not the original estimate also include the $105,000,000?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is for the Signal Corps.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That has nothing to do with this?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No. So this one instance perhaps may be accepted by you as a sufficient guaranty of the good faith we have tried to exercise in scrutinizing all the other items of the bill and in scaling down the sums submitted. There is so much that we must take upon credit, there is so much that we must take upon faith, in the awful uncertainties of the world's most awful war, that we do not pretend to be exact after the manner of a cash register, but we do want to be sensibly liberal. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia rose.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I will yield for my colleague on the committee, Mr. HARRISON of Virginia, if he desires some time.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I want to go back to what was brought up here yesterday in regard to the cost-plus form of contract. I do that because in all of the war activities there was no misrepresentation which was more generally circulated in certain sections of the district I have the honor to represent than the criticisms of that form of contract. I took up this matter with the War Department in order to get a concrete and concise statement as to the truth about this form of contract. I have a letter from Col. Marshall, of the Quartermaster Corps, in charge of the construction division, which I desire to read. I also have the report of the commission on whose recommendation this form of contract was adopted, and I also have the form of the contract itself, which I will ask leave to put into the RECORD, so that we will have before us in concrete shape the exact truth about these contracts.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman state again what the nature of the contract was?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. The cost-plus contract, which gives the contractor a commission on the actual cost. The letter from Col. Marshall is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF CONSTRUCTION DIVISION,
Washington, April 18, 1918.

Hon. T. W. HARRISON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of April 10 addressed to the Acting Quartermaster General of the Army, with inclosure from Mr. Walter Campbell, of Luray, Va., has been referred to this office for consideration and reply.

It is unquestionably true that the most erroneous impression has been spread abroad regarding the real method of work pursued in connection with the construction of the War Department during the past months. It has been repeatedly stated, although the statement has been many times shown to be without foundation, that there was no check upon the contractors in the way of prevention of inordinate swelling of the cost of the work, and that the contractor could, by increasing the cost of the work, almost without limit increase his own profits pro tanto.

As a matter of fact, the contractor in all the jobs of any magnitude under the direction of the Construction Division has received a compensation which netted him a very low percentage indeed. For example, the average percentage of the entire cost of the National Army cantonments which was received by the contractors as their fees was under 3 per cent. The compensation of the contractor is graduated on a sliding scale, so that the higher the cost of the work the lower the percentage of such cost which represents the fee of the contractor. In addition to this, there is an absolute check on the amount which can possibly be received by the contractor under the form of contract used. A stated maximum is fixed, beyond which no money can be received by the contractor, no matter how much the job may cost.

Inasmuch as in most cases this maximum, figured on a percentage basis, was reached comparatively early in the job, it is directly to the interest of the contractor to finish the job as quickly as possible to decrease the expense of the same in order that his overhead may be cut down.

Inclosed herewith is a photostat copy of the findings of the committee which was appointed to make a thorough investigation of the emergency form of contract and to report any substitute therefor or improvements thereon which might be devised. The report speaks for itself.

Inclosed herewith also is a copy of the emergency form of contract, under which all work of any size under the direction of this office is done.

It is believed that this letter and inclosed documents completely answer the points raised by your correspondent.

Very respectfully,

R. C. MARSHALL, JR.,
Colonel, Quartermaster Corps, National Army,
In Charge of Construction Division.

The report of the commission and the form of the contract are as follows:

MARCH 15, 1918.

To Lieut. Col. R. C. MARSHALL,
Quartermaster Corps, National Army,
In charge of Cantonment Division.

SIR: The committee invited to advise in regard to methods of executing construction work under the direction of the Cantonment Division begs to report as follows:

The committee has not felt that a study of the details as to form and content of the contract form proposed is embraced in the scope of the invitation presented, and it has therefore limited its consideration to the purchase and hire method and to the various schemes of contractual relations which might be established for emergency construction work between the Government on the one hand and the constructing agencies on the other.

Broadly speaking there is but one alternative to the usual method of executing work through the process of letting it under some one of the various forms of contract, and that is by purchase and hire, which means, in effect, the forming of the operating organization, the purchasing of all material, and the hiring of all labor by the Government itself. The main objections to this method may be summarized as follows:

The most vital prerequisite to the successful and speedy prosecution of emergency construction work is an efficient field organization. This takes time and experience to assemble, and such organizations must be tried out to insure efficiency, and it seems apparent that the valuable time lost in such process is an insuperable objection to this method. The committee believes existing contractors' organizations should be maintained and fostered, as they constitute, in the opinion of the committee, important factors in the economic life of the Nation and of exceeding importance to its progress when the war is over. These organizations have been built up through the course of many years, and they should not be disrupted or destroyed if their services may be utilized in the work proposed. Serious embarrassment is likely to arise from placing employees on the construction work under the rules and regulations imposed on all Government employees. The difficulty of adapting such rules and regulations to the character and conditions of the work in the various sections of the country would be a very serious drawback in the judgment of the committee.

The administration of work under this method would create an unwieldy organization in Washington. The vast amount of the work proposed and its varying character, and the fact that it is so widely scattered over the country, would make it almost impracticable to attempt to administer it all through a central office, and if it is attempted to decentralize it by transferring final authority to each piece of work it practically becomes an agency contract.

Such a system might be applicable to a project of colossal magnitude under conditions in which time is not of the essence of the contract and might conceivably be a sheer necessity where sanitation, policing, and other governmental functions could not be adequately provided for in any of the usual contractual forms.

The committee finding none of the conditions which would recommend this method of procedure present in the emergency construction work contemplated, and finding on the contrary many serious objections, advises that the "purchase and hire" method be not used.

The committee advises, therefore, that the projected work be executed under some form of contract with existing contracting organizations, and the committee has weighed carefully the advantages and disadvantages of the various methods in common use, with reference to the particular problems presented by the type of projects and the conditions imposed by their emergency nature as well as the abnormal conditions of the labor and material market produced by war conditions.

A few years ago the lump-sum contract was the one most commonly employed, and for it were claimed many advantages for both parties thereto which are to-day found to exist in all the contractural instruments which are equitably drawn. There could be no possible objections to the "lump-sum" contract were the Government dealing with clearly delineated problems to be executed under stable peace conditions always provided that the bidders be selected for their fitness and capabilities to properly perform the work, but the committee finds the following vital defects to which it begs to call to your attention.

No steps may be taken until drawing and specifications are complete, the bids taken, and the contract awarded, and thus would be lost those precious months which may be measured not in dollars but in lives.

The history of war-emergency construction shows the development of many projects originally small by comparison into works of great magnitude and importance, and for such development the "lump-sum" plan is too inflexible to operate satisfactorily; administration costs must increase in adjusting important changes, while inequities and dissatisfaction are bound to arise. In such an unstable market as exists costs must be figured by the contractor high enough to provide a margin to cover unforeseen and uncontrollable changes in the prices of material or labor which would result in a speculative price which would be disadvantageous to the Government.

Your committee advises, therefore, that the "lump-sum" method be not used.

There is a variant to the foregoing which provides for a lump-sum contract to cover the original project, with a cost-plus remuneration for changes and extensions, but since the main objections inherent in the straight lump-sum method are present here also the committee advises that it be not used.

On an emergency contract of intermediate extent an admirable method in normal times is an agreed fixed price on such units of construction as per yard of concrete in place, per thousand bricks in the wall, etc.; but here again the committee finds that existing conditions and the extreme variations in scope of the work rob it of its sole advantage—exact adjustment by final survey. A fairly complete knowledge in advance of the conditions under which concrete is to be poured and steel fabricated and erected obviously controls a close estimate for the establishment of equitable unit prices, and so this method acquires many of the objections advanced against the "lump-sum" method. For these reasons the committee advises that the "unit-price" method be not used.

One other type of contract should be mentioned before presenting the scheme the committee unanimously advises, and that is the agency form of contract. The agency contract must be founded upon, and its successful use depends upon securing those absolutely essential conditions of mutual trust and confidence which grow alone from long and satisfactory association in the position of owner and contractor; its principal use is confined to undertakings of such magnitude as to be beyond the financial capacities of the strongest contracting organizations, and unless contemplated projects embrace work of so extraordinary a character we deem its use unwise, particularly as an agent could involve the Government in onerous obligations.

Having advised therefore that these various forms be not used, and for the reasons stated, the committee unanimously concurs in advocating what may be termed "the cost plus," a sliding scale fee scheme of contract for both general contracts and subcontracts. In its general application it enjoys the same confidence in the building world as to the equities as does the lump-sum contract, as is evidenced by its very extensive use. Its essential features are its applicability to projects great and small—its extreme flexibility with automatic adjustment of all variations in plan and scope. Under its terms the rates of pay for labor are known to be more equitable than under other methods; it requires for its successful application a painstaking review of the records and standing of contractors just as is now made under existing methods to insure the selection of an organization which measures up to the requirements of the contemplated project, but without working any hardship, since no one can escape the axiom that in the final analysis each job can go only to one contractor. The committee believes that one of the objections charged to this form of contract is that it encourages extravagance and holds open temptations to increase costs, because such increase is accompanied by increased compensation. The general form of contract now in use by the cantonment division, in which the percentage decreases as the cost increases and is broken by fixed fees at intervals, seems calculated to effectually check, if not prevent, this tendency. Moreover, under the contract proposed the Government retains the right to control the prices of most materials and of labor. Under these circumstances it does not seem to the committee that such an objection would have any force in relation to this form of contract. No reasonable objection can be pointed out by anyone possessing a full understanding of its equitable operation in practice, and finally this scheme appeals to the committee as possessing one qualification which must commend it to all thinking men—it permits starting actual work weeks and even months before the details are completely worked out and delineated, and permits the Government to push the job at any speed it may elect, changing at will its plan and scope, but paying only what the work actually costs plus a fee which is so reasonable as to be above the reach of fair-minded criticism.

The committee therefore advises for emergency construction work by the cantonment division the scheme of contract known as "cost of the work plus a sliding-scale percentage with a maximum upset fee."

Respectfully submitted.

E. W. Rice, president American Institute of Electrical Engineers, Schenectady, N. Y.

A. N. Talbot, president American Society of Civil Engineers, Urbana, Ill.

CONTRACT FOR EMERGENCY WORK.

CONSTRUCTION OF ———.

Contract made and concluded this — day of ———, 191—, by and between ——— ———, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of ——, represented by ——— ———, its president, party of the first part (hereinafter called contractor) and the United States of America, by ——— ——— (hereinafter called contracting officer), acting by authority of the Secretary of War, party of the second part.

Whereas the Congress having declared by joint resolution approved April 6, 1917, that war exists between the United States of America and Germany, a national emergency exists and the United States urgently requires the immediate performance of the work hereinafter described, and it is necessary that said work shall be completed within the shortest possible time; and

Whereas it is advisable, under the disturbed conditions which exist in the contracting industry throughout the country, for the United States to depart from the usual procedure in the matter of letting contracts, and adopt means that will insure the most expeditious results; and

Whereas the contractor has had experience in the execution of similar work, has an organization suitable for the performance of such work, and is ready to undertake the same upon the terms and conditions herein provided:

Now, therefore, this contract witnesseth, that in consideration of the premises and of the payments to be made as hereinafter provided, the contractor hereby covenants and agrees to and with the contracting officer as follows:

ARTICLE I.

EXTENT OF THE WORK.

The contractor shall, in the shortest possible time, furnish the labor, material, tools, machinery, equipment, facilities, and supplies, and do all things necessary for the construction and completion of the following work:

---

in accordance with the drawings and specifications to be furnished by the contracting officer, and subject in every detail to his supervision, direction, and instruction.

The contracting officer may, from time to time, by written instructions or drawings issued to the contractor, make changes in said drawings and specifications, issue additional instructions, require additional work, or direct the omission of work previously ordered, and the provisions of this contract shall apply to all such changes, modifications, and additions with the same effect as if they were embodied in the original drawings and specifications. The contractor shall comply with all such written instructions or drawings.

The title to all work completed or in course of construction shall be in the United States; and upon delivery at the site of the work, and upon inspection and acceptance in writing by the contracting officer, all machinery, equipment, hand tools, supplies, and materials, for which the contractor shall be entitled to be reimbursed under paragraph (a) of Article II hereof, shall become the property of the United States. These provisions as to title shall not operate to relieve the contractor from any duties imposed hereby or by the contracting officer.

ARTICLE II.

COST OF THE WORK.

The contractor shall be reimbursed in the manner hereinafter described for such of its actual net expenditures in the performance of said work as may be approved or ratified by the contracting officer and as are included in the following items:

(a) All labor, material, machinery, hand tools not owned by the workmen, supplies and equipment, necessary for either temporary or permanent use for the benefit of said work; but this shall not be construed to cover machinery or equipment mentioned in section (c) of this article. The contractor shall make no departure from the standard rate of wages being paid in the locality where said work is being done without the prior consent and approval of the contracting officer.

(b) All subcontracts made in accordance with the provisions of this agreement.

(c) Rental actually paid by the contractor, at rates not to exceed those mentioned in the schedule of rental rates hereto attached, for construction plant in sound and workable condition, such as pumps, derricks, concrete mixers, boilers, clam-shell or other buckets, electric motors, electric drills, electric hammers, electric hoists, steam shovels, locomotive cranes, power saws, engineers' levels and transits, and such other equipment as may be necessary for the proper and economical prosecution of the work.

Rental to the contractor for such construction plant or parts thereof as it may own and furnish, at the rates mentioned in the schedule of rental rates hereto attached, except as hereinafter set forth. When such construction plant or any part thereof shall arrive at the site of the work, the contractor shall file with the contracting officer a schedule setting forth the fair valuation at that time of each part of such construction plant. Such valuation shall be deemed final, unless the contracting officer shall, within five days after the machinery has been set up and is working, modify or change such valuation, in which event the valuation so made by the contracting officer shall be deemed final. When and if the total rental paid to the contractor for any such part shall equal the valuation thereof, no further rental therefor shall be paid to the contractor, and title thereto shall vest in the United States. At the completion of the work the constructing officer may at his option purchase for the United States any part of such construction plant then owned by the contractor by paying to the contractor the difference between the valuation of such part or parts and the total rentals theretofore paid therefor.

Rates of rental as substitutes for such scheduled rental rates may be agreed upon in writing between the contractor and the contracting officer, such rates to be, in conformity with rates of rental charged in the particular territory in which the work covered by this contract is to be performed. If the contracting officer shall furnish or supply any such equipment, the contractor shall not be allowed any rental therefor and shall receive no fee for the use of such equipment.

(d) Loading and unloading such construction plant, the transportation thereof to and from the place or places where it is to be used in connection with said work, subject to the provisions hereinafter set forth, the installation and dismantling thereof, and ordinary repairs and replacements during its use in the said work.

(e) Transportation and expenses to and from the work of the necessary field forces for the economical and successful prosecution of the work, procuring labor, and expediting the production and transportation of material and equipment.

(f) Salaries of resident engineers, superintendents, timekeepers, foremen, and other employees at the field offices of the contractor in connection with said work. In case the full time of any field employees of the contractor is not applied to said work but is divided between said work and other work, his salary shall be included in this item only in proportion to the actual time applied to this work.

(g) Buildings and equipment required for necessary field offices, commissary and hospital, and the cost of maintaining and operating said offices, commissary, and hospital, including such minor expenses as telegrams, telephone service, expressage, postage, etc.

(h) Such bonds, fire, public liability, employers' liability, workmen's compensation, and other insurance as the contracting officer may approve or require and such losses and expenses, not compensated by insurance or otherwise, as are found and certified by the contracting officer to have been actually sustained (including settlements made with the written consent and approval of the contracting officer) by the contractor in connection with said work, and to have clearly resulted from causes other than the fault or neglect of the contractor. Such losses and expenses shall not be included in the cost of the work for the purpose of determining the contractor's fee. The cost of reconstructing and replacing any of the work destroyed or damaged shall be included in the cost of the work for the purpose of reimbursement to the contractor, but not for the purpose of determining the contractor's fee, except as hereinafter provided.

(i) Permit fees, deposits, royalties, and other similar items of expense incidental to the execution of this contract, and necessarily incurred. Expenditures under this item must be approved in advance by the contracting officer.

(j) Such proportion of the transportation, traveling, and hotel expenses of officers, engineers, and other employees of the contractor as is actually incurred in connection with this work.

(k) Such other items as should in the opinion of the contracting officer be included in the cost of the work. When such an item is allowed by the contracting officer it shall be specifically certified as being allowed under this paragraph.

The United States reserves the right to pay directly to common carriers any or all freight charges on material of all kinds and machinery furnished under this contract and certified by the contracting officer as being for installation or for consumption in the course of the work hereunder; the contractor shall be reimbursed for such freight charges of this character as it shall pay and as shall be specifically certified by the contracting officer; but the contractor shall have no fee based on such expenditures. Freight charges paid by the contractor for transportation of construction equipment, construction plant, tools, and supplies of every character shall be treated as part of the cost of the work upon which the contractor's fee shall be based, provided that charges for transportation of such construction equipment, construction plant, and tools over distances in excess of 500 miles shall require the special approval of the contracting officer.

No salaries of the contractor's executive officers, no part of the expense incurred in conducting the contractor's main office, or regularly established branch office, and no overhead expenses of any kind, except as specifically listed above, shall be included in the cost of the work; nor shall any interest on capital employed or on borrowed money be included in the cost of the work.

The contractor shall take advantage to the extent of its ability of all discounts available, and when unable to take such advantage shall promptly notify the contracting officer of its inability and its reasons therefor.

All revenue from the operations of the commissary, hospital, or other facilities, or from rebates, refunds, etc., shall be accounted for by the contractor and applied in reduction of the cost of the work.

ARTICLE III.

DETERMINATION OF FEE.

As full compensation for the services of the contractor, including profit and all general overhead expense, except as herein specifically provided, the contracting officer shall pay to the contractor in the manner hereinafter prescribed a fee to be determined at the time of completion of the work from the following schedule, except as hereinafter otherwise provided:

If the cost of the work is $100,000 or under, a fee of 7 per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $100,000 and under $125,000, a fee of $7,000.

If the cost of the work is over $125,000 and under $450,000, a fee of 6½ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $450,000 and under $500,000, a fee of $29,250.

If the cost of the work is over $500,000 and under $1,000,000, a fee of 6 per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $1,000,000 and under $1,100,000, a fee of $60,000.

If the cost of the work is over $1,100,000 and under $1,500,000, a fee of 5½ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $1,500,000 and under $1,650,000, a fee of $82,500.

If the cost of the work is over $1,650,000 and under $2,200,000, a fee of 5 per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $2,200,000 and under $2,450,000, a fee of $110,000.

If the cost of the work is over $2,450,000 and under $2,850,000, a fee of 4½ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $2,850,000 and under $3,250,000, a fee of $128,250.

If the cost of the work is over $3,250,000 and under $4,000,000, a fee of 4 per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $4,000,000 and under $4,250,000, a fee of $160,000.

If the cost of the work is over $4,250,000 and under $4,775,000, a fee of 3¾ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $4,775,000 and under $5,175,000, a fee of $179,062.50.

If the cost of the work is over $5,175,000 and under $5,725,000, a fee of 3½ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $5,725,000 and under $6,225,000, a fee of $200,375.

If the cost of the work is over $6,225,000 and under $6,825,000, a fee of 3¼ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $6,825,000 and under $7,400,000, a fee of $221,812.50.

If the cost of the work is over $7,400,000 and under $7,750,000, a fee of 3 per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $7,750,000 and under $8,350,000, a fee of $235,500.

If the cost of the work is over $8,350,000 and under $8,800,000, a fee of 2¾ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $8,800,000 and under $9,650,000, a fee of $242,000.

If the cost of the work is over $9,650,000 and under $10,000,000, a fee of 2½ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $10,000,000, a fee of $250,000.

Provided, however, That the fee upon such part of the cost of the work as is represented by payments to subcontractors, under subdivision (b) of Article II hereof, shall in each of the above contingencies be 2½ per cent and no more of the amount of such part of the cost.

The cost of materials purchased or furnished by the contracting officer for said work, exclusive of all freight charges thereon shall be included in the cost of the work for the purpose of reckoning such fee to the contractor, but for no other purpose.

The fee for reconstructing and replacing any of the work destroyed or damaged shall be such percentage of the cost thereof—not exceeding 7 per cent—as the contracting officer may determine.

The total fee to the contractor hereunder shall in no event exceed the sum of ———, anything in this agreement to the contrary notwithstanding.

ARTICLE IV.

PAYMENTS.

On or about the 7th day of each month the contracting officer and the contractor shall prepare a statement showing as completely as possible: (1) The cost of the work up to and including the last day of the previous month, (2) the cost of the materials furnished by the contracting officer up to and including such last day, and (3) an amount equal to 2½ per cent, except as herein otherwise provided, of the sum of (1) and (2) on account of the contractor's fee; and the contractor at such time shall deliver to the contracting officer original signed pay rolls for labor, original invoices for materials purchased, and all other original papers not theretofore delivered supporting expenditures claimed by the contractor to be included in the cost of the work. If there be any item or items entering into such statement upon which the contractor and the contracting officer can not agree, the decision of the contracting officer as to such disputed item or items shall govern. The contracting officer shall then pay to the contractor, on or about the 9th day of each month, the cost of the work mentioned in (1) and the fee mentioned in (3) of such statement, less all previous payments. When the statement above mentioned includes any work of reconstructing and replacing work destroyed or damaged, the payment on account of the fee in (3) for such reconstruction and replacement work shall be computed at such rate, not exceeding 2½ per cent, as the contracting officer may determine. The statement so made and all payments made thereon shall be final and binding upon both parties hereto, except as provided in Article XIV hereof. The contracting officer may also make payments at more frequent intervals for the purpose of enabling the contractor to take advantage of discounts at intervals between the dates above mentioned or for other lawful purposes. Upon final completion of said work the contracting officer shall pay to the contractor the unpaid balance of the cost of the work and of the fee as determined under Articles II and III hereof..

ARTICLE V.

INSPECTION AND AUDIT.

The contracting officer shall at all times be afforded proper facilities for inspection of the work and shall at all times have access to the premises, to the work and material, and to all books, records, correspondence, instructions, plans, drawings, receipts, vouchers, and memoranda of every description of the contractor pertaining to said work; and the contractor shall preserve for a period of two years after its completion or cessation of work under this contract all the books, records, and other papers just mentioned. Any duly authorized representative of the contractor shall be accorded the privilege of examining the books, records, and papers of the contracting officer relating to said work for the purpose of checking up and verifying the cost of said work. The system of accounting to be employed by the contractor shall be such as is satisfactory to the contracting officer.

If at any time the contracting officer shall find that bills for labor, material, or other bills legitimately incurred by the contractor hereunder, are not promptly paid by the contractor, the contracting officer may, in his discretion, refuse to make further payments to the contractor until all such obligations past due shall have been paid. Should the contractor neglect or refuse to pay such bills within five days after notice from the contracting officer so to do, then the contracting officer shall have the right to pay such bills directly, in which event such direct payments shall not be included in the cost of the work.

ARTICLE VI.

SPECIAL REQUIREMENTS.

The contractor hereby agrees that it will:

(a) Begin the work herein specified at the earliest time practicable, and diligently proceed so that such work may be completed at the earliest possible date.

(b) Promptly pay for all labor, material, or other service rendered.

(c) Procure and thereafter maintain such insurance in such forms and in such amounts and for such periods of time as the contracting officer may approve or require.

(d) Procure all necessary permits and licenses, and obey and abide by all laws, regulations, ordinances, and other rules applying to such work, of the United States of America, of the State or Territory wherein such work is done, of any subdivision thereof, or of any duly constituted public authority.

(e) Unless this provision is waived by the contracting officers, insert in every contract made by it for the furnishing to it of services, materials, supplies, machinery, and equipment, or the use thereof, for the purposes of the work hereunder, a provision that such contract is assignable to the United States, will make all such contracts in its own name, and will not bind or purport to bind the United States or the contracting officer thereunder.

(f) In every subcontract made in accordance with the provisions hereof, require the subcontractor to agree to comply fully with all the undertakings and obligations of the contractor herein, excepting such as do not apply to such subcontractor's work.

(g) At all times keep at the site of the work a duly appointed representative, who shall receive and execute on the part of the contractor such notices, directions, and instructions as the contracting officer may desire to give.

(h) At all times use its best efforts in all its acts hereunder to protect and subserve the interest of the contracting officer and the United States.

ARTICLE VII.

RIGHT TO TERMINATE CONTRACT.

Should the contractor at any time refuse, neglect, or fail in any respect to prosecute the work with promptness and diligence, or default in the performance of any of the agreements herein contained, the contracting officer may, at his option, after five days' written notice to the contractor, terminate this contract, and may enter upon the premises and take possession, for the purpose of completing said work, of all materials, tools, equipment, and appliances, and all options, privileges, and rights, and may complete, or employ any other person or persons to complete, said work. In case of such termination of the contract, the contracting officer shall pay to the contractor such amounts of money on account of the unpaid balance of the cost of the work and of the fee as will result in fully reimbursing the contractor for the cost of the work up to the time of such termination, plus a fee computed thereon at the rate or rates for monthly payments set forth in Article IV hereof; and the contracting officer shall also pay to the contractor compensation, either by purchase or rental, at the election of the contracting officer, for any equipment retained; such compensation, in the event of rental, to be in accordance with paragraph (c) of Article II, and in the event of purchase to be based upon the valuation determined by the contracting officer as of the time of his taking such possession. The contractor hereby agrees that such payments when made shall constitute full settlement of all claims of the contractor against the contracting officer and the United States, or either of them, for money claimed to be due to the contractor for any reason whatsoever. In case of such termination of the contract the contracting officer shall further assume and become liable for all such obligations, commitments, and unliquidated claims as the contractor may have theretofore in good faith undertaken or incurred in connection with said work, and the contractor shall, as a condition of receiving the payments mentioned in this article, execute and deliver all such papers and take all such steps as the contracting officer may require for the purpose of fully vesting in him the rights and benefits of the contractor under such obligations or commitments. When the contracting officer shall have performed the duties incumbent upon him under the provisions of this article, the contracting officer shall thereafter be entirely released and discharged of and from any and all demands, actions, or claims of any kind on the part of the contractor hereunder or on account hereof.

ARTICLE VIII.

ABANDONMENT OF WORK BY CONTRACTING OFFICER.

If conditions should arise which in the opinion of the contracting officer make it advisable or necessary to cease work under this contract, the contracting officer may abandon the work and terminate this contract. In such case the contcacting officer shall assume and become liable for all such obligations, commitments, and unliquidated claims as the contractor may have theretofore, in good faith, undertaken or incurred in connection with said work; and the contractor shall, as a condition of receiving the payments mentioned in this article, execute and deliver all such papers, and take all such steps as the contracting officer may require for the purpose of fully vesting in him the rights and benefits of the contractor under such obligations or commitments. The contracting officer shall pay to the contractor such an amount of money on account of the unpaid balance of the cost of the work and of the fee as will result in the contractor receiving full reimbursement for the cost of the work up to the time of such abandonment, plus a fee to be computed in the following manner: To the cost of the work up to the time of such abandonment shall be added the amount of the contractual obligations or commitments assumed by the contracting officer, and such total shall be treated as the cost of the work, upon which the fee shall be computed in accordance with the provisions of Article III hereof. When the contracting officer shall have performed the duties incumbent upon him under the provisions of this article, the contracting officer and the United States shall thereafter be entirely released and discharged of and from any and all demands, actions, or claims of any kind on the part of the contractor hereunder or on account hereof.

ARTICLE IX.

BOND.

The contractor shall, prior to commencing the said work, furnish a bond, with sureties satisfactory to the contracting officer, in the sum of ——— dollars, conditioned upon its full and faithful performance of all the terms, conditions, and provisions of this contract, and upon its prompt payment of all bills for labor, material, or other service furnished to the contractor.

ARTICLE X.

CONVICT LABOR.

No person or persons shall be employed in the performance of this contract who are undergoing sentence of imprisonment at hard labor imposed by the courts of any of the several States, Territories, or municipalities having criminal jurisdiction.

ARTICLE XI.

HOURS AND CONDITIONS OF LABOR.

No laborer or mechanic doing any part of the work contemplated by this contract in the employ of the contractor or any subcontractor contracting for any part of said work contemplated shall be required or permitted to work more than eight hours in any one calendar day upon such work, such prohibition being in accordance with the act approved June 19, 1912, limiting the hours of daily service of mechanics and laborers on work under contracts to which the United States is a party. For each violation of the requirements of this article a penalty of $5 shall be imposed upon the contractor for each laborer or mechanic for every calendar day in which said employee is required or permitted to labor more than eight hours upon said work, and all penalties thus imposed shall be withheld for the use and benefit of the United States. Provided, That this paragraph shall not be enforced nor shall any penalty be exacted in case such violation shall occur while there is in effect any valid Executive order suspending the provisions of said act approved June 19, 1912, or waiving the provisions and stipulations thereof with respect to either this contract or any class of contracts in which this contract shall be included, or when the violation shall be due to any extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture, or to any emergency caused by fire, famine, or flood, by danger to life or property, or by other extraordinary events or conditions on account of which, by subsequent Executive order, such past violation shall have been excused.

In the event of any dispute with reference to wages, hours, or other conditions appertaining to said work, between the contractor or any subcontractor and labor employed by him on said work, the contractor or subcontractor shall immediately notify the contracting officer of the existence of such dispute and the reasons therefor. The contracting officer may, at his option, instruct the contractor or subcontractor involved in such dispute as to the method or steps which the contractor or subcontractor should follow with reference thereto, and the contractor or subcontractor shall thereupon comply with such instructions.

ARTICLE XII.

RIGHT TO TRANSFER OR SUBLET.

Neither this contract nor any interest therein shall be assigned or transferred. The contractor shall not enter into any subcontract for any part of the work herein specified without the consent and approval in writing of the contracting officer. In case of such assignment, transfer, or subletting without the consent and approval in writing of the contracting officer, the contracting officer may refuse to carry out this contract either with the transferror or transferee, but all rights of action for any breach of this contract by the contractor are reserved to the United States.

ARTICLE XIII.

NO PARTICIPATION IN PROFITS BY GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS.

No Member of or Delegate to Congress, or Resident Commissioner, nor any other person belonging to or employed in the military service of the United States, is or shall be admitted to any share or part of this contract, or to any benefit that may arise therefrom, but this acticle shall not apply to this contract so far as it may be within the operation or exception of section 116 of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1909 (35 Stats., 1109).

ARTICLE XIV.

SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES.

This contract shall be interpreted as a whole and the intent of the whole instrument, rather than the interpretation of any special clause, shall govern. If any doubts or disputes shall arise as to the meaning or interpretation of anything in this contract, or if the contractor shall consider itself prejudiced by any decision of the contracting officer made under the provisions of Article IV hereof, the matter shall be referred to the officer in charge of cantonment construction for determination. If, however, the contractor shall feel aggrieved by the decision of the officer in charge of cantonment construction, it shall have the right to submit the same to the Secretary of War, whose decision shall be final and binding upon both parties hereto.

ARTICLE XV.

This contract shall bind and inure to the contractor and its successors.

It is understood and agreed that wherever the words "contracting officer" are used herein, the same shall be construed to include his successor in office, any other person to whom the duties of the contracting officer may be assigned by the Secretary of War, and any duly appointed representatives of the contracting officer.

Wagons	.25	1.00

Fuel, lubricants, and labor not included in the above.

It seems that this form of contract was resorted to after this commission had been appointed to investigate the whole subject as to what form of contract should be resorted to. In the next place it appears that the average percentage received by the contractors was less than 3 per cent on the amount of the expenditure, and in the next place it is shown that they can make no profit by continuing the work, because there is a limit to the compensation which they can receive, and after the work has reached that point then they must do all the work that is necessary to be done without further compensation.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. What is that point?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. There is a maximum amount fixed in every contract, and they can receive no more, no matter what is the maximum cost. This contract is still in use in the construction department, as the result of long experience.

As to all these criticisms, criticism of these contracts, criticism of the aircraft construction, criticism of the medical department in regard to the care of the sick, criticism as to the construction of the cantonments, and criticism as to the ordnance, whenever an investigation has been made it has almost universally been found that there is not only a refutation of the charges, but a tribute to the efficiency of the War Department.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I will.

Mr. CANNON. Let me put a case to the gentleman. I want to understand this. Suppose the contract was for $2,000,000. Up to that point the contractor would get the cost plus. If it went to $4,000,000 he would not get the cost plus beyond the $2,000,000, but he would get the cost of the additional two millions.

Mr. HARRISON. After he gets the commission on $2,000,000 it does not make any difference how much more the constructions cost, he gets no compensation for it whatever.

Mr. CANNON. But he gets the cost of the extra two millions, although he would not get the cost plus.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. He does not get anything; the Government furnishes the cost, and his compensation for supervision of the work is the commission on the cost.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. He has nothing to do with the cost; it makes no difference what it costs because the Government pays it.

Mr. CANNON. If it went up to $4,000,000 he would get nothing in the shape of compensation for the extra two millions, but he would get the compensation, the 10 per cent on the $2,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. If the percentage was 10 per cent?

Mr. CANNON. Whatever it was.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I understand that the average compensation given to the contractors is less than 3 per cent in all the construction work done by the Government.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. HELM. It has been stated on the floor that there are about 2,000,000 men in the Army. In that number of men it necessarily follows that there are a large number of men from every vocation of life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HELM. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. The soldiers are used in France for construction work, constructing roads, railroads, and sent into the forests to hew timber. The point I want to get at is this: Whether out of this aggregate of two millions of men steps have been taken, or it is considered wise to undertake, to mobilize a construction force to be used in the construction of cantonments or such work as is now going on in Washington? That is to say, we have the engineers, we have the office of the Supervising Architect in the Treasury Department, we have the bricklayers, we have the masons, we have men who understand concrete and wood work; now, is it advisable or practicable, in order to get away from the extortionate and exorbitant prices that are being paid labor everywhere where there is work that enters into the cost-plus price, is it possible to organize out of these 2,000,000 men a sufficient force to do the construction work such as I have outlined, to the advantage of the United States and in the interest of economy?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I will say that only in certain branches of industry are there troops specially enlisted and organized—such as for cutting timber and so forth. They have what they call the forest troops. But it would not be practicable to take men from a training for field service, develop them to serve on the battle fields of France, and then use them for construction work.

Mr. HELM. Is it not true that in France we are constructing immense warehouses, railroads, docks, and all kinds of work along that line? It occurs to me that it would be no degradation for soldiers who were brick masons and stonemasons or carpenters if they were organized into a construction force, so as to save millions of dollars that are being wasted in paying carpenters $6 or $7 a day, men who never used a handsaw. It looks to me like a feasible, sensible, practical, and economical thing to do.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. It may be that the gentleman from California can state; but I understand 40 per cent of the people carried to France are not used on the battle lines, but used for work.

Mr. KAHN. If my colleague will permit, there are special and technical troops who do the very work the gentleman from Kentucky speaks of and who are employed in doing that work in France to-day.

Mr. HELM. Why could not some of the technical troops be used in constructing the acres of buildings that are now being constructed in Washington, as well as in cantonment work?

Mr. KAHN. They are used in France altogether in doing that work of construction. It is all under the Engineer's Department. These troops have been enlisted in the Engineer's Department, all soldiers, and they are doing this very work.

Mr. HELM. If the soldiers in France are doing that work, would it be any degradation for the soldiers in the United States to do it?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. It would be impossible to draft men for military service and then divert them from the military training into construction work, but there are men specially enlisted into units for such purposes.

Mr. HELM. In a war of this magnitude, where construction enters into it in such enormous proportions, where an army is useless without it, is not the organization of construction forces as essential as any other force in the Army, or any other wing or branch of the Army? Would it not be a good, common sense thing and the part of wisdom to select out of these 2,000,000 men a construction force?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. SNYDER. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Referring to the letter the gentleman has read, I take it that that refers only to the construction work of cantonments and does not apply to underwear, guns, and so forth.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I have a letter from Gen. Goethals on that subject, in which he says that that form of contract is not used in his department.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman does not mean for us to understand that not more than 3 per cent was made on any contract, but that that was the average of all the contracts.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. That was the average of all the contracts. I have here the statement of the War Department that says that the average is not 3 per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, permit me to make a statement concerning the largest cantonment, and I made the same statement yesterday, the amount involved being over $6,000,000. The site, three times larger than the other sites in the United States, was given by the people and amounted to $2,000,000. The contractor was to receive an upset price of $250,000. Certain figures were taken away from that, so that when he came to final settlement he had less than 3 per cent, out of which he paid the war tax, and when he was through all that was coming to him was much less than $100,000.

Mr. COX. How long did it take him to do the work?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Less than 90 days. He delivered the buildings ahead of time. They got so that they could raise 25 or 30 of these barracks in one day, and built them at the lowest cost of any cantonment.

Mr. COX. That is a pretty good wage for 90 days' work—$100,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But the contractor did not receive anywhere near that sum net. He was the chief contractor, and he put up all of the money through the cooperation of the banks, and he did not receive settlement from the Government until just a few days ago. He was not overpaid for a great and successful work. The haste required some overpayments down along the line perhaps, but when one demands haste one pays for it always.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] says in regard to the restricted profit on the construction of cantonments may be true, but I have come to the conclusion that the adoption of the cost-plus system by the War Department and other departments of the Government has led to a veritable riot of waste and extravagance in the expenditure of public moneys in the past year. While the profits of the contractor may have been limited, the cost-plus system has enabled those contractors to pay any price they pleased for labor and materials, and in my judgment much of this cost-plus work has cost the Government 50 per cent more than it should have cost, not only in the construction of buildings, but in the various other expenditures that have been made on the cost-plus basis. I want to call to the attention of the gentleman from Virginia the fact that in the construction of cantonments, it has been shown that where contracts have been let to the lowest bidder, as they were in a few instances for cantonment buildings, the cost was from about $70 to $90 per capita for the men housed, and where the cantonments were let on the cost-plus system with no restriction on the cost of labor and material, it resulted in a per capita cost of from $140 to $200. This has been shown not only in the records of the War Department, but in the records of the Navy Department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it possible that the President in his address to the House the day before yesterday, referring to profiteering concerning which he had information, could have had in mind those who have been making profits on the 10 per cent cost-plus system?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not able to read the President's mind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman recognizes that the President in his address did state that there was a large amount of profiteering going on, and that the departments had the data and that the information was available.

Mr. ANTHONY. The President could easily find and trace enormous waste of public money under this cost-plus system. In the investigations of the Committee on Military Affairs I for one followed that question up. When the heads of the bureaus that had in charge these vast expenditures came before us I put direct questions to them on this point. For instance, I asked Gen. Dickson, who was in charge of the vast amounts we are appropriating for ordnance expenditures, what he thought of the cost-plus system, and he said it was bad business for the Government and that he was in favor of doing away with it. That the results to the Government were not good.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is there anything in the pending bill that will prevent the letting of contracts in that way?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is nothing in the pending bill that will prevent it; but the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] the other day when he brought in the deficiency bill very wisely, in my opinion, incorporated a proviso that will save the Government millions of dollars. He provided that no work or contract to be made under or by authority of any provision of that act shall be done or made on or under a percentage or cost-plus percentage basis. The Appropriation Committee thereby condemned the whole cost-plus system, and that committee also provided that with any contract involving more than $1,000, no contract should be let until at least three responsible competing contractors shall have had opportunity to bid and be considered on that contract, all contracts to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, the Government reserving the right to reject any and all bids. That same proviso, in my opinion, should be in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does that apply to expenditures in the deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. Expenditures covered by the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was wondering whether the Committee on Military Affairs was leaving this matter of profiteering to the Committee on Ways and Means to be dealt with on a tax basis? It may be we will have to look into that during the consideration of the revenue bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The cost-plus basis was cut out by legislation in housing people at the various factories and in the construction of houses in the District of Columbia, and that clause amended to some extent the legislation that was enacted in the bill that was reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and for this reason, and this reason only, it was limited to $1,000; that when you build these houses and rent them they will need to be repaired, and it was thought this ought to be modified as to the $1,000, so as to enable them to keep up current repairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. In the gentleman's opinion do not you believe that this cost-plus proposition has caused a great deal of delay in the construction of buildings and different works that have been going on?

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to say it has undoubtedly caused delay, and the only excuse for it has been the Government was laboring under an emergency and demanded action regardless of cost or price. More than anything else this cost-plus system absolutely stampeded the American labor market, causing disturbance everywhere. Perhaps the first few contracts for cantonments which were let could be justified under such a condition of emergency, but now there is absolutely no excuse for the continuation of such a system.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Has not the gentleman heard of instances of that kind where there has been a very great delay in the construction of buildings and plants, because it cost more and the contractor would make more out of it——

Mr. ANTHONY. I have heard all kinds of statements in reference to the cost-plus system. The charge made by the gentleman from Illinois is substantially correct.

We are appropriating eight hundred and eighty-odd millions of dollars for aircraft in this bill, which will be expended largely under the direction of Mr. Potter, who is chief of the aircraft production. Mr. Potter himself stated in the hearings, in answer to a direct question, that he does not believe that the cost-plus system is a good one. That it is bad business for the Government. I believe it would be a good policy, therefore, to get away from a system that is costing the Government millions of dollars in waste and extravagance and that future contracts should be let upon a practical business basis.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am interested in what the gentleman is saying about the cost-plus proposition as compared with contracts for the cantonments. Are there any figures available to the Members of the House that show that situation?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that in the hearings published from the Naval Committee, under the head of "Cantonment construction for the Navy," figures are there given which show the per capita cost of such construction for the Navy under the cost-plus system runs about $180 to $190 per capita, and under the contract system—they let a number by contract—they cost $80 or $90 per capita. The only cantonment I know of which was let by the Army authorities on a contract basis cost $70 per capita, whereas the figures under the cost-plus system for all these other cantonments run up to nearly $200 per man in some instances. It is interesting to note that in the first estimates presented to our committee by the War Department for housing the first million men of our new Army the per capita cost in these estimates was $40 per man. It surely must be a wasteful and extravagant system which runs this cost up 300 per cent or more in many instances.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the expenditure of money appropriated for aviation, part of it will be expended by Brig. Gen. Kenley, the Chief of the Division of Military Aeronautics, and part of it by the Division of Equipment of the Signal Corps. Gen. Kenley will have charge of the payment for construction of camps, aviation fields, the salaries of employees, and officers in the Aviation Section. Mr. Potter's division will have charge of the expenditures for the contruction of aeroplanes, balloons, dirigibles, and the necessary machinery for operating those aeroplanes and balloons.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman give the committee what proportion of this appropriation will be used for the construction of aeroplanes?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, a very large proportion of the amount will be used for the construction of aeroplanes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If the gentleman will permit, I have here the exact item, and I will give it. It is $668,534,436 for aeroplanes and plane engines alone.

Mr. DOWELL. That is for construction?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. For construction of aeroplane engines.

Mr. KAHN. Now, in regard to the matter of the Aircraft Board that has been referred to so often in this debate, they have made mistakes in the past; there is no doubt about that. But when it was announced to the country that business men of the ability and standing of Mr. Coffin, of Mr. (now Col.) Deeds, of Mr. (now Col.) Thompson had been appointed to that board there was general satisfaction expressed in the press of the country and by the people of the country because those men were recognized successful business men. They had made a success of their own affairs, and it was believed that by patriotically coming to the assistance of the Government in this emergency they were doing a laudable and patriotic thing. Of course, the House and the country were led to believe that we would have an immense number of flying machines by the 1st of this July. The War Department itself gave out the statement that we would have 22,000 machines by the 1st of this coming July, and members of the Committee on Military Affairs believed the statements which were made before the committee. They had no reason to doubt those statements, and I honestly believe that the members of the Aircraft Board thought it would be possible to turn out that number of machines.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. COX. About how many will we have by the 1st of July?

Mr. KAHN. We have over 5,000 now.

Mr. COX. Have we them in France?

Mr. KAHN. We have a goodly proportion of them in France.

Mr COX. I have seen so many reports I would like to have some one state somewhat authoritatively.

Mr. KAHN. We went over that yesterday, if the gentleman will look at the RECORD. There are over 1,300.

Mr. DENT. Thirteen hundred and sixteen and 323 combat machines.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. NOLAN. How many of them were built in this country?

Mr. KAHN. Those in France?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Nearly all were built abroad—in England and in France. I should say there are about 30 planes over there now which were built in this country?

Mr. NOLAN. Developed and built here?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. And the rest have been built in France?

Mr. KAHN. And England. That is quite right.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. What are the prospects now in this department for turning out these planes? What does the gentleman believe from investigation as to what we may expect from this department in the near future?

Mr. KAHN. I believe that the construction is proceeding very satisfactorily at the present time and that there will be a constantly increasing number of planes and engines every week from now on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to bring out a little more, if I could, for the information of the committee, something in reference to the number of aviators that we are providing to operate the airplanes. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] questioned the reason for the closing of the aviation schools to cadets. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] brought this matter to the attention of Col. Arnold when he was before the committee, and asked him for the reason, and he replied that they have now 11,000 fliers and cadets training in the aviation schools, and when those aviators who are now in training in these schools are qualified and certified as fliers, we will then have enough fliers to require at least 40,000 or 50,000 aeroplanes, because it takes three or four aeroplanes to back up each flier. So with the present prospect for machines, we have now in training vastly more fliers than we can supply machines for.

Then, also, as to the number of enlisted men in the aviation department: The authorized enlistment was 120,000 men. They already have 138,000 men. This Aviation Service has been the most attractive service, apparently, of any in the Army. Men were anxious to get commissioned in the Aviation Service, which is an attractive thing for young men, because it is dangerous and the best paid service of all of the corps of the Army. Until a recent order of the War Department, a man, as soon as he was commissioned as a flier, received a commission as first lieutenant. Then he received, if he was a junior military aviator or reserve military aviator, an additional increase of 50 per cent in his pay. So the young military aviators coming into the service received pay equal to that of a lieutenant colonel of the Regular Army, although the lieutenant colonel of the Regular Army may have served 30 years in the Army.

This service was tremendously attractive to the young man. The aviator's service at the front is vastly different from that of other men in the Army. The Infantry and Artillery are in the front of battle, in the trench, and in the mud, and they have little opportunity to sleep when on active service, and that sleep is often in the mud and amidst the din of battle. The infantryman toils through the day and the night with his equipment on his back; the aviator and those who have charge of the machines that supply the aviator are miles in the rear, sometimes even out of the sound of the great guns. They have their quarters in which to sleep. They have the most desirable service, so far as the personal comfort of the soldiers is concerned, of any soldiers in the Army. So, because of the attractiveness, the better pay, the fact that the eyes of the world are on the service, young men came rapidly into the service. They closed those aviation schools because they had more aviators in training than there was any possibility of finding planes for. What we need most now is men in the Infantry and Artillery, who fight on the ground, and who must finally win battles. Because of the fact that the aviation service was attracting more men into the service than could be used at present, the department has closed temporarily entrance into that service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How many men does it take to care for one aeroplane?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. About 20 men.

Mr. KAHN. I think the testimony before the committee was that it required 30 men, but that they hope ultimately to cut that number down.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. To 20. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the average cost, if the gentleman can tell us, of an aeroplane—of a fighting machine?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have different prices here. They run all the way at present from $5,000 to $10,000, according to the cost of the engine, largely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's plea for the increase of the Infantry and Artillery appeals very strongly to me, and impels me to ask this question, which has frequently flitted through my mind in the consideration of this aviation question: After we have built the machines, after we have made all this expenditure upon them, after we have paid the flier this high salary, equal, as the gentleman indicates, to the pay of a lieutenant colonel in the Army——

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That has now been changed. They only get commissions now as second lieutenants, but up until the 1st of January they were commissioned as first lieutenants; but they still get increased pay, also.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. After we have employed 30 other men to take care of the flier and his machine, what is the net result of the use of the machine except the killing of one man up in the air?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In my judgment the use of the aeroplane is largely to furnish eyes for the Army. It is as essential as any other corps of the service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is exceedingly important as a matter of scouting work, I concede.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. But we can not win the war with eyes only.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would appear that the expense of the organization and the maintenance of one machine is very extensive.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. But very essential.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It takes a great deal of time to get ready. We will concede, for the purpose of argument and as a matter of fact, that as an eye of the Army the machine is of great value; but what is its actual value as a fighting machine, relatively? It kills one man if it comes in contact with the enemy.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. My judgment is only that of a private citizen and not that of a military man, but I think that up to date the actual fighting of the aeroplane as directed against an opposition army it is very limited. Occasionally opportunities occur for these men to attack from the sky the men upon the ground and effect some loss of life; but so far as the actual field fighting is concerned or being able to drive the other army from the field, I do not think that Army men claimed that the Aviation Service attempts or expects to do that at all.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will yield first to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Modern artillery operations are almost impossible under certain conditions there on the western front without observation planes spotting the fire of the opposing batteries and giving information as to their location. They hover over that part of the German lines which is the objective and signal back to the artillery several miles in the rear as to where the shot went and where to place the next shot. That is taking the place the captain would have in the observation trench.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that what you call scout duty?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is strictly combat work.

Mr. KAHN. If my colleague will remember, the testimony before the committee was that the airplane does a great deal of bombing work and destroys the airdromes of the enemy, the ammunition dumps of the enemy, the transport trains, and does all kinds of damage, which makes it exceedingly hard for the enemy to continue his operations.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think it could be stated fairly, as the gentleman from California has so well said, that the aviation department of the Army is absolutely essential to the Army. It has its particular province to perform, and because it was new and so essential our War Department offered special and attractive inducements to get young men to go into that service. And the point I want to make and call to the attention of the House is that the War Department has temporarily stopped these young men coming into the Aviation Service for the reason that it has at present and in training as many of these men as it could possibly use, and in order not to have a superabundance of those men, and in order to have these young men go into other branches of the service, they ask them to go to other schools.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. It was brought to my attention that a number of student aviators who enlisted under an understanding with the Government that they would receive commissions as first lieutenants were not in fact commissioned as first lieutenants, but as second lieutenants. I think an order was issued to the effect that all students in ground schools who did not complete their ground training before October 20, 1917, or, if in the flying school, should not complete their training and qualify before December 20, 1917, they could only be commissioned as second lieutenants, notwithstanding the fact that the Government practically entered into a contract with them by the terms of their enlistment that they would receive commissions as first lieutenant if they qualified in due course. Now, it seems to me that this was an injustice to those young men, and that something should be done to right that injustice.

I have the case of a young man who passed a very brilliant examination in the ground school, who went to a flying school, but who was unfortunate enough to be located in a flying school where there was a very inadequate number of planes, and he failed to receive his commission as first lieutenant. But there were other men who enlisted after he did who did not certainly do any better work in the ground school than he did, and who were fortunate enough to get into flying camps where there were more flying planes in proportion to the number of students, and who did receive commissions as first lieutenants.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have observed quite a number of young men who have enlisted in the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps who have not been called to the training schools. Does the gentleman know from any information he has whether it is the purpose of the department to call all those young men who have already enlisted in that department for training as fast as they are needed?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think they will be called as fast as they are needed. I think the reason they have not been called so far is because they have already enough in training in proportion to the number they need.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. These young men are of draft age and registered, and it sometimes causes confusion between the draft and their enlistment in the Aviation Section. That is the reason why I inquired about it.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Of course, that is a matter of administration, resting with the department, and they will have to administer that in the Army and for the country as best they can. Those young men and all other young men must take their chances. It is one of the incidents of war. The department will do the best it can under the circumstances.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. Instances have been brought to my attention where men have taken the training and were promised commissions as second lieutenants and have not received them yet. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am not informed as to that. That is a matter of administration in the department.

Mr. LOBECK. I was told that the reason why they did not get their commissions was that they did not have artillerymen enough, and that there was a necessity to have artillerymen of equal number to accompany them.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We can not win the war merely with aviators. We have to have artillerymen and other men in other arms of the service. As to the case mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED], there was no contract made by the Government. That was a rule or practice in the service. They went into the service with the hope that they would be made first lieutenants.

But when the service came to be expanded in Europe it was soon ascertained there that service in the Infantry was more dangerous than that in aviation, and consequently the idea of giving the aviators favors that were not given to the other arms of the service was working to the disadvantage of the morale of the Army. The men who had to go into the trenches night and day and stand there in the mud claimed that they served in a branch of the service which was just as dangerous as the service of the aviator, and that they were entitled to the same pay and consideration that others were entitled to; and so in the interest of the service and in the interest of winning the war those in charge of our affairs in Europe made the request to the War Department here that those young men should be given commissions as second lieutenants instead of commissions as first lieutenants, so that these young men are being treated exactly the same as the young men in the Artillery and in the Infantry and in the other corps of the service. Nevertheless they still get additional pay that the others do not get. They have a favored service, and receive better pay, and they have their air-service clothing furnished to them. In all they are the preferred service of the Army.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUSTED. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the enlisted men I have referred to signed applications in an application form issued by the War Department for commissions as first lieutenants?

Mr. GORDON. Lots of them signed applications for commissions as first lieutenants.

Mr. HUSTED. And these applications were accepted. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it is a wise policy to encourage these young men in that way to enter the service, whether they have a legal contract or not, who enter with the clear understanding that if they qualify they are to be commissioned as first lieutenants, and then when they are accepted they are cut down to second lieutenants?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think every one of them ought to be glad and proud to serve as an infantryman, artilleryman, or in any other corps of the Army. I do not think there ought to be favor shown to any branch of the service. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. If I may interrupt the gentleman there, I will state that we had this matter up before the committee and called the attention of the Signal Corps officers to this so-called pledge that has been made. Who was authorized to bind the Government of the United States by a promise to give a man a commission? The answer is that nobody was authorized to do a thing like that.

Mr. GORDON. And nobody has ever done it.

Mr. DENT. Unless some recruiting officers, in their zeal, may have led young men to believe they would get something which they were disappointed in getting. But nobody has any authority to bind the Government by any such pledge as that.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, the enormous sums carried by this measure for the support of the Military Establishment for the year ending June 30, 1919, exceeding as it does in amount any proposition ever submitted to this or any other legislative body, would seem to demand a much more comprehensive and detailed statement from the Committee on Military Affairs than it has been possible to furnish the House. The hearings before our committee were, at the request of the Secretary of War, held in secret, the reasons assigned for such secrecy being that to make public the facts elicited at the hearings might aid and assist the enemy, and witnesses were reluctant in some cases to answer questions propounded by members of the committee, assigning the same reason. Much as the committee may have differed from the Secretary of War, it felt bound to respect his wishes on this subject, and but for a change in attitude in the past few weeks the committee would not have been at liberty to give the House the information contained in its report and disclosed on the floor by Members on the first day of discussion in the consideration of the bill.

The enormous lump-sum appropriations made last year, carrying as they did a repeal of every limitation and restriction imposed by law upon the expenditure of the money, would seem to justify the House in demanding of the committee a strict accounting as to the manner in which these enormous sums have been expended or obligated.

In addition to the reason already given, there are others which are patent and obvious why this can not be done. Our Army in the field is 3,000 miles away, across the ocean. Requisitions from Gen. Pershing must be promptly complied with, or the money supplied with which to purchase them, and the officials of the War Department here must comply promptly with these requests and have no discretion in the matter.

After a preliminary inquiry made by the President of the United States a few months ago into the reasons for the failure to deliver aeroplanes under contracts made with the Government, the President ordered the Attorney General of the United States to institute and prosecute a complete and thorough investigation of the whole aeroplane program, including the contracts made and money expended thereon, and appointed ex-Justice Hughes as special counsel to conduct the investigation. After this action had been taken it would have been obviously improper for the committee to attempt to cover any part of the field comprehended by this special investigation, and it has not attempted to do so. The House and the country may, and I believe will, repose trust and confidence in the honesty, thoroughness, and impartiality of the investigation instituted by the Chief Executive and suspend judgment concerning the men and matters involved until the same has been completed and a report made. The necessity for appropriations this year can not wait upon a determination of the question of whether the money formerly appropriated was expended properly or not. Indeed, if it had all been wasted or stolen, Congress would still be under the imperative necessity of appropriating all that it believes will be required to provide this branch of the military service with the men and equipment to properly and effectively prosecute the war, and upon so new and technical a branch of the service as this your committee and the Congress are and will be constrained to accept the opinions of the Executive and his military advisors.

There has never been a time in the history of this country when the public interest so imperatively demanded the service and sacrifice of unselfish patriotism as the present. The vital energies of the people are being diverted and weakened by the mouthings and ravings of the "patrioteer" and the "profiteer." The motives of both are generally the same.

On April 6, 1917, Congress adopted a joint resolution declaring that, by reason of the repeated acts of war upon the people and Government of the United States by the Imperial German Government, a state of war existed between Germany and its people and the people and Government of the United States.

A recitation of these acts of war, the sinister, deceitful, and disgraceful misrepresentations which characterized the diplomacy of the Imperial German Government in negotiations with our own for nearly two years preceding our declaration, is wholly unnecessary except to say that all of them were in entire accord with the traditional foreign policy of the Hohenzollerns as defined by Frederick the Great, when he declared that he employed no ministers of state at home except clerks and none abroad except spies. Our declaration of war was a statement of fact, the truth of which none now seriously attempts to controvert or deny.

The union of the German States, followed by nearly 50 years of the iron rule of the Hohenzollerns, with universal compulsory military service in time of peace, rigorously enforced and financed by a rapacious system of taxation, supplemented by the enormous indemnity in money and land extorted from France at the close of the Franco-Prussian War, has produced the natural and logical result. It has converted the people of Germany into two distinct classes, masters and slaves, and has destroyed the soul of that nation. Disregarding and violating its treaties with practically all the civilized nations and every just and humane rule and established precedent of international law, this military autocracy, under the leadership of the Hohenzollerns, is striking at the foundation and reaching for the pillars of civilization. "What shall it profit a nation to gain the whole world and lose its own soul?"

In the light of all the facts no American citizen may now properly entertain the slightest doubt of the justice and necessity of the declaration by Congress of a state of war with Germany, solely as a result of the acts of the Government and rulers of that country prior to April 6, 1917.

Three vital questions which engaged the attention of Congress prior to our declaration of a state of war were—

(1) The prohibition against our own citizens of their unquestioned right to sell to any or all belligerents in our own markets arms and munitions of war. This question never came up on the floor of the House, because no bill to impose such prohibition was ever reported; but in letters to all of my constituents who wrote me on the subject I opposed the proposition and gave my reasons for such opposition.

(2) The proposition of withdrawing, suspending, or surrendering the lawful rights of our citizens upon the high seas was opposed by me in every form in which it was presented.

(3) When the President of the United States asked for authority and an appropriation of money with which to defend merchant ships flying the United States flag against unlawful attacks upon the high seas, I spoke and voted for the resolution granting this authority and appropriating the money to enforce it.

In his letter to Joseph E. Davies, candidate for Senator in the State of Wisconsin, on March 20, 1918, President Wilson said of and concerning these three questions:

> The McLemore resolution, the embargo issue, and the armed neutrality measure presented the first opportunity to apply the acid test in our country to disclose true loyalty and genuine Americanism. It should always be a source of much satisfaction to you that on these crucial propositions you proved true.

The votes cast by me in this Chamber and the remarks made by me on the floor of this House have been willfully misrepresented by the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Cleveland News, and Cleveland Leader for the purpose of discrediting me before my constituents. These newspapers have repeatedly charged that I have obstructed war legislation. This statement is a willful and malicious falsehood and not supported by a scintilla of evidence. I call upon the membership of this House to bear witness that since I have been a member of this body I have not only not obstructed any legislation but have tried in every way in my power to facilitate the proper disposition of every measure which has come before it for consideration.

The statement has been repeatedly made in these Cleveland newspapers that I opposed the declaration of war, although I voted for it.

On April 8, 1918, the Cleveland Plain Dealer says of and concerning me:

> From the beginning of America's controversy with the German Imperial Goverment these two sixth city Democrats have done about everything in their power to hamper their own Government.

The controversy with Germany resulting from the destruction of the Lusitania arose on May 7, 1915; it was finally ended by the pledge of the German Government, about one year later, to obey the law as to merchant ships. This pledge was withdrawn January 31, 1917, and was followed by the armed-ship resolution and later by a declaration by Congress of a state of war with Germany on April 6, 1917. If, as the Plain Dealer now says, I was "hampering" the Government of the United States in the controversy with the Imperial German Government, from the beginning of that controversy, why did not the Plain Dealer discover that fact or why refrain from saying anything about it until the spring of 1917? Why did not the Plain Dealer expose me to my constituents before my last reelection instead of supporting me? Why did they not support my Republican opponent, as the leading German-language newspaper in Cleveland, whose editor is now in an enemy alien internment camp, did? Why did the Plain Dealer say, in an editorial on October 31, 1916, of and concerning me, the following:

> The Plain Dealer, however, never doubted either the Congressman's honesty or his courage; nor has his ability been at issue, for foes as well as friends recognize it.
> The Plain Dealer believes now that the best interests of the twentieth district and of the country at large, so far as one Member's identity affects it, will be promoted by the reelection of GORDON.

I have voted for every proper measure to provide the men and money and mobilize the resources of the United States for the successful prosecution of this war and shall continue to do so while the war lasts and I remain a Member of this body. [Applause.] The legislation which I opposed was directed against the citizens of the United States and not against the public enemy. At the commencement of each of my three terms of service in this House, I have solemnly sworn that—

> I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter, so help me God.

The foregoing oath of office defines and points out the primary duty of Members of Congress and all others are dependent upon and secondary to it.

I opposed the measure to conscript the bodies of our citizens into the military service without first affording them an opportunity to volunteer in the National Army, the reasons for my opposition being stated in a speech delivered on the floor of this House, a copy of which was mailed to each of my constituents. I have opposed and shall continue to oppose any legislation which invades the constitutional rights and liberties of our citizens to properly exercise freedom of speech and of the press, my reasons for which were stated on the floor of this House and also to my constituents. Of more than 100 war measures enacted by Congress since the declaration of war I have opposed the enactment of but two—the draft law and the espionage act—and this opposition was directed solely and entirely to certain provisions in the bills which I believed to be unwarranted or direct invasions of the constitutional rights of our citizens. The persistent attempts which have been made by a portion of the public press—including the three newspaper I have named—and by many individuals to incite acts of mob violence and to stir the ignorant and lawless to invade the rights of unoffending and law-abiding citizens since our declaration of war is a disgrace to our common country, its history, and institutions. The protection which our flag has afforded to the downtrodden, oppressed, and persecuted citizens of all lands has always been the proud boast of American citizens. [Applause.]

This lawless crusade has resulted in the persecution and lynching of innocent, law-abiding men by irresponsible and lawless mobs; the only imputation of guilt, in some cases, against these people being that they happened to bear German names.

Every fire of unknown origin and every act of violence of which the perpetrator is unknown is ascribed to alien enemies or to their sympathizers by these inciters of riot and mob rule.

On April 12 last the Attorney General of the United States wrote a letter to a Member of this House, which was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in reply to these incendiary reports referred to, in which Attorney General Gregory said:

> The public assumes that there is a great deal of enemy activity going on in this country, and it is but natural that vague rumors are magnified into definite and sensational stories. The talk of damage done by enemy aliens in causing incendiary fires is an illustration of this. Repeatedly, both in reputable newspapers and in publications gotten out by citizen societies, exaggerated statements are made as to the amount of damage. Statistics show that, considering the vastly increased value of merchandise and plants, the actual fire loss to property of all descriptions in 1917 was not appreciably larger than that of the year 1913. Likewise, the report recently made by the National Board of Fire Underwriters shows, in substance, that during the past year not one fire has been clearly proven to be the work of alien enemies, and at a recent conference in the Treasury Department of all the men in all departments charged with protection of plants and supplies, it was stated without dissent that no instance was known of a fire caused, within the past year, by alien enemies.

Here is an official statement from the head of the Department of Justice of the United States which effectually places the stamp of falsehood upon the sensational stories which have been published in the past year in the public press throughout the country and which have formed the basis of inflammatory statements and wild rumors, which have been utilized to incite the ignorant and vicious against innocent and unoffending persons. The world-wide condemnation of the Imperial German Government for its willful disregard of the recognized usages of civilized warfare and the lawful rights of neutral nations and their citizens has been fully warranted and finally forced this Nation to recognize a state of war as a result of these lawless assaults upon our citizens and Government, but the American people and their officials should realize that in a time like this a special obligation rests upon all to protect the humblest law-abiding citizen in the exercise of his just rights. If the substitution of force or mob rule for a government of law is to be sanctioned by public officials, or even by public sentiment, those characteristics of American democracy which have made this Nation worth living in, fighting for and dying for, will have passed away. In some of the Western States the governors have prohibited the holding of public meetings for discussion of public questions, have invited unlawful assaults upon such meetings by their proclamations, attempting to withdraw the protection of the laws from persons so assembled, thereby inviting and inciting the vicious and criminal elements to commit assaults upon them.

In one case the governor of a great Western State called out the militia of the State to disperse a public meeting, but failed to get the troops there in time, and the meeting was held in spite of him, under the protection of the local authorities; none who attended or spoke at such meeting has been arrested or charged with doing or saying anything unlawful, so that we may assume that the meeting was a perfectly lawful assembly and entitled to the protection of the guaranties contained in the State and Federal Constitutions.

A measure was introduced in the United States Senate which was prepared and advocated before a committee of that body by an Assistant Attorney General of the United States, which provided for the trial of citizens in civil life by military courts, although the Constitution of the United States provides that no person who is not in the Army or Navy shall be tried on a charge of crime except by a jury and in a civil court, a powerful lobby was here in Washington advocating the enactment of this measure, and it would probably have been enacted if its provisions had not been exposed to public view, when it was repudiated by the Attorney General, who declared that it was prepared and presented to Congress without his knowledge or consent, and it was then publicly denounced and condemned by the President of the United States.

The present attitude of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Leader and News toward me is unquestionably controlled in large part by the financial interests of these publications.

Under the 1-cent-a-pound rate on second-class mail matter, these newspapers have been carried through the mails and delivered for more than 33 years at an enormous and rapidly increasing loss to the Government, which loss has amounted to more than two and one-half millions of dollars for the nine years ending June 30, 1917. The post-office authorities estimate that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, the cost of this service to the Government furnished the Plain Dealer was $202,983.39, and for this service the company actually paid $28,010.35, making a net contribution by the people of the United States to the Plain Dealer Publishing Co. for one year of $174,973.04. These facts are uncontroverted, and have never been denied by them. This disgraceful and scandalous rate of postage of 1 cent per pound upon newspapers and magazines, under which for more than 33 years the publishers have had the profits accruing from transporting and delivering their publications for less than one-eighth of the actual cost to the Government will always remain a blot upon the record of the American Congress, and I take more pride in whatever aid and assistance I have been able to render in exposing and abolishing in part this scandalous graft and subsidy than in any other public service I may have rendered. The cost in money of this subsidy during the 33 years it has been in force is enormous, amounting in the aggregate to about thirteen hundred millions of dollars, but this money loss is trifling when compared with the indirect but no less certain loss to the people of the country in the debasement and demoralization of the literature of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say a few words in connection with this bill and then I want to make a few general observations, perhaps that are not so pertinent to the bill we are now considering. I want to say, in the first place, as one of the minority members of the Committee on Military Affairs, that I wish, as a member of that minority, to express to the chairman of our committee our gratitude and thanks for the gentlemanly way in which he has treated the minority members in the consideration of this great bill.

I want to say one other thing, and that is that while perhaps many of us on that committee are not ignorant of the winding paths that lead to the spotlight of publicity, the committee has scrupulously, as a committee, kept out of that limelight. For that reason, perhaps, we have been criticized to some extent. It may have been said, and perhaps with some truth, that either the members of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House were ignorant of what was going on in the country and in the War Department or they were too modest to say anything about it. I want to say, gentlemen of the committee, we are not troubled with modesty, and we believe that we have had our share of the information that rightfully should be given to any Members of Congress; but we have felt that it was not the duty of the members of that committee, while considering the great appropriations for the maintenance of the Army for the next year, to stand on the street corners and publish as authentic every statement that might have been given to us in confidence as members of that great committee. There are no facts that we have that Members of Congress do not know generally, and there is no information we have that would injure any American citizen or, in my judgment, would give aid or comfort to the enemy. But as a matter of common prudence, decency, and modesty, we have tried to refrain from making the hearings before our committee a public matter until the time came for discussion of the bill.

I was one of those appointed on the subcommittee on the matter of aeroplanes and the Signal Corps in the Army. We proceeded to get such information as we could relative to the expenditure of the $640,000,000 appropriated last year and what they expected to do with the vast appropriations we are now making. While that information is not in detail, it is sufficient to convince the most of us that no real criminal misconduct has been indulged in by the officers in the Army charged with the expenditure of this great amount. It may develop that such has been the case, but I hope as an American citizen that such will not be the fact.

I am one who has never been carried away with the enthusiasm of many people in respect to the aircraft program. I did not yield to the newspaper arguments prior to the enactment of the appropriation of $640,000,000 that if we would only give that to the Signal Corps they would blind the enemy; that they would put out the eyes of the enemy, and with the aeroplanes we would win the war. I was not convinced that that could be done.

I am still unconvinced; and I have back of me the testimony of one of the great officers of the United States Army, who said only a few days ago that that is an impossible thing to do. It is absolutely impossible to blind the enemy; yet the newspapers of the country heralded everywhere the claim that if Congress would only furnish the money, with aeroplanes we would blind the Germans and win the war, and for that reason the people based a great deal of faith upon the appropriation of that vast sum of money and expected wonderful results. Those results were promised by the men who came before our committee and the men who wrote the articles for the magazines of this country predicted great results, but the truth about the matter is that it is simply an illustration of the old cross-country circus. The billposters overadvertised the show, and the men who did the advertising, just as in the case of the circus, were not the men who could perform the acrobatic stunts and deliver the goods when the show came along.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I understood I was to have 20 minutes, as did the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman tell us whether the same men who did this advertising were intrusted with the expenditure of the $640,000,000?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say this, that the Chief of the Signal Corps was one of them, and he is an officer that I think we all like.

Mr. ANTHONY. I refer specifically to the planting of that article in the Saturday Evening Post, by Sam Blythe, which, it was stated, was done on direct orders from officers of the departments.

Mr. McKENZIE. I have no information about the fact, but I have no doubt that probably that article was inspired. The truth about it is that even the Army officers were deceived, in my judgment. The optimism of the men behind this aircraft program was something that would carry away everyone except the most incredulous. I happen to be one of those incredulous ones; and I feel now and I warn my countrymen not to place too much faith even on this billion dollars which we are about to appropriate for aircraft, because it will not win this war.

It will help; it is an incident; it is one of the instruments we must have for our Army and for its protection in the matter of reconnaissance, but the only way that we can ever defeat the mighty German Army is not with any psychology or with any kind of new invention, but it is with cold steel on the plains of Picardy and in Belgium and in northern France. [Applause.] The cannon and the rifles and the machine guns in the hands of fearless men, who fear not to look a German in the eye with loaded gun in hand, must win this war, and in no other way can it be won.

I might say that we cut down this appropriation from two to three hundred million dollars. For example, in order that no one may criticize the committee for cutting down the estimates made by the Signal Corps, I want to say that they had an estimate of one hundred million dollars and odd for machine guns. We transferred that to the Ordnance Department, where it properly belongs. They had $7,000,000 for the purchase of land, and we struck that out upon the theory that they have three-year leases on all of the land and options to buy at a fixed price. We felt that at this time it would not be wise to engage in the purchase of land, but they would better wait until by experience they find out which is the better place to buy. We cut out $1,000,000 for the permanent coastal stations for two reasons: First, we did not feel that our committee had jurisdiction of the matter; second, this is not the time to go into permanent constructions of stations of that character. We did that as to the Mexican border. We cut down the appropriation for Hawaii, and we cut down to some extent the appropriation for Panama. I say this so that you will understand why it is that we cut down these appropriations from the estimate made by the Signal Corps.

I want to say that I do not wish to indulge in criticism to any great extent, but there are some things I think deserve a fair statement, and one of them is that, whether it was deliberately done or unconsciously done, the American people were deceived by the men behind this aircraft proposition, and the people have found out now that plans on paper will not make engines or machines. It is only the skilled hand of the artisan that can turn out these things. The American people have found out now, after months of perhaps wasted time, or partially wasted time, that they must get right down to the common-sense plan of going to the men who know how to do these things and having them done by the actual artisans and workmen of the country rather than by a board of specialists and scientists who may be able to plan the most colossal schemes but can not execute them. This is where we find ourselves to-day, but it is not all dark, for the machines are being made, and I have an abiding faith in the ability and genius of the American people to even make a success out of this belated aircraft program as they have made a success out of many other things pertaining to the maintenance and support of our great armies.

One thing I might say in passing, because I felt at the time that it was a great mistake in our War Department, and that was the calling out of the men into the camps last winter, spoken of by some man yesterday, before they had clothing to keep them warm. I can not conceive of any excuse for that kind of mistake. I have no excuse to offer for the men responsible for it, notwithstanding the fact they stated before our committee that as a military proposition it was the right thing to do. I prefer to stand by Gen. Sharpe's statement. When asked about it, he said it was not for him to say, but he believed the right thing to do before calling out an army was first to provide the things for the equipping and taking care of that army. It has been done since, and, thanks to the ingeniousness of the American citizen, to-day we are prepared to take care of all the boys we want to call into the Army, but the men who called those young boys from their homes last winter into the cold, cheerless camp, perhaps without the necessary warm clothing, in my judgment have got something to answer for to the people of this country. But be it to the everlasting credit of the soldier boy who was called, but few murmurs were heard from them. [Applause.] They treated the matter as soldiers. We on the Committee on Military Affairs have had our attention called to many things of course that disturb us, and one of them that has caused a great deal of disturbance is the question of the commissioning of civilians in the Staff Corps of our Army. I realize that it is necessary to have them, that some of the greatest men of our country have been commissioned in those staff corps, and they are needed there, but the thing that strikes home to the heart of the man who loves a real soldier is to see these men, who are no more soldiers than you and I, no more soldiers than the boy who follows the plow, or the miner who goes down into the shaft, wearing the uniform of a soldier of the Army of our country. I know that it has been criticized, and I believe justly so, not in the regular organization, because the man who gives his life to his country in the Regular Army should be entitled to wear the uniform of the country at all times and all places, and I am not unfamiliar with the argument that is made for the commissioning and the giving of the uniform to those men who come from civil life into these staff corps offices in the city of Washington, and there is some force to the argument, but after all I feel sorry for those men. The remorseless pen of The Adjutant General will keep the record of every one, and his record is written there, where he goes, what division he was in, where he spent his time while in the Army. No man knows better than those gentlemen whom we meet on the street clad in an officer's uniform that they are not soldiers. When they meet a private on the street with bronzed and ruddy cheeks, ready to go across to where the smoke of conflict rolls, that man knows in his heart that he is not a soldier, that the private that he meets upon the street is the real soldier. [Applause.] And I hope, my fellow countrymen, that the time will come, with all respect to those men, when there will be a regulation in our Army that none but a soldier shall wear the insignia of the man who has to do and to die. [Applause.]

But I want to call attention to another thing. We know some of them say they would like to go to France. Yes; they tell us that, and no doubt many of them would, but they knew before they donned the leather leggings and the cap of an officer that the pathway to France was open in the Artillery and the Infantry, but they did not seek that avenue, and are now right here in safety. How refreshing! Oh, how much good it does us as Americans to see, standing at the threshold of the White House in the Capital of our country, that grizzled old veteran pleading to be sent where the battle rages, Leonard Wood. [Applause.] Oh, we should not be carried away by these things. Do not get excited and worry over them, my friends, for there are only a few thousands of them, but think of the millions of boys in the line and the officers in the line who will add to the glory and luster of our flag on those foreign fields. One man spoke to-day or yesterday about grafters. Oh, I have no doubt they are abroad in the land. When war comes, like snakes in the grass you can see their heads coming up everywhere looking for an opportunity to rob their Government. O God, grant that such may not be the opportunity they may have, and may God pity each and every one of them and damn each and every one of them forever [applause] is my prayer. And when I think of them, even, and their contemptible meanness I forget it when I think of the glorious millions of patriotic, honest men and women in this country ready to give of their all to support the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to talk longer, but, gentlemen, I do not want to worry you this hot day. I want to say this: With all the shortcomings of the War Department and the officers and all of us, we may all have made some mistakes, as an American, as an American citizen, I am proud of the record of my country when I realize that only a year ago we had but few ships. Yes; like gallant Perry, when he had to go into the forest on the shores of Lake Erie and cut the trees to make the boats to win the battle for our country, here in this conflict we have had to go to the forests and into the mines of the country and dig up the ore and bring out the lumber to make the boats to carry our men across. We had to build forges to make the cannon and to construct all the great equipment necessary to carry on this war, but the genius of American citizenship is winning out, and in one year we have accomplished more than any other nation on the face of the earth could accomplish. Did Democrats do it or Republicans do it? Ah, forget that. Americans did it; Schwab and Ryan and the other men who have been called in to help in this country have done this great work.

I want to say to you gentlemen on that side of the House and to the country do not compliment us for standing by the administration in this great conflict. Do not humiliate a Republican on this side of the Chamber by complimenting him for standing by his country in the hour of trial. What do we care who may be at the head of the Government in this hour of trial? We are Americans, and more than that, the most glorious heritage that we have as a party is the fact that its first great duty was to save this Nation from a most dangerous and disastrous revolution. We were rocked in that cradle; we have been taught from infancy to manhood to love the great central power of this country of ours and its flag. As followers of Alexander Hamilton we have not found much difficulty in giving to the President, though a Democrat, all the power that he has asked with which to carry on this war. We will give him more; we will give him every power necessary to win the war for America. And when that is all done we realize and know that he is an American and not a usurper. Should he undertake to usurp one of the rights or privileges of an American citizen, then we will rise against him as you will rise against him. But so long as we delegate this power to him as representative of the people there is no danger.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for one minute.

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, my friends, on to-morrow, on the 30th day of May, the beautiful month of flowers, we are going to strew flowers upon the graves of the heroes of our country in all the wars past, and with all the solemnity that will go with that service. The youth of this land, 2,000,000 of them, are now in arms. We said by our vote here that we would take them whether they wanted to go or not, and we put them in. So to-morrow, my friends, as we cast our bouquets of flowers on these graves, let us reconsecrate ourselves to these young men and to this great, free land of ours, and determine to stand together until that Old Flag shall wave in triumph on the smoke-covered battle fields of France and human liberty shall be secure everywhere. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the aviation section of this bill has been discussed very fully, and in connection with this discussion much nteresting and instructive matter has been put into the RECORD. In the last issue of the Scientific American, a technical journal of high standing, will be found a very appropriate and informing article, entitled "The true story of the Liberty motor." Doubtless this article has already been read with interest by some at least of the members of this committee, and they will agree with me that it ought to have a larger circulation than will be the case if its dissemination is restricted to the columns of the Scientific American. This article deals in a lucid, scientific, and informing fashion with a subject that holds the attention of every American at this time. I intend to ask that this article be made a part of my remarks, but before doing so, I desire to call the attention of the committee to one or two citations therefrom of peculiar interest, in view of some of the statements that have been made, and queries that have been propounded, in the progress of this debate. The first quotation is as follows:

An air of mystery has surrounded the Liberty motor from its inception, and it is high time that this was dispelled. Recent announcements from the War Department, disclosing details of the motor and their similarity to other motors of American and foreign design, give us the liberty to tell here for the first time the real story of the development of our standard aviation motor.

Then follows a very instructive discussion of the history and evolution of the Liberty motor.

Again on the subject of production, which has been discussed in such a misleading and extravagant fashion by sensation mongers in the daily press, the article proceeds to say:

One of the engineers of the Ford plant told the writer personally, that he thought everyone would recognize the right of the Ford Co. to an opinion on "quantity production manufacture." He said—that never in the world's history had a greater piece of work been done on a similar scale. The development of this motor was simply short of marvelous, and the public instead of criticizing the manufacturers for slowness should be thankful that they have had such competent men to carry on the work, and develop a motor of such efficiency in so incredibly short a space of time.

Referring to the Liberty motor—

In view of the criticism, at times almost malignant, of the officials charged with the work of developing and producing on a vast scale an efficient motor, at once simple and powerful, and embodying the lessons that have been learned in the evolution of the aeroplane engine, the statements just quoted will I have no doubt be of peculiar and exceptional interest to the Members of this House, and the general public. Everyone is entitled to have the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth in this connection.

Now I ask, Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent that I may include and make a part of my remarks the article from which the citations have been taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] asks unanimous consent to include in his remarks the article referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I ask the gentleman who is the author of the article, or is it an editorial?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not know who is the author. Apparently he is one of the staff of the Scientific American, since the article is not a signed one, as would in all likelihood be the case, if it was a contribution by a correspondent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the article referred to:

[From the Scientific American, June 1, 1918.]

THE TRUE STORY OF THE LIBERTY MOTOR—THE LIGHTEST AND MOST POWERFUL AIRPLANE ENGINE PRODUCED ON A QUANTITY BASIS.

When Secretary Baker made the dramatic announcement last summer that a new motor, christened the "Liberty," had been developed by two American engineers in a five-day conference behind locked doors, men who were experienced in machine design shrugged their shoulders. They knew the impossibility of designing so highly refined a machine as an airplane motor in such a brief time. They assumed, therefore, that the so-called new motor was probably a standard motor in which a few modifications had been introduced, and speculation was rife as to what particular standard motor had been adopted. It was at first claimed that the German motor, known as the Mercedes, formed the basis for the Liberty motor; then other claimants came forward.

An air of mystery has surrounded the Liberty motor from its inception, and it is high time that this was dispelled. Recent announcements from the War Department, disclosing details of the motor and their similarity to other motors of American and foreign design, give us the liberty to tell here for the first time the real story of the development of our standard aviation motor.

Shortly after the outbreak of the great European War Mr. Henry Joy, then president of the Packard Motor Car Co., became impressed with the importance of the airplane in modern warfare. He felt certain that before the conflict was over the United States would be involved, and, looking about among our motor manufacturers, he realized how poorly prepared we were to produce the motive power for aerial warfare. There was no question that Europe was far ahead of us in the construction of airplanes and airplane motors, and being a motor manufacturer himself he realized how long it would take to develop the manufacture of first-class motors in this country, even after we woke up to the realization of their necessity. Therefore he urged his company to proceed at once with the development of an airplane motor which would compare favorably with the very best produced in Europe. This was in the fall of 1914.

In the spring of 1915 work was started on such a motor, and the design was completed in November of that year. The engine was ready for block test in February of 1916. As there were no facilities for testing airplane engines by actual flights in this country, the new motor was placed in a racing chassis of special construction and was subjected to severe tests at the Sheepshead Bay Speedway. The engine was of 299 cubic inches displacement, or just under the 300-inch racing limit established by the A. A. A. It was of the 12-cylinder V type, with cast-iron cylinders. After it had been thoroughly tested out, a second model was designed, based on the principles that had been proved out on the first model. This was of much larger design, with 4 by 6 cylinders and of 905 cubic-inch piston displacement. The new motor was provided with an airplane propeller and mounted on a truck. With this unique power plant the truck was driven about the streets of Detroit. The air-propelled truck could travel faster than any man would care to drive it. In one test the wheels were locked, and yet the truck was pushed over snow-covered ground.

In April, 1917, a second engine of this model was completed and placed in a racing chassis. It established the official world record of 130 miles per hour, or a mile in 28.76 seconds. In this second model steel-forged cylinders were used, fitted with pressed steel jackets welded on. Considerable difficulty was at first experienced in attempting to weld the jacket to the cylinder without burning the metal or introducing strains in it. After a considerable experiment it was found that the meeting edges which were to be welded must be of the same thickness, otherwise the heavier section would carry off the greater proportion of heat and the two surfaces could not be heated to the same temperature. By reducing the surfaces to exactly the same section, welding with the oxy-acetylene torch was readily accomplished.

In the first model the cylinders were set at an angle of 60°, following the practice used in automobile engines; but in the second model an angle of 40° was adopted so as to cut down head resistance. Tests of the engine showed that there was no noticeable vibration with the cylinders set at this unusual angle, even when the engine was run at considerably reduced speed. In this engine the cam shaft was placed directly over the cylinders and the housing for the cam shaft acted as a truss to hold the upper ends of the cylinders rigid.

The third model was begun in April, 1917, immediately after war was declared, and the first engine was completed in May. This contained certain improvements over the previous models, aimed particularly at reduction of weight and simplification of manufacture.

One of the first demands upon this country when it entered the war was to start the manufacture of airplanes in large quantities. We had a reputation for manufacturing on a quantity basis, and it was felt that if we turned our great industrial organizing ability upon this problem we could turn out a fleet of airplanes that would simply overwhelm the enemy. Our engineers had studied the foreign airplane motors and a number of them were being made in this country. It was realized, however, that they were not adapted for quantity production on an American basis, and it was very necessary for us to develop a motor of our own which would become a standard and which could be produced in enormous quantities. As soon as the United States was drawn into the war the Packard Motor Car Co. offered its models and experience to the Government, and being actuated by patriotic motives, was perfectly willing to abandon, for the time being, all claim to the origination of this motor, although it had expended $400,000 in its development. However, there were some changes that the Government called for, and it was felt that a representative of some other motor manufacturing concern should be called in to advise with the Packard engineers in the modifications which would eventually be adopted by the Government. Accordingly Maj. Hall, of the Hall-Scott Motor Co., was called to Washington to confer with Mr. (now Lieut. Col.) Vincent, chief engineer of the Packard Co. Mr. Vincent had with him the blue prints of the complete plans of his motor and these were studied by Maj. Hall, who suggested a number of changes.

When the war first broke out airplanes were fitted with 100-horsepower engines. Very soon they were found to be insufficient and engines of 125 horsepower were made. The engine power then gradually increased to 150, 175, 200, 250, and it was about in that neighborhood when Maj. Hall and Mr. Vincent were called upon to furnish the United States standard motor. It was felt that a motor should be designed so far ahead in power of anything else that had been produced that by the time it could be turned out in quantity it would still be well in the lead. Accordingly a horsepower of between 350 and 400 was sought and the size of the cylinders was changed from 4 by 6 to 5 by 7. Because of the larger cylinders required in the new motor the angle of the V was changed from 40 to 45 degrees. The larger pistons and cylinders required slightly greater clearances. In place of the forced lubrication of the crank shaft which was provided in the Packard engine the scupper system was introduced by Maj. Hall, because it had been found very efficient on the Hall-Scott motor. This is also a feature of the Mercedes motor. The scupper consists of a small cup-like flange on the crank arm, which catches the oil and throws it up on the bearing of the crank shaft. These and other slight modifications were thoroughly discussed and decided upon by the two motor experts, who worked unceasingly and arrived at the finished design in a conference lasting five days. They had a herculean task before them and deserve the highest praise for the successful outcome of their efforts.

As soon as the conference was over telegraphic instructions were sent on to the Packard plant and work was started immediately upon the new motor. Even before blue prints arrived the wood model was prepared in the general form and essential features of the new motor. Work on the new engine was pushed at the highest speed possible, and on the 3d day of July it was completed and shipped to Washington. The next day it arrived there, on the Nation's birthday, and was christened the "Liberty Motor."

After the first experimental motor had been completed it was subjected to a great many trying tests and was found to be exceedingly efficient and very light. It developed a horsepower of considerably over 400 and its weight was but little over 800 pounds. Its weight per horsepower was therefore about 2 pounds, which is much lighter than the majority of airplane motors. On endurance tests it stood up wonderfully. It was tested at the summit of Pike's Peak, in order to determine its action under conditions of rarified atmosphere, and proved very satisfactory. At the Bureau of Standards in Washington a special room was set aside in which a partial vacuum was created equivalent to that which exists at the maximum height to which an airplane engine has been carried. In this room the engine was found to operate perfectly. At one of its first altitude tests in a plane the American record for altitude was smashed. Not until September was the order to proceed with the manufacture of the Liberty motor definitely given, and immediately work was started in the Packard plant.

It was not considered advisable to build a new plant and purchase new machinery for the manufacture of the new motor, because this would consume a great deal of time. Instead, it was decided to give up the manufacture of automobile motors for the time being and rearrange the machine tools to make the new motor. While the plans were being prepared to carry this out the automobile-motor plant was operated day and night at full capacity in order to produce as many automobile motors as possible before the manufacture of them stopped. Under this intensive program by the end of the year a large stock of motors had been machined and for the most part assembled to meet the commercial demands. In the meantime work on the new Liberty motor was going ahead as fast as possible. New jigs had to be constructed, machine tools had to be fitted with new appliances, and the work had to be organized so that the motor could be produced on a large scale.

It is interesting to note that the first experimental motor was delivered to the Government on the 4th day of July, and the first production motor was sent to Washington on Thanksgiving Day. This, however, did not mean that the production problems had all been solved. No one except a man who has actually had experience with such work can realize the infinite amount of detail required in organizing a new industry. Usually the organization work does not make any showing at all to the general public, and consequently is not appreciated. One of the engineers of the Ford plant told the writer personally that he thought everyone would recognize the right of the Ford Co. to an opinion on quantity production manufacture. He said that never in the world's history had a greater piece of work been done on a similar scale. The development of the Liberty motor was simply short of marvelous, and the public instead of criticizing the manufacturers for slowness should be thankful that they have had such competent men to carry on the work and develop a motor of such efficiency in so incredibly short a space of time.

The motor which was delivered to the Government on Thanksgiving Day developed a number of small troubles. One of these was the difficulty of lubrication, and eventually it was found necessary to change the scupper system to the original forced lubrication system. But the most important change was made in the production of the cylinders. In the first Liberty motor the cylinders had to be bored from the solid—an operation that was very costly in time and money. This, however, was a copy of the best foreign engineering practice and was followed as a necessary detail by our engineers. It was at this juncture that the enginers of the Ford Motor Car Co. made a notable contribution. They developed a cylinder forged out of steel tubing, which enabled the manufacturers to turn out the cylinders at very low cost and in exceedingly large quantities. Seamless steel tubing is used, and this in but four operations under the forge press and bulldozer is converted into a headed and flanged cylinder blank on which a minimum of machining need be done. The manufacture of these cylinders was not undertaken until the end of January, and now they are being turned out in very large quantity. Each week the cost of producing the cylinders has been reduced slightly, and all the savings made have been turned over to the Government. At the time the writer observed the work on these cylinders the cost had been cut down more than half, with even greater economies in prospect.

One of the difficulties encountered in the Liberty motor had to do with the form of ignition. In the original Packard motor the "Delco" system of ignition was used. This consists in generating current with a small electric generator geared to the engine shaft and then transmitting the current by means of a pair of distributers to the spark plugs. Magneto ignition was tried, but it proved impossible to design a single magneto which would operate with the irregular timing required in an engine in which the cylinders were set at the unusual angle of 45 degrees. A single magneto could not be used and so a battery of four magnetoes had to be employed. This added somewhat to the weight of the engine. Then further difficulties were encountered. Owing possibly to the vibration of the engine at high speed, the magnets of the magneto showed fatigue and gradually lost their magnetic property. So that eventually it was decided to return again to the original system of ignition. One of the marked differences in appearance of the Liberty and Packard "900" is due to the fact that the latter is provided with reduction gearing. The advantage of this is that it places the hub of the propeller more nearly in line with the center of area of the engine, so that far more efficient driving results are produced in the air. For this reason the reduction gearing is being looked upon with favor now, and it is highly probable that there will be a return to this feature of the original Packard "900." Furthermore, the ideal speed for the engine is higher than ideal propeller speed. It is rather remarkable that in a number of very important features it has been necessary to revert to the original design.

Production of the Liberty motor is now proceeding at a very satisfactory pace. More motors are being produced than there are planes to carry them. When the writer visited the Packard plant several weeks ago they were being turned out at the rate of 15 per day and it was hoped that inside of two months a production of 50 per day would be attained. No expense was being spared to reach this rate of production, but again the matter of organization was holding up the work so that it was considered impossible to attain that rate before the end of June.

In the Ford plant manufacture of the Liberty motor was just about to start with a program of 100 complete engines per day when the plant is in full operation. Here, as in the Packard plant, the standard equipment of the machine shop was being overhauled and reorganized for work on the Liberty motor. This was being done at the expense of the regular commercial motor. In several other factories work on the Liberty motor has either just begun or is about to begin, and certainly by the middle of the summer the Liberty motor ought to be produced in very large quantities. The only thing that is retarding the airplane program now is the manufacture of planes to carry the motors.

The efficiency of the Liberty motor is not to be questioned by anyone who has examined it thoroughly. It is far more powerful than any other airplane engine ever produced on a quantity production basis. It exceeds in power all but a few experimental machines. Although rated at 400 horsepower, it has shown on test as high as 485 horsepower, and its weight is 820 pounds.

It is a mistake to assume that any one motor is adapted to all classes of airplane service. There is no single motor abroad which is of such universal utility. The Liberty motor is one of the most powerful airplane motors in the world and the lightest for its power. Obviously, it would be impracticable to use it on light machines which do not require such power, or on slow observation machines. But it is ideal for bombing purposes, for here we have large airplanes of great carrying capacity that must travel long distances at high speed. The Liberty motor should also be available for fighting machines of the larger types. We are making a great many motors of other types for our training machines and for our lighter fighting machines. Altogether, the airplane situation is fast approaching a very satisfactory basis, and before the end of the year it should play an important part in the great struggle on the other side of the water.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, of course I have become bankrupt on assurances and promises as to adjournments and recesses, and all of that, but I can redeem myself in this statement or this promise: I have talked with the minority leader and others, and it has been found that a great many gentlemen desire to go away Saturday, as they have engagements for that day, and if we can finish this bill by Friday evening I will make a motion to adjourn over until Monday. So I thought possibly that might encourage us to work on this bill a little harder.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the moneys herein appropriated shall be and become immediately available upon the passage of this act, and shall also be available for the payment of obligations incurred prior to the passage of this act in the event such obligations are of a character otherwise within the scope of the appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, there is one question that I wish to ask of the gentleman in charge of the bill. We had some conversation about the amount that is carried by this bill. You expend the appropriations of every kind, by this proviso, heretofore made. Now, does that add to the aggregate of appropriations that you have stated heretofore for the Aviation Service?

Mr. DENT. It does not add to anything, but it carries into the next fiscal year the amount of money that we appropriated last year.

Mr. CANNON. And the amount not expended was included in your statement?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That during the existing emergency the head of the bureau or department charged with aircraft production be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ in the District of Columbia, out of appropriations made for designing, procuring, caring for, and supplying airships, engines, and property connected therewith, such services as are necessary for carrying out these purposes.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HICKS. I do so, Mr. Chairman, merely to carry out, in a measure, and amplify the statement made by my colleague [Mr. HUSTED] this morning in regard to some of the reasons why the air program has fallen down. It seems to me that one additional reason why there has been so much delay in production has been lack of a positive, continuing policy on the part of the War Department in relation to the air service.

A few weeks ago I went through one great plant in Buffalo, N. Y., operated by the Curtiss Co., and they told me that their capacity was only partly utilized, for the simple reason that the Government, after making a contract with them or sending them specifications and blue prints, would frequently telegraph them to hold up on those contracts until further notice, and that days and even weeks would pass before instructions were received to proceed. The result was that the Curtiss Co. could not go ahead and order material in large quantities or contract for labor, and therefore could not inaugurate a comprehensive program of quantity production. I think that is one reason for the delay, and a very serious one, which should be corrected.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asked the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] a question this morning as to the cost of airplanes. This is an Army bill, but I will ask indulgence to refer to Navy matters for a moment. I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be interested in this particular item, especially as it relates in part to his own city. I refer to the cost of the seaplanes now being manufactured in the Curtiss works and in the navy yard at Philadelphia. These great seaplanes or boats, that have a 96-foot spread of wings and a lifting capacity of 10,000 pounds, when ready for flight, completely manned and armed, cost $48,000. They are equipped for service abroad and are now being shipped.

Of course, the purpose and object of that service is not merely the killing of a crew in an opposing plane, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested, but it is to patrol the coasts of France and the shores of Ireland, in order to destroy submarines by dropping depth charges upon them or attacking them by gunfire. They are driven by two Liberty motors, mount several machine guns, and, I confidently believe, will prove most effective in checking the ravages of the German submarine. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment, without objection, is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized, through the head of any executive department, to sell, upon such terms as the head of such department shall deem expedient, to any person, partnership, association, corporation, or any other department of the Government, or to any foreign State or Government, engaged in war against any Government with which the United States is at war, any war supplies, material, and equipment, and any by-products thereof, for the production of such war supplies, materials, and equipment which, during the present emergency, may have or may hereafter be purchased, acquired, or manufactured by the United States.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 14, line 21, after the word "States," insert: "Provided further, That sales of guns and ammunition made under the authority contained in this or any other act shall be limited to sales to other departments of the Government and to foreign States or Governments engaged in war against any Government with which the United States is at war."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, from a glance at the paragraph it will be seen that it is contemplated to give authority to the President, through the head of any executive department, to sell to any person, partnership, association, or corporation any war supplies or material.

Obviously, it will be necessary to sell a great deal of war supplies and materials when the war is over. It is also obvious that it is now necessary to sell a great deal to the countries with which we are allied in the present war. There will be millions of feet of lumber; there will be thousands of ice chests and things of that kind too numerous to mention, to be disposed of. But, Mr. Chairman, we should not grant to the head of any department the right to sell guns and ammunition to any person, firm, corporation, or association or to any country except the countries that are at war with the Governments with which we are at war.

But yesterday, in the Committee on Appropriations, large sums of money were asked to purchase certain 6-inch guns of Mr. Bannerman, of New York, which he had purchased from the Navy of the United States. It was stated on the floor of this House that two years ago, when our boys crossed the border and went over into Mexico, they were met there by Mexicans armed with Springfield rifles purchased by these second-hand dealers in New York City and elsewhere.

Why should the Government of the United States sell guns and ammunition to a firm or a corporation which in turn could sell these supplies to some bandit or insurgent who might use them against our own troops. So far as guns and ammunition are concerned, if they are to be disposed of at all Congress ought to have something to say about it without leaving it to some bureau chief, as it would be left, to decide who shall purchase it and at what price.

My attention was recently called to articles used in Panama, sold to a concern in the United States for $1,500 each, which that same concern has since sold to our War Department for $15,000 each. Congress need not hurry now to dispose of war supplies and materials, especially guns and ammunition. We, of course, have been necessarily hurried and have had to pay large prices for the acquisition of these things to make an adequate defense of the United States; but Congress need not now trust to a bureau chief to dispose of billions of dollars worth of this kind of material but can well wait, and can understand and identify the person to whom we are selling it, or the country to which we are selling it, rather than sell it to the second-hand dealer, who could sell it if he wanted to a country with which we might have some very grievous trouble.

All that this amendment does is simply to provide that when it comes to guns and ammunition we can only sell to another department of the Government or to States or countries that are at war with the same countries with which we are at war. We can furnish our allies with all those things, but we can not sell them to Bannerman at any price or on any terms that some mere bureau chief might determine upon.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman submitted his amendment to me, and I investigated it as well as I could, and I think it ought to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GOOD: On page 14, line 21, after the word "States," insert: "Provided further, That a detailed report shall be made to Congress on the first day of each regular session of the sales of any war supplies, material, and equipment made under the authority contained in this or any other act, except sales made to any foreign State or Government engaged in war against any Government with which the United States is at war, showing the character of the articles sold, to whom sold, the price received therefor, and the purpose for which sold."

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to that; but, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that the first proviso comes in after the word "States," and this further proviso ought to come after the first one.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; it should follow the amendment that has just been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That during the present emergency the requirements of section 3744 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to the rent of quarters for the use of local, district, or medical advisory boards where the amount to be paid is less than is customarily charged the public for the same quarters: And provided further, That all payments made by disbursing officers appointed in connection with the execution of the selective-service law for rents unsupported by a lease may be passed to their credit by the accounting officers of the Treasury if otherwise correct.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 16, line 13, at the end of the paragraph, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to provide and issue to all men who, under the provisions of an act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, approved May 18, 1917, or of any law hereafter enacted, have heretofore been or shall hereafter be drafted into the military service but subsequently exempted therefrom, or who heretofore or hereafter having volunteered for military service shall have been or shall be rejected for any cause, a distinctive button or badge of such design, size, and composition as he shall determine and adopt, and to cause a new button or badge to be issued to such persons, without charge therefor, whenever during the present emergency the button or badge originally issued shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use without fault upon the part of the person to whom it was issued, and to meet the cost of procuring, providing, and distributing the same out of any appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for expenses incident to or necessary for the registration, selection, or draft of persons available for military service.

"It shall be unlawful for any person other than the one who has been drafted and exempted, or who has volunteered and been rejected, as aforesaid, to wear said button or badge, or other button or badge approximating the design thereof, or for any person by misrepresentation to procure the issuance of either an original or substitute button or badge, or for any person, partnership, association, or corporation, without the authority of the Secretary of War therefor, to manufacture said button or badge, or other button or badge approximating the design thereof; and any person, partnership, association, or corporation who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves a point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, my amendment, just read from the Clerk's desk, provides for the issuance of a distinctive badge or button by the War Department to every man who has volunteered for military service, or who, having been drafted for military service, has for valid cause been exempted by the constituted authorities of the United States. The exact language carried by my amendment was proposed by the Secretary of War himself in a communication sent to the Senate of the United States and to the House of Representatives of the United States on December 20, 1917. In support of the measure the Secretary of War wrote:

An exemption badge or button, which may be worn by men of military age drafted into the military service but subsequently exempted therefrom, or who have volunteered or may hereafter volunteer for military service but have been or shall hereafter be rejected for any cause, seems necessary in order that such men may have something official to show that they are not slackers.

Such a badge or button having been authorized, the law should also provide penalties for its unauthorized use or manufacture.

I have the honor to suggest, therefore, that legislation be obtained as early as practicable, to accomplish these objects, and to submit the following draft of a bill for this purpose.

Then follows a suggested draft of a bill identical with the amendment which I have just offered.

The Senate Committee on Military Affairs favorably reported this bill, and it passed the Senate on February 5 of this year. The House Committee on Military Affairs has not acted, but I have been told informally by several of the members of the committee that they are in hearty accord with its provisions. I have talked this morning with the men in The Adjutant General's office who are charged with the administration of recruiting both by conscription and by volunteering. They tell me that their mail is daily flooded with appeals from all over the country for a badge of this kind, and that men who are not wearing the uniform for a cause which does not arise from their own fault should be permitted as an act of the barest justice to wear in their buttonholes some indication that there is a valid reason why they are not rendering military service.

I believe that the adoption of this amendment and the issuance of exemption badges or buttons would have a tremendously useful effect upon the general military situation throughout the country, because it would enable everyone at a glance to know that a man of draft age was not in the Army for some good reason outside his own preference or his own fault.

When I was in England last winter I saw men, young men and older men, wearing a badge as big as a policeman's badge on their lapels. I made inquiries as to what those badges were, and I found that Great Britain had found it necessary for the effective administration of the recruiting service to give men who had served in the military establishment and men who had been validly exempted from military service some distinguishing token by which the world might know that they either had done their duty or had tried to do their duty. The badge told their neighbors that they wore mufti for some reason outside of their own fault. I think the membership will support this amendment, and I hope the chairman of the committee may think it proper to withdraw the reservation of his point of order.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, this matter has been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs and considerable opposition developed, although no final action has been taken. Some Members made the objection that it would subject these men who had the badge to criticism, and that we ought to consider this bill carefully. The committee, after we get through the appropriation bill, proposes to take up all matters of general legislation recommended by the War Department; probably next week; but I think the matter ought to be carefully considered by the committee itself rather than to have it put on an appropriation bill, and for that reason I shall have to insist on the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it fair to ask whether the gentleman from Alabama is personally in favor of this bill?

Mr. DENT. I will state that I have no decided views. I think there are some things to be said on both sides.

Mr. ROGERS. I think the whole country will be behind the action of Congress if it gives these men a chance to show what they are.

Mr. DENT. We will take it up as soon as this bill is through.

Mr. ROGERS. The bill has been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, by the War Department, and by the Secretary himself.

Mr. DENT. Yes; but it is a comprehensive bill carrying a great many details, and I do not think it would be exactly fair to put it on an appropriation bill even though it is a desirable bill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the fact that the law now under the questionnaire gives a man of military age a status that if he is not in the service of his country he is out of it not by any fault of his. He does not have to wear any badge.

Mr. ROGERS. But the general public does not understand that, and the man deserves some protection from the unjust comments of other people.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman is aware that there are 6,000,000 registered, and there would be 4,000,000 men wearing badges under the gentleman's amendment. They need no excuse.

Mr. DENT. At any rate, I will say to the gentleman that there is such an opposition to this bill in its present form among the members of the committee that I think it is my duty to make a point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. May the House have the assurance of the chairman of the committee that within a very short time this great question will be taken up and disposed of?

Mr. DENT. It is my purpose, as soon as we get relief from the appropriation bills, to take up every bill on the calendar of the Military Committee and dispose of them one way or the other. Of course, I do not know how the committee may act.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama insist on his point of order?

Mr. DENT. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 16, line 13, at the end of the paragraph, insert the following as a new paragraph:

"The Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to provide and issue to all men who, since April 6, 1917, have been honorably discharged from the armed forces of the United States, a distinctive button or badge of such design, size, and composition as he shall determine and adopt, and to cause a new button or badge to be issued to such persons, without charge therefor, whenever during the present emergency the button or badge originally issued shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use without fault upon the part of the person to whom it was issued, and to meet the cost of procuring, providing, and distributing the same out of any appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for expenses incident to or necessary for the registration, selection, or draft of persons available for military service.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person other than the rightful owner to wear said button or badge, or other button or badge approximating the design thereof, or for any person by misrepresentation to procure the issuance of either an original or substitute button or badge, or for any person, partnership, association, or corporation, without the authority of the Secretary of War therefor, to manufacture said button or badge, or other button or badge approximating the design thereof; and any person, partnership, association, or corporation who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman reserve it for a moment?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take the time of the committee in discussing my second amendment. The first one was to provide for men who had either volunteered, but had been rejected for physical or some other valid reason, or had been drafted and had been exempted for some good cause from serving with the colors. This amendment provides that men who have actually served with the colors and have been honorably discharged from the service of the United States shall be permitted to receive and wear a badge furnished by the United States showing their service. This amendment is, I think, even more meritorious than the other, for it cares for men who have actually served and who for wounds or injuries have been honorably discharged by the Government.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course, they get an honorable discharge, and that is more important and authoritative.

Mr. ROGERS. An honorable discharge paper, of course, is a great protection to these men. That is the official proof that they have rendered service. But just as the gentleman from Vermont, who has made the suggestion, is proud of wearing in his lapel at this moment a button showing the fact of his Spanish War service, so the men who have served in the present great war with Germany desire to wear in their lapel a button showing their military service.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. Has the gentleman forgotten that the Government has never issued that badge?

Mr. ROGERS. I hope at some time that defect may be remedied.

Mr. CRAGO. I think we are starting at the wrong end of the line.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I have had some knowledge of the condition of the sick and wounded soldiers at Walter Reed Hospital and elsewhere. There are at that one hospital several hundred men who either have been discharged for physical reasons or who are about to be discharged for physical reasons from further service in the United States Army. Those men have done their part just as well as they know how, and without fault on their own part they have fallen physically by the wayside. They want this recognition by the United States Government of the fact of their service. There are also at Walter Reed Hospital 30 or 40 men who have returned from France hopelessly crippled from wounds or injuries received in France. These men have nothing that they can wear to show to their friends and neighbors and the people whom they meet that they have rendered honorable service in this great war with Germany. This amendment will take care of those men. Again, I submit that it is rendering only the barest justice to those soldiers, who have done the very best they could for their country's cause.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do this for the reason that I have received a letter from the governor of Nebraska in regard to the Nebraska soldiers at Camp Cody. I understand there is a meeting to-day in Washington of the governors from the States of Minnesota, South Dakota, North Dakota, and other States considering the same subject in regard to their State troops, and during the few minutes I have I wish to read Gov. Neville's letter. It is as follows:

STATE OF NEBRASKA,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Lincoln, May 25, 1918.

Hon. C. O. LOBECK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LOBECK: As I advised in my telegram of this date, I have information that 5,660 men are to be taken from the Thirty-fourth Division as a replacement draft as soon after June 1 as they can be gotten ready. This will take more than 1,400 men from the One hundred and thirty-fourth Infantry, Nebraska's only Infantry National Guard organization in the service. One officer of the regiment will accompany each 250 men. This will leave, in addition to the noncommissioned officers in the companies of the regiment, approximately 16 men to each company. The One hundred and twenty-seventh Field Artillery, an organization of Nebraska men and officers, will be similarly affected. It means that Nebraska's organizations are to be entirely disrupted, and that the guaranty of the Government that Nebraskans in the National Guard would serve under Nebraska officers is to be entirely disregarded. The places made vacant are to be filled by drafted troops from New Mexico, Arizona, Texas, and Colorado. You, of course, know that the type of drafted men from those States, being largely Mexicans, in no way compares to our men.

I wish to say that these Nebraska soldiers who are now at Camp Cody have served for nearly two full years on the Mexican border, and they wish to be kept together, having trained as one unit.

Of course, it will be claimed that this disorganization is demanded by military necessity, but military necessity can not justify and the interests of the Government will not be served by destroying the esprit de corps and the morale of these fine organizations.

I have seen National Army divisions at Camp Funston and various Regular Army organizations. I have just returned from a 10 days' trip to Camp Cody, and I know from my own personal experience and investigations that the men of the Thirty-fourth Division are as fine a lot of troops as we have in the service, and now that the officers who are incapable have been weeded out they will measure up to the very best.

Nebraska and other Middle Western States are leading in all phases of war-work activities. The Minnesota and Kansas City Federal reserve districts were the first to go over the top in the recent liberty-loan campaign. Nebraska stands first in subscriptions to war savings stamps, and the men in the service from this State, as well as other Middle Western States, are certainly entitled to some consideration.

The Thirty-fourth Division has been in training for nearly a year at Camp Cody, the most undesirable and unenviable camp in the United States from the standpoint of the pleasure of the men stationed therein. Officers whose wives live in Deming have not been permitted to spend more than two nights per week outside of the camp. The men have not been given a furlough, except when a death occurred in the immediate family. Not a half dozen officers have been given leave to return to Nebraska since the troops went South a year ago. I can say, without fear of contradiction, that no division has worked harder than the Thirty-fourth, and the condition of the men indicates it. The men are trained to the minute, and various English and French officers have officially reported to the department that the division was ready and fit for foreign service and that no further advancement could be hoped for in the present environment. Drafted men who have been in training but a few weeks are now in France, and this division, which has been hard at work for practically a year, under the most unfavorable conditions, is now to be disrupted, the men to be distributed throughout various organizations, and the officers can look forward to another long period of training at Deming.

I feel sure that our Representatives in Washington have sufficient influence to cause the department to change their plans with reference to the disruption of these organizations. These men were not drafted; they are volunteers, and they are certainly entitled to serve their country as such and in the organizations of their choice. If the department can not be prevailed upon to move the division, perhaps they would move the brigades, regiments.

I know that you will do everything you can in this matter. The governors of other Western States are interested, and it is possible that several of us will make a trip to Washington with reference to it. The matter must be attended to at once, however, as these troops will leave as soon after June 1 as they can be gotten ready.

Yours, very truly,

KEITH NEVILLE.

Of course, this is a matter of administration, but I believe and it seems to me it is for the best interest of the Army and for the soldiers that these men who have served practically for two years in the National Guard on the border should be entitled to go together and not to be distributed in other regiments. There are, I believe, no better men in the service than these Nebraska soldiers. The most of them are native-born Nebraskans, absolutely and truly American in their views, educated in Nebraska schools—there are no better schools anywhere—accustomed to western outdoor life, these soldiers will render our country the best of service. They are true to the flag, they understand the principles of pure democracy, they are the bravest of men, and when the history is written of this war, if these Nebraskans are given the opportunity to battle for their homes, their loved ones, their country, it will be said of them they were the bravest of men and have done the fullest share to bring victory to our country. I hope that they may be kept together as a fighting unit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional pay to officers for length of service, $3,500,000.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 20, after the figures, insert the following: "That section 23 of an act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, approved June 3, 1916, be and the same hereby is amended by adding thereto the following:

"'Should any such officer during such provisional period of two years become incapable of performing the duties of his office by reason of physical incapacity resulting from an incident of service, he shall be retired from active service by the President upon the actual rank held by him at the time of retirement in the manner provided by law for the retirement of permanent officers of the Regular Army, and provisional officers retired under the provisions of this section shall be in addition to the number of officers of the Army on the retired list now fixed by law.'"

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some explanation of that amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the chairman of the committee kindly explain that?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, this amendment after all is more in the nature of restoring to the law as it stood what apparently was inadvertently taken out of it by the amendment to section 23 of the act approved June 3, 1916.

Mr. KAHN. The national-defense law?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The national-defense law. It was inadvertently taken out of that act by an amendment. The proposition is simply this: The War Department asked us to write into the national-defense act some provision whereby the young officers going into the Army in the first grade of second lieutenant from civil life——

Mr. MADDEN. That is into the Regular Army?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Into the Regular Army from civil life—should be styled provisional officers for the period of two years. And the purpose was explained to be this: That under the former procedure when they had been commissioned in this grade upon their acceptance from civil life they put themselves in the status of permanent commissioned officers, and it then required something like an intricate process under the law to dismiss them from the service for something that did not involve a court-martial charge. In other words, the practical effect of it was that when they were found not to be suitable or adaptable to military service there was no easy way to dismiss them from the service. A new status in a sense was created for a provisional service until it should be found out that the young man had a suitable temperament and the general all-around fitness to become an officer of the Army. Of course, if he violated any military discipline or anything of that kind demanding dismissal he would be treated as any other officer would, but there was no provision under the existing law whereby the man could be easily dismissed from the Army upon the mere ground that he was not the kind of man who would make a success of it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. As I read the language it provides——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am coming to that. After we had written into this national-defense act the authority to call these young officers provisionals for the period of two years it developed that by construction of that amendment in the office of the Judge Advocate General it was held that appointment did not confer upon the appointee the right of retirement that was held by other officers who held a permanent status in the Army.

We did not intend any such thing, because the young man who goes into the Army as a provisional second lieutenant goes in with the same serious disposition and intent to become an Army officer as any other man; and not only that, but he has precisely the responsibility and the obligation other men of his grade and rank have, is held exactly to the same accountability, and consequently if he is wounded in service, incapacitated in service, there ought not to be any more discrimination against him than against a man who had been in there, say, 15 minutes longer and had just gone over that period of two years' service. Moreover, the terms of that amendment did not apply to the graduate of West Point. The West Pointer was permitted to go right in and become a second lieutenant, although the Government had spent four years of time and about $25,000 to educate him to become a second lieutenant, and he was permitted to be eligible for retirement within the next 24 hours if he might be disabled in the line of duty in the service, while the young man in civil life, who brought into the Army his own education and never cost the Government a cent, who might be disabled in the same accident, on the same tour of duty, could not be retired. Now, we did not mean to take that right of retirement for the provisional out of the general law by that amendment of the act of June 3, 1916.

Mr. MADDEN. In other words, you make eligible the retirement any time after he goes into the service after he meets with an accident?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Just exactly as in the case of all other officers of the Army.

Mr. MADDEN. What status has an officer in the National Army under such circumstances?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He does not engage in the business as a profession.

Mr. MADDEN. The mere fact is he does not engage in the business as a profession, but he does give his services, and his life if need be.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It has always been the fact that a professional soldier in the Regular Army is forbidden by the law to follow any other gainful occupation.

Mr. MADDEN. While they are in the Army?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly; but they are in the Army for life.

Mr. MADDEN. The other man is forbidden to accept any other gainful occupation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But he is not in the Army for life.

Mr. GORDON. He is in there for the period of the war, and he may be for life.

Mr. MADDEN. The other men are prohibited, under any circumstances, from accepting any gainful occupation while they occupy that position.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, that is true; but he does not give up his home and business.

Mr. MADDEN. He does——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He does not in the sense of a man who takes up the Army as an occupation and a profession and goes into it for his life work and expects to stay there until he is 62 years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The Army officer in the Regular Establishment has the same right to resign as an Army officer in the National Guard has at any time.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Well, that same thing is true, I might say to the gentleman from Illinois—it has been true all these years, 50, perhaps, or more—about this same right of retirement. The right of retirement would be upheld when the disability had been incurred within 15 minutes after the man had gone into the Army, one might say, and always has been so.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If a man resigns from the Regular Army he releases his right to retirement?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Absolutely.

Mr. MADDEN. The statement the gentleman from Vermont made was that a man who went into the Regular service as an officer is not permitted to do any other business while he is an officer, and that same obligation applies to a man who is not in the Regular Army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; but in the Regular Army it withholds from them that privilege for a period of probably 40 years, which is a restriction not enforced in any occupation other than the Army——

Mr. MADDEN. And probably during the period he would be paid better than he would be in any other occupation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman and I have seen men of splendid administrative capacity getting $5,000 or $6,000 in the Army who in outside employment would be getting $15,000 or $25,000 a year.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Another thing lies in the fact that there is no possibility of accumulating such a competency as will support a man in his old age, and that is one reason for retirement.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Exactly. It is part of a contractual obligation by the Government from the time that the man is sworn in that he will from that day on refrain from any outside gainful occupation, and in consideration of the fact that his salary never will be enough for him to lay up a competency, as men expect to do in civil life, that he will be carried along until he is 62 years of age, when the Government will retire him——

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want to ask this question, if I may do so. The man who has fitted himself for the Army in the West Point Academy during the four years while he is constructively in the Army is not entitled to any retirement until he is commissioned in the Army?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Not at all.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The idea of the probational civilian coming in was to put him in a certain degree in the position of the man who has had four years to fit himself, whereas this man comes in two years to fit himself; and the idea of the probation was a sort of two years' trial before he was fully accepted into the service. Now, the contention of the gentleman from Vermont is, in substance and in fact, that a man who has been taken into the Army on trial ought to be treated exactly the same as any other man coming in any other way into the Regular Army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The point of the thing in effect is this, that the provisional started at the beginning of his two-year period with the idea that his permanent retention in the Army was contemplated. He goes along in the service from day to day like any other officer, and at the end of two years, when the clock strikes 12, he becomes a permanent officer, and those two years are credited to him as a longevity accumulation.

Mr. MADDEN. The longevity accumulation begins at the beginning of the West Pointer's academy period.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Not now. It was changed two or three years ago.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think so.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think it was.

Mr. MADDEN. We have been passing bills here recently——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. They were for the old Civil War officers, due to a former construction of a comptroller that that service did count.

Mr. MADDEN. I think this legislation, while it does justice to the men to whom it applies, fails to do justice to the men to whom it does not apply, because many of the men who have gone into the National Army as officers have gone in because of the special ability they possess that qualifies them for the service they are called upon to render, and they have acquired that ability by long years of arduous toil and the expenditure of vast sums of money in educating them in the special lines in which they are experts.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] recalls the eloquent speech of his colleague [Mr. McKENZIE], to the effect that this tremendous number of men who come into this Army from civil life, with very little training, would have the same right of retirement as those men who are entitled to it by service.

Mr. MADDEN. I am speaking of those only who have swivel-chair jobs and not of men who are actually at the front and go to the front because they are, first, arduously patriotic and want to go to the front, and because of special qualifications that lead them to be useful at the front.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I suggest to my friend from Illinois that that presents the subject on an entirely different basis, because those men are only in the Army temporarily, and designedly so, and will go back to civil life again. That was a part of the contract of employment that was made. And if we do not adopt this amendment, I will suggest to the committee that we shall have the anomaly of two kinds of junior officers in our Regular Army, all performing exactly the same duties, all having exactly the same obligations, all having exactly the same responsibility and held to the same accountability, and yet one of them can be retired if he is wounded in that duty and the other can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask recognition.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my colleague have two minutes more in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask my colleague, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], if it is not a fact that in the Regular Army a graduate of West Point, educated at the expense of the Government, is entitled to the consideration of which he now speaks; that is, the right of retirement solely?

Now, then, all you seek to do by this amendment is to give to the young man who by his own effort educates himself, prepares himself, and qualifies as a second lieutenant, and gets a commission, the right to be on the same ground as the man who gets a second lieutenant's commission and who has been educated at West Point at Government expense? Is not that fair?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is better stated than when I tried to do it, when I was hinting at it myself a little while ago. It comes right down, as I said just a moment ago, to the fact that unless you do this thing you will have the anomaly of two kinds of officers in the service, all held to the same obligation and responsibility, getting the same pay, and yet one having this handicap against him, for which no reason whatever can be given. And, moreover, this would not have been necessary, this proposed amendment, were it not for the fact that afterwards the War Department, and very likely advisedly, read into the language of our amendment what none of us ever considered it to mean when we originally proposed it to the House for adoption.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be understood as opposing what I believe to be just legislation, and I consider this just. But I want to call the attention of the committee to this situation:

Criticism has been frequently made upon the floor of the House about men who have come in from civil life to the Army and have obtained commissions and are occupying useless places. But most of these men came in because they have peculiar knowledge of some phase of the war activities which are deemed essential to the successful conduct of the war. It is frequently stated on the floor that they came in because of pressure from influential people on the outside. Now, that can just as well apply to the men who are commissioned as second lieutenants in the Regular Army as professional officers, and I will cite a case which will serve as an illustration.

Into the training camps that we have had all over the United States men have come from civil life to compete for commissions, and it just so happens that boys who had rich and influential parents or friends, and who were able to place at the disposal of the commanding officers of the training camps automobiles, to be used whenever they pleased to take advantage of them, and to invite them to all kinds of social entertainments, were given commissions in the Regular Army, whereas the boys who had qualified without having such influences at work were given commissions in the National Army or the Reserve Corps.

I am speaking of something that I know. I happen to know cases where these boys were granted commissions in the Regular Army not because of any special qualification that they proved themselves to have at all, but simply because of the influence of their wealth on the commanding officer who had the right to mark up their standard of efficiency. I do not know how you are going to get around it, how you are going to discipline men who accept such favors, and then commission men into the regular service because of the favors.

But the practice exists in all the training camps and a great many of the men who are being placed in a position where they can be retired if injured are commissioned in the regular service as provisional officers now because of the conditions that I have described.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Not at all.

Mr. GORDON. My understanding is that they are required to take an examination prescribed by The Adjutant General before they can get a commission in the Regular Army.

Mr. MADDEN. No; they are commissioned in the Regular Army through the recommendation of the commanding officers of the training camps.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The condition that the gentleman refers to is due, no doubt, to the great expansion of the Regular Army. They had to get many new officers for the units of the Regular Army. On the other hand, many Regular Army officers of the higher grades were taken out of the Regular Army and put into the National Army. They are officers to-day in the National Army.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree to that; but still they hold their status in the Regular Army, notwithstanding that. But the point I am making was not touched at all by the statement of the gentleman from California. My point, if I have not made it clear, is that of two young men of equal ability—one the son of poor parents, and the other the son of rich parents, who are able to entertain the commanding officer of the company in which these two young men served while they were in training—the one was commissioned in the Regular Army and the other one may not have been commissioned at all, or if so, he was commissioned in the Reserve.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not, of course, know of the special instance——

Mr. MADDEN. I am talking about a lot of instances, but I am only describing one.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The practice in the camps of which I am informed under these preparations for commissions in the Regular Army was something like this: The class that was preparing to qualify for reserve commissions was notified that a limited percentage of those men standing high enough in their studies would be permitted to take examination for a commission in the Regular Army apart from their test for a reserve commission, which they were taking anyway.

Mr. MADDEN. But anybody who had the influence to do the things prescribed would be certified for commission in the Regular Army. Otherwise they would be certified to the Reserve Corps.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That does not happen often.

Mr. MADDEN. That happens every day, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman is correct in his statement that influence was used in favor of the rich young man to get a better position than the poor young man could obtain, then there ought to be an investigation of that matter.

Mr. MADDEN. I am sure about it.

Mr. KAHN. There should be in the Army of the United States no distinction as to class. The very purpose of the draft law was to destroy class distinctions in the armies of the United States.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield in a moment. If it has crept in in the commissioning of officers of the Army, decidedly there should be an investigation to determine the facts, and the officers who might be found guilty of it ought to be severely punished by the military courts-martial.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McKEOWN. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether or not he was aware that it was a common rumor throughout the different camps that there had been some discriminations made with reference to commissioned officers?

Mr. KAHN. I dare say that such statements have been made. The man, probably, who failed at the training camp, in his desire to get a commission, in explaining his failure, says, "Oh, I was discriminated against; I was not given a square deal"; and by repeating that statement to all his friends the impression goes abroad that there was favoritism. I know that there are many cases where men went into those camps with high hopes, trusting that they would be commissioned. They could not meet the requirements of the training, physically or mentally, perhaps. They were unequal to the task, and they dropped out. But the proposition stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is entirely a different one, and it is a serious proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, you can not stop a captain from being influenced by such surroundings as I have described in favor of the young man whose father is placing an automobile at his service and inviting him to all kinds of social functions. You could not prevent him from favoring the boy, regardless of whether the boy was qualified or not. But I know lots of cases where that has happened.

Mr. KAHN. I desire to say that I have not come in contact with a single case of that kind.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has been too busy writing the bill. He has not been outside where that happens.

Mr. KAHN. The city I come from had a training camp at the very outset. The gentleman visited the training camp and spoke to the young men who were attending the camp while the camp was in being over at Fort Myer.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. My colleague has been a legislator for a great many years. Has he ever yet found a way of passing a law that will repeal certain tendencies of human nature?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, it is, of course, impossible to frame a law that will do that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. These cases arise out of a cussedness that probably no law can ever reach. You can get an individual case and punish it, but it is doubtful if you could prevent it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that even if the statements of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] are correct, these young officers might get a commission as second lieutenants through favoritism, but after they got into the Army the first time they went up against an efficiency examination they would be out?

Mr. KAHN. They would be dropped—given an honorable discharge and probably would have to go into the draft.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of clerks, messengers, and laborers, office of the Chief of Staff: One chief clerk, at $2,750 (increase of $500 submitted), $2,500.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, on page 18, lines 2 and 3, I move to amend by striking out the words "increase of $500 submitted" and the parentheses.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 18, lines 2 and 3, strike out "(increase of $500 submitted)."

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent that the words "increase submitted" wherever they occur on the page be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that in the following lines on that page the words in parentheses may be stricken out. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, may I have the Clerk report the paragraph on page 18 as it reads with the amendment which has been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the paragraph as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of clerks, messengers, and laborers, office of the Chief of Staff: One chief clerk, at $2,750, $2,500.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend further by striking out, in line 2, page 18, after the word "clerk," the words "at $2,750."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 18, line 2, after the word "clerk" strike out the words "at $2,750."

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman will see, by looking at the other paragraphs, that the word "at" ought to remain, and simply the figures ought to be stricken out.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is correct. I ask to modify my amendment in the way the gentleman suggests.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the way which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 18, line 2, after the word "at," strike out "$2,750."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

One clerk, at $2,250, $2,250.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the last figures, "$2,250," in line 4, will be stricken out.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

One gardener, at $720.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Where do they use the gardener in the office of the Chief of Staff; to keep the windows decorated? [Laughter.]

Mr. DENT. No; he is used in the Army War College.

Mr. MADDEN. What does he do; decorate the offices located there?

Mr. DENT. He takes care of the plants and flowers, keeps the grounds in condition so as to make them attractive.

Mr. COX. I wonder if it would not be better policy for the gardener to raise potatoes instead of flowers.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know what he does raise unless it is boquets for the men at the War College.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman knows that these are items that have been carried in the bill for years. The gentleman has been a long time in discovering this.

Mr. MADDEN. There are so many new problems involved in the conduct of the war that it is hard to discover them all at once.

The Clerk read as follows:

One hundred and eleven clerks, at $1,800 each (increase of 32 submitted), $199,800.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all words included in parentheses on page 19 be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the words in parentheses on page 19 be stricken out. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance Department: Pay of 7,239 officers, $16,743,807.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman state how many officers there are in this 7,239 in the Ordnance Department above normal? I want to ascertain what the increase is above the normal number.

Mr. DENT. In other words, what it was before the war. My recollection, offhand, is that there were something like 1,200 or 1,300 officers before the war.

Mr. KAHN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am asking the question in order to gauge the number of increases in the Army.

Mr. DENT. I can give the gentleman the figures by looking them up.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman at this point say about what the increase has been in the total number of officers of the Army?

Mr. DENT. I can by looking it up. I put the figures in the RECORD yesterday. There were before the war something like 7,500 officers in the Regular Army. We are now appropriating for 145,000 officers, that is an average, and we expect the number will reach 160,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was printed in the RECORD of yesterday?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I can give the gentleman an idea of the size of this increase by telling him that when the estimate was submitted to the committee in December they asked for pay of 2,000 ordnance officers, and now in this bill we are considering the matter of 7,239.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would indicate an increase of more than 5,000 officers since December last?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the information I was seeking.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would that ratio of increase hold as to all the officers between December last and the present time?

Mr. KAHN. I think so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask if the 7,239 officers in the Ordnance Department whose salaries are provided for include what we call the dollar-a-year men?

Mr. KAHN. No; the dollar-a-year men are civilians. The commissioned officers all receive salaries of the various grades in which they are commissioned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some of the dollar-a-year men are operating under the Ordnance Department, are they not?

Mr. KAHN. I imagine they are, but they are still civilian employees.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They wear the uniform?

Mr. KAHN. No; they do not. They do not wear a uniform at all; they are not commissioned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Until they are in the pay of the Government at something more than a nominal salary?

Mr. KAHN. Until they are in the Army subject to the rules and regulations of war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to get at that, because there are rumors floating about that men who obtain no pay, who are nominal employees of the Government, are wearing the uniform of the Army.

Mr. KAHN. I know of no instance of that kind.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask if all these officers are noncombatant?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; they are noncombatant officers; but I am told that the Ordnance officers who go across the Atlantic and are near the base of supplies there——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. KAHN. May I have one minute in which to finish this answer?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. The officers who go over there are subject to aeroplane attacks just the same as any other soldier.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. The Ordnance Department is not mentioned in the President's classification of noncombatant forces.

Mr. KAHN. They are not so classified.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But they are technically termed "noncombatant"?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; although they are not classified as noncombatant by the President's orders.

Mr. TILSON. From a military standpoint the gentleman will understand that they are not noncombatant. The Ordnance officers are really combatant, and the Medical Department and the chaplains are the only force that are not combatant from a military point of view.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman will recall that this question was asked of the Chief of Staff and he went on record before the committee as saying that the only noncombatants now recognized were the Medical Corps and the chaplains.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did not the President recently make an order declaring certain branches to be noncombatant?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is for the conscientious objector.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reserve veterinarians, $68,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. What is included in the reserve veterinarians? I want to direct the chairman's especial attention to this kind of a case that came to me: I have in my district two young men who graduated at a regular college for veterinarians. They are within the draft age, although they have practiced their profession, one of them for four years and the other one for two years. They were promptly drafted and taken into the ranks. I applied to the head of the veterinarian department here at Washington for a transfer of these men into the professional department as veterinarians, where their education, capacity, and training fitted them for service. Neither of them were men who could serve in the ranks very well, one being quite small in stature and the other being rather delicate. I was told there was not any method of release from the situation at this time, that they would have to remain in the ranks, and probably in the future they could be called into the service in their professional capacity. What is meant by this reserve veterinarians and what is the relief for the situation I present, if any?

Mr. DENT. This, of course, would not take care of that. Does the gentleman want to know how many that provides for?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes. What is provided for in this item, page 21, line 4, "reserve veterinarians, $68,000"?

Mr. CRAGO. They are the ones in the service that have been called to the service from the reserves.

Mr. KAHN. They are commissioned now.

Mr. ROBBINS. How many are there of those?

Mr. KAHN. Some thousands are now in the Army.

Mr. ROBBINS. There would not be many thousands if that is all you are going to pay for their salaries. If you are going to pay only $68,000 for their pay in the Army, there would not be 1,000 of them, but very few.

Mr. KAHN. They were provided for originally in the national-defense act of June 3, 1916.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want information. I am not seeking to impose an amendment on this section, because I do not know myself what the full import of it is, but I would like to know something about it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I rather think that it is a misprint, because the estimates that came down from the War Department were for $700,000 for these reserve veterinarians.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am sorry I spoke, if that is the case.

Mr. KAHN. On page 21 of the committee's print of the bill the chairman of the committee will find that the original estimates were for $700,000, and there was no request made by the department for an increase in that amount.

The appropriation for the last year, before we got into the war, was for $68,000, so I rather think that that must be a misprint and that the amount should be really $700,000.

Mr. DENT. I think there is some mistake there, and I ask unanimous consent that the item be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this paragraph may be passed temporarily——

Mr. ROBBINS. With the hope in the meantime this may be corrected and my two men taken care of, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. ROBBINS. I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this paragraph may be passed temporarily with the right to return to it at some future time during the consideration of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nurses, $26,724,000.

Mr. LITTLE. How many nurses are expected to be provided for by this item?

Mr. KAHN. I believe, if my memory is correct, that there were to be 30,000, and they are finding a great deal of difficulty in getting the number they require.

Mr. LITTLE. Are they to be male or female?

Mr. KAHN. Those are female nurses.

Mr. LITTLE. Another suggestion. Are there any colored nurses for the colored troops?

Mr. KAHN. Of that I have not been informed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Insular Affairs: Pay of three officers, $15,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire, beginning line 11, in reference to the following language:

Provided, That during the existing emergency the President is authorized to appoint in the Officers' Reserve Corps and the National Army, for service in the Judge Advocate General's Department, in addition to the grades now authorized, officers of the grades of first lieutenant and captain from such citizens as he shall find to be physically, mentally, and morally qualified for appointment.

There are two questions I would like to ask: First, if it is intended that they shall be attorneys, and, second, how many are intended to be appointed? It seems to me we have got about enough noncombatant officers, anyway.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman this will be a limitation and a reduction in expenditures, because under the present law there can be no appointment of first lieutenants and captains in the Judge Advocate General's Department, and the department recommended this amendment so that they could put men in there with the rank of first lieutenant and captain instead of major and so on up.

Mr. LITTLE. I think that is a good idea.

Mr. DENT. And save money.

Mr. LITTLE. Are those men to be attorneys?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. It does not say so.

Mr. FIELDS. It is understood that the men must pass an examination.

Mr. LITTLE. It does not say so. They do not have to pass any examination; it simply provides that the President is authorized to appoint, and so forth.

Mr. DENT. This simply changes the present law so as to reduce the grade to first lieutenant and captain.

Mr. KAHN. I desire to say to the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I want to ask either of the gentlemen: Ought not there be something more than to say here that a man shall be physically, mentally, and morally qualified? There is no examination provided, he does not have to be an attorney, and it seems to me very poorly drawn.

Mr. DENT. Well, this is the language that was prepared in the War Department by the Judge Advocate General's Office itself, and they think it will take care of it.

Mr. LITTLE. I think it ought to be corrected. Another thing I want to say to the chairman, does not he think there should be some limitation on the number? Why, we have got plenty of noncombatant officers now.

Mr. DENT. Their number is fixed in the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Not in connection with this.

Mr. DENT. The only difference is that we appropriate for the number of officers in the Judge Advocate General's Office.

Mr. LITTLE. I suppose that would limit the appointments. It seems to me there certainly should be some sort of examination.

Mr. DENT. I want to call the gentleman's attention to a question which was asked a moment ago in regard to the number of nurses. If the gentleman will look at page 267 of the hearings he will find that this item is intended for the purpose of providing 20,664 nurses.

At the time of this testimony, which was secured in January, I believe there were 4,300 in the service. The gentleman will find that on page 267 of the hearings.

Mr. LITTLE. That does not indicate whether there are to be any black nurses for black soldiers. I think it no more than fair that such provision be made. Those people are in on this war. They are all loyal Americans, and in these days when they go to war for the Republic they should be given every consideration. There is no place for a color line on the firing line.

Mr. DENT. No. No such thing as that is indicated there.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] if there would be any objection to an amendment to the paragraph requiring that those who are appointed shall have been actual practitioners at the bar during a period of years?

Mr. DENT. I think that is the rule now.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will state to the gentleman the regulations require now that they shall have had two years of practice in some court.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to put the gentleman on the witness stand, but I would like to know if it is not a fact that some men have been appointed to the Judge Advocate General's staff who are not learned in the law as we understand that term?

Mr. DENT. I have never heard of any cases of that kind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it true that the regulations require that these appointees should be learned in the law?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think I can inform the gentleman that the general policy is this: I have found out from recent experience that when a candidate for admission in the Judge Advocate's department presents himself he is requested to have his relationship to the department for that candidacy established through some officer of the American Bar Association in this city. There is where he is certified and vouched for in some way.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I think the gentleman has in mind the thought that some years ago the Judge Advocate General selected certain officers of the Army to go to the law schools in this city for the purpose of educating them in the law with the ultimate purpose of having them detailed to his department. Congress at that time took the matter up and decided to strike out provisions of that kind from the bill. And I understand that ever since then the men who have been commissioned in the Judge Advocate General's Department have been lawyers of recognized standing.

Mr. LITTLE. Do you not think we ought to put an amendment right in there, so that they would be?

Mr. KAHN. Well, there is no doubt in my mind but that the Judge Advocate General is exceedingly anxious to get men learned in the law, because the business of his department is growing enormously. He is not going to commission men in his department who are not lawyers, and who can not review the various classes of cases that are submitted to the Judge Advocate's Department for final action.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: On page 2, line 16, after the word "citizens" insert "learned in the law."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that on the ground that we have passed that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think we have come to it yet.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, I think we are several lines below it.

The CHAIRMAN. On page 21?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. To what line does the gentleman from Pennsylvania propose his amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is to the proviso on page 21, beginning with line 11. I am not sure we have passed it.

The CHAIRMAN. That paragraph was passed, the Chair will state to the gentleman, some time ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has been passed?

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we return to it and consider the gentleman's amendment. It will take but a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to return to the paragraph beginning on line 11, page 21.

Mr. DENT. I hope we will not delay the reading of the bill by any such matter as that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania let me call his attention to the fact that the amending of this law would not change the original statute on which these appropriations are based?

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky objects, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of courts-martial, courts of inquiry, military commissions, retiring boards, and compensation of reporters and witnesses attending same, and expenses of taking depositions and securing other evidence for use before the same, $350,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the matter of courts-martial has been very generally commented upon recently, and it has been suggested that some of the sentences have been exceptionally severe. I realize that in times of war it is necessary to maintain discipline, and that the courts, particularly the courts-martial, should be respected, and that the men in the ranks, as welll as officers, should adhere strictly to the regulations. But over on my desk are a number of clippings that have been forwarded to me from time to time with respect to the punishments meted out by courts-martial to some of the men, some of whom have been absent without leave and some of whom have offended their officers in various ways. Those punishments range all the way from a year to 20 years in prison. Now, these are war times, and such penalties as 15 or 20 years' imprisonment may be excused on the ground that we are at war and that discipline must be maintained in the Army.

But one of the things we are fighting for is freedom, or the lessening of the burdens which one man with arbitrary power is inclined to impose upon another, and I have been wondering whether at some point in this bill—and this is the proper point—attention should not be called to the fact that the public is beginning to think that some of these sentences by American courts-martial are extremely severe. They are not, of course, such punishments as would be meted out by a court or by a jury. There is some heart in the ordinary civilian judge. He understands, or ought to understand, the element of human sympathy. He understands as well, of course, the necessity of enforcing the law. But a military board is a different tribunal; it is a little less formal perhaps and a little more severe when it comes to punishments; and it is a question in the minds of many people whether harsh sentences, such as courts-martial sometimes impose, are actually as effective as they are intended to be.

Granted that a boy may have left the camp without leave, or he may have gone to see a sick relative, or that he had some call which he felt himself obliged to respond to, notwithstanding the regulations. Granted that it was wrong for him to violate those regulations. Do you make a better soldier out of that fellow by trying him and sentencing him to 20 years' imprisonment? Granted that his immediate commanding officer, who may not have been his superior in intelligence, has been offended at something he has done, and that he has been drawn before a court-martial for insubordination. Does it make him a better soldier or more subservient to the regulations to send him into limbo for 15 or 20 or 25 years?

I bring this matter to the attention of the House because this is the one place where these matters can be discussed.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. If it is 15 or 20 years it will keep him out of the trenches, will it not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; it will keep him out of the trenches. That may be the purpose of it. But I should hope not for the sake of the culprit or of the Army itself.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The fear that some of these sentences might be inflicted upon mischievous young gentlemen in the service who had committed a breach of the regulations, so that they might be kept out of the trenches, led to a recasting of the policy that might be followed by the Judge Advocate General, and in order that the sentence imposed would not have the effect of doing away with active field duty on the part of the man sentenced, it has led in some cases to a postponement of the sentence, so that the soldier might be required to serve first.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is well informed in matters of war. He was a soldier himself. I want to ask him to answer my question, Whether it makes the man a better soldier by giving him an undue punishment?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It makes a difference, due to the circumstances of the case, just as it does in civil life. A captain has a certain amount of undefined, but generally understood, latitude of power in the regulation of discipline in his command. And if he is a wise man, as in the case of a wise employer of labor in civil life, he may make use of a milder kind of discipline that does not appear on the court record.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is all right if the captain uses wisdom and discretion. But if he has an ill temper or a bad liver or is out of sorts with the world and with his regiment it may turn out that his treatment of the men in his company may be unduly severe.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I had a letter from two boys who went from my district into the Army down at Houston, and after they had been there for some time they wanted to get a furlough to go home and see the folks. They were homesick. They could not get the furlough, and the result was that they went home and had their little visit and then turned around and came back.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Were they court-martialed?

Mr. CANNON. They were arrested. I have not heard from them since, but I went to The Adjutant General's office and put it up to them. I said I have not any doubt—here is the letter—but what those boys knew better, but they were homesick. He said I have not much doubt about it either. He said that is one thing that newly enlisted soldiers and newly drafted soldiers have to contend with. Homesickness is a very serious matter. I took it for granted that they had some punishment, although I guess it was not very severe.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman had better send his secretary to see what the punishment was.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Having returned to the camp, I would say they were not attempting to escape the service. They were wrong in leaving camp, but a 15-year sentence would not make good soldiers of them, surely.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I appreciate the sentiment expressed by my friend from Pennsylvania, but he fails to recognize that we are now at war and that discipline must be enforced, and that the proper authorities to enforce the discipline in the Army must of necessity be the Army officers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I distinctly recognize the value of discipline, and I am in favor of discipline all through, but I was suggesting that some of these court-martial sentences seem to be very harsh.

Mr. QUIN. I admit that they seem harsh, but we are at war, and we must expect these Army officers to maintain discipline with a firmer hand than the courts over citizens by civil-court proceedings. These young men who violate the regulations of the Army do it knowingly—whether it is willful or not I am not able to say—but if there is any case where Army officials have administered undue punishment to the soldier, he has the right to appeal to the White House to the Commander in Chief, that great man who has the milk of human kindness in his heart and can appreciate wrong from right. It would be a dangerous thing for this Congress to in any way handicap the officers of the Army in enforcing discipline.

I admit that it seems hard for a fellow who gets homesick, who leaves a camp and gets a sentence, but it must be held up as an example to all the rest of the soldiers in the camp, because if one or a dozen or fifty can leave a camp without leave and not be subject to punishment, the whole camp would be demoralized, and for that reason I think we had better let the Army officials enforce discipline according to their judgment of what is best for the Army. In times of peace it might be all right to have the sentences as lenient as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD the following telegram in reference to the Red Cross drive.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to insert a telegram in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegram is as follows:

BOGALUSA, LA., May 27, 1918.

Hon. J. Y. SANDERS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

We are happy to advise that the citizens of Bogalusa and Washington Parish have given over $22,000 to the Red Cross drive, which closed to-day. Our allotment of $10,000 was oversubscribed on the first day of the drive. In so far as we can learn, your home city and parish have made the best record in the State.

J. H. CASSIDY,
Parish Chairman of Red Cross.
W. C. FLANDERS,
Secretary.

Mr. LITTLE rose.

Mr. DENT. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. LITTLE. Just a moment; I want to correct a misapprehension.

Mr. DENT. Will three minutes do?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Then, Mr. Chairman, at the expiration of that time I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to close all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto at the expiration of three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I do not want the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to go unchallenged. It would be a gross injustice to the military courts-martial and to the officers. As a matter of fact, the officers of the courts-martial in other years, as a rule, have not been particularly harsh. Of course, it sometimes happens that the sentence will be hard on a man, but that also is true in the civil courts. The military courts-martial are not governed by the captain's say-so. The captain may be pretty hard on one of the soldiers, but when it gets to the court-martial that does not count. The judge advocate, the prosecuting officer, is not always much of a lawyer. He may come from civil life, and while the commanding officer gets mad all through, the members of the court-martial know it, and they do not act from his recommendation. They depend on the evidence—or did formerly. They are not all selected from the same regiment, and frequently do not know the officer making the charge. They are scattered, selected from various regiments.

I think you will find, as a rule, that these boys do not get much worse sentences than they deserve, and sometimes, perhaps, less. I do not say it never happens otherwise, but it would be an injustice to the officers of the Army to let that statement that the sentences are too harsh go unchallenged. It has been suggested that discipline is necessary. That largely depends upon the personality of the captain or the colonel of the regiment. The maintenance of discipline depends on his personality. The fellows who go before the courts-martial, as a rule, are men who need some attention. I want to get that straight in the RECORD, so that the statement will not go unchallenged. If at the present time there are long sentences for small offenses, the matter should be given attention. Of course, very likely the bureaucracy, unfamiliar with actual field work, may have exaggerated views of what punishment should be inflicted for trivial infractions of the rules. But when our officers have had actual experience this will be remedied.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional 20 per cent increase of pay of enlisted men on foreign service, $89,806.752.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a typographical error in the figures $89,806,752 in line 4, page 24. There should be a comma instead of a period. Without objection, the Clerk will be authorized to make the correction.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. That amount must be a mistake. It does not amount to $89.000,000, does it?

Mr. DENT. That is the amount figured by the Quartermaster's Department that will be due under the law.

Mr. KAHN. The enlisted men get a 20 per cent increase for foreign service; and as by the end of 1919 we expect to have 3,000,000 men on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean, the gentleman can readily see that the 20 per cent increase in salary will figure out a considerable amount.

Mr. FIELDS. It is a matter of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read to the conclusion of line 20, on page 31.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman from Alabama think we have gone far enough to-night?

Mr. DENT. Yes; I think we have. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. GARNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD in order to print a short patriotic address delivered by Hon. Houston B. Teehee, Register of the Treasury, to his coworkers down there.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a patriotic address delivered by Mr. Teehee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. On what subject?

Mr. LINTHICUM. On Adjourning Politics.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman's own remarks or an editorial?

Mr. LINTHICUM. An editorial.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

CONTESTED ELECTION CASE—STEELE AGAINST SCOTT OF IOWA (H. REPT. NO. 595).

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that on next Tuesday I shall call up the contested election case of Steele against Scott, from the eleventh district of Iowa. I have conferred with the majority leader and the minority leader.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not expect much discussion in that case, does he?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. So far as I know, I do not expect there will be much discussion; but of course it is impossible to tell.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. A unanimous report of Committee on Elections No. 1.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments to the Military Academy appropriation bill, H. R. 11185, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments to the Military Academy appropriation bill and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker pro tempore appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DENT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.), under the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until Friday, May 31, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting a proposed clause of legislation authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow and credit in the accounts of Brig. Gen. Frederic V. Abbot, Engineers, National Army, the sum of $4,000 (H. Doc. No. 1140), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 31, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thy grace and wisdom that we may desire no higher good than that which comes from Thee, that we may have our delight in Thy law and in people that do Thy will, that our desire may be the establishment of Thy kingdom and our purpose the glory of Thy name. We pray Thee to help us to put away from us every evil thing and guide us in Thy way that we may accomplish Thy divine purpose in us as a nation. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore (Mr. SAULSBURY) assumed the chair.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, May 28, 1918, was read and approved.

SELECTIVE DRAFT—GEN. LEONARD WOOD.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, recently I had occasion to advert to the disproportionate burden placed upon some of the States of the Union by the quota for the present draft. I pointed out at that time that the enthusiasm of those States which had responded to the appeal of the Nation for volunteers was penalized by the method adopted.

I desire to read into the RECORD a letter upon this subject which has come to me from V. S. McClatchy, of the Sacramento Bee, a gentleman of the highest standing, very well known in California, with three sons in the service:

> In connection with your effort to induce, on the part of the administration, proper allowance to California and other States who have exceeded their conscription quota through the volunteer movement, and particularly as affecting the case of California, this information will be of interest to you.
> Under the policy adopted, as you point out, California will be penalized for her patriotism in volunteering. She will be called upon for a quota far in excess of the proportion demanded from a number of other States.
> One result of this will be that our labor supply, already very gravely depleted, will be still further decreased. Farmers are already disinclined to enlarge their field operations because of the probability that the crops can not be harvested through lack of labor at the proper time, and because of the further probability that the cost of such labor as can be secured will be so excessive as to make a loss instead of a profit.
> Ralph Merritt, food administrator for this State, declared in an address on May 18, as per clipping inclosed, that California has supplied more food to the allies per capita than any other State in the Union, and that she is sending forward to the allies 50,000 tons of foodstuffs a month. California, as you know, because of climatic and soil conditions, can produce enormously in excess of what she is now producing, and far beyond the possibilities of most States. What will handicap her in going to the limit of her capabilities in this line is, in part, shortage of labor, and the policy of the administration in placing upon her a disproportionate conscription burden will react upon the whole Nation and her allies in the curtailing of the food production in this State.
> Sincerely, yours, V. S. MCCLATCHY.

This, Mr President, but adds to that which I said upon the subject some weeks ago and demonstrates not only that an injustice is done when the country asks for volunteers in not giving credit to those volunteers in the draft quota, but in addition to that seriously affects the work which must be done behind the lines and the furnishing of indispensable supplies to our own country and our allies.

Mr. President, while I am upon my feet there is one other matter to which in a few sentences I desire to advert. I wish to express my very deep regret that in this crisis the services of such a distinguished soldier as Gen. Wood should not be utilized.

I speak but a personal opinion. I do not know Gen. Wood, except as the Nation knows him, as one of our most accomplished, able, and intrepid commanders—an officer with a brilliant record, whose services to the Republic have entitled him to the highest esteem, indeed the affection, of our people.

It is in this day, Mr. President, when "politics is adjourned" I read of this eminent general, pursuant to his orders, arriving with his command at the point of embarkation only to be met as he was about to take ship for France with orders sending him to the far West. We have dire need for such men—dire need for such a soldier as Gen. Wood.

It is with sadness, sir, that I voice my very great regret that those across the sea who bear our flag and fight our battles are, particularly under such circumstances, deprived of the ability and the services of Gen. Leonard Wood.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. RAKER, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and Mr. SINNOTT managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11185) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I send to the desk a letter from Hon. J. S. Cullinan, of Houston, Tex., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 17, 1918.

Hon. JOE H. EAGLE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. EAGLE: I have just read the Emergency Fleet Corporation News, dated May 13, reporting on the launching of the steamship Tuckahoe in the world's record of 27 days 3 hours and 10 minutes.

Considering the vital importance of ships in carrying out the war program, this achievement seems to me second to none that has developed since we entered the war.

I believe it demonstrates the wisdom—

First. Of having placed Chairman Hurley in charge of the Shipping Board.

Second. Securing the services of America's most capable captain of industry, Charles M. Schwab, who fortunately combines experience with a heart and a head, so essential to understanding the men behind the lines on which our military success will be made possible.

In reading this article and other newspaper announcements regarding the launching of the Tuckahoe, I am impressed with one point that the country and the press seemed to have entirely lost sight of.

I am writing you this letter to call your attention to that point in order that the record may be kept straight.

The success now being achieved in our ship construction comes largely, if not wholly, from adopting the policy of utilizing the Nation's steel fabricating capacity at the points where such were located and shipping the material to the yards located on the seacoast.

As you know, I had frequent conferences last year with members of the Shipping Board on this question, which I in turn discussed with Senator SHEPPARD, yourself, and others. In my judgment adopting the policy of utilizing this fabricating capacity was due solely to the foresight of Gen. George W. Goethals. The point I wish to make is that our press and the public seem to have overlooked this fact, to be more or less indifferent, or to have forgotten his wonderful achievement at Panama, and to have adopted a policy more or less critical of his connection with the Shipping Board, leaving it to posterity to dig out the facts and give him the credit which he so justly deserves.

While I realize that your time is greatly absorbed, I trust that when occasion offers you will discuss this point with Senator SHEPPARD, and after further developing and confirming the facts herein stated one of you see to it that such facts are entered in the record.

I am quite sure that Chairman Hurley, Mr. Schwab, and other members of the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation would most heartily concur in this suggestion.

With personal regards and respects, believe me,

Yours, very truly, J. S. CULLINAN.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have here resolutions adopted by the Commercial Club of the city of Belle Fourche, S. Dak., which I send to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolution.

At a recent meeting of the board of directors a spirited discussion was engaged in, having as its origin the drafting of labor to meet the needs of our Government and the abolition of industrial disturbances throughout the United States. The various problems arising were discussed in an able manner by different members of the board, and the following resolutions were compiled, passed, and transmitted to the national chamber at Washington, D. C.:

"Whereas our country is now engaged in a great war, fighting for the preservation of the common rights of humanity; and

"Whereas the preparations for the conduct of such war have been hindered and impeded by numerous strikes among the industrial workers, and by these strikes the great shipbuilding program and other war-time activities of the Government have been retarded to such an extent that the individual and collective interests of the Government and its citizens have been jeopardized, to the sole advantage of the enemy; and

"Whereas the continued tolerance of the individuals and organizations engaging in these strikes or industrial disturbances will prolong unnecessarily the victorious ending of the war and will cause needlessly the sacrifice of many lives and untold treasure; and

"Whereas the potency of a government to support the soldiers in the field with the proper and necessary rations necessary to sustain the Army at the greatest fighting capacity without the slightest hindrance or delay logically is, and politically should be, as great as it is, to call men from their homes and firesides to actually engage in the conflict; and

"Whereas, due to the inability of the Government to procure sufficient skilled labor to engage in shipbuilding, manufacturing of aeroplanes, ammunition, and numerous other ordnance supplies of vital military and naval importance, the Government's military plans are being retarded in a manner detrimental to the individual and collective interests of the Government and its citizens: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the commercial club of the city of Belle Fourche, S. Dak., earnestly request that the Congress of the United States immediately pass such suitable laws as will empower our President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, to draft all men between the ages of 20 and 60 into the military forces of our country for such services therein as they may be individually best fitted to perform: Therefore be it further

"Resolved, That we further petition the Congress of the United States to pass suitable laws prohibiting strikes or industrial disturbances at least during the period of the war and establishing a board of arbitration to hear and determine all cases of disputes between employers and employees."

Mr. CUMMINS. I present a petition signed by more than 700 citizens of Ames, Iowa, relating to emergency war-time prohibition. I ask that the petition, which is very brief, be read, and that it be then appropriately referred. I request that the names be omitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PETITION TO THE SENATE FOR EMERGENCY WAR PROHIBITION.

AMES, IOWA, May 27, 1918.

This is a time of stress in our national life. There is shortage of grain for food purposes, and every household in the land has been restricted in the use of certain cereal foods. In the situation it would seem that our provision for economy ought to extend to the denial of grain to any commercial use not specifically intended to serve the cause of our arms in a definite way. For instance, the grain that is consumed by the breweries and the distilleries ought to be available for the use of our Army abroad.

We, the undersigned, participate in the conservation that is essential to the winning of the war. In this critical hour when the life of our democracy depends upon the conservation of all the resources of the Nation, we believe that any dissipation of available energy is imprudent, and even threatens the defeat of the cause for which we are at war. We desire, therefore, that the common sacrifice of all the people to the cause of liberty be not impaired or lessened by the inefficiency resulting from the manufacture and use of intoxicating beverages.

We therefore respectfully petition the Senate to enact a law speedily providing for emergency war prohibition.

Mr. NELSON. I have a petition here signed by 58 of the posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, representing the majority of the living ex-soldiers of the Civil War residents of Minnesota, in favor of additional pension legislation. I ask that the petition may be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Claremont, Dawson, Russell, and of the congregation of the La Sueur Evangelical Lutheran Church, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Greybull, Wyo., praying for the enactment of further prohibition legislation as a war-time measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of Kilbourn Post, No. 361, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, of Sherwood; of Eddy Post, No. 231, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, of Plymouth; and of W. T. Sherman Post, No. 410, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, of Vassar, all in the State of Michigan, praying for an increase in the pensions of veterans of the Civil War, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Club of Adrian, Mich., and a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of East Jordan, Mich., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Guy V. Henry Camp, No. 3, United Spanish War Veterans, of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions to soldiers and sailors who served in the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition, and to widows, minor children under 16 years of age, and dependent parents of such soldiers and sailors, which was ordered to lie on the table.

MEMORIAL DAY ADDRESS BY SENATOR CURTIS.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD the able and eloquent address delivered yesterday by my colleague, the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] at the Memorial Day services at Arlington, Va.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

[Memorial Day speech at Arlington, May 30, 1918, by Senator CHARLES CURTIS.]

"It is indeed a great honor and a special distinction to be invited to deliver the Memorial Day address at Arlington, this great and silent city of the noble dead, who gave their lives that our Government should not perish from the earth. It is proper that these beautiful grounds on the banks of the historic Potomac should have been selected as the last resting place of thousands of brave men who offered their lives that this Nation might live. Here they peacefully sleep, but they did not die in vain, and you veterans, their comrades, did not suffer in vain. For the world is just beginning to realize what a powerful Government you preserved and what a leading part it is able to take in the affairs of the world.

"It was only 57 years ago that the tramp of the sentinel and the call of the bugle were heard here, and should the Capitol over yonder ever be in danger, these graves and the memory of the principles for which these men fought will inspire our people to give up their all and fight to the very last for its preservation. The Capitol, our Government, and our flag are dear to every loyal heart in this broad land.

"To-day in every city and hamlet in the United States people have gathered to cover the graves of our soldier and sailor dead with beautiful flowers and show their deep appreciation for the splendid work, the wonderful courage, and the great sacrifice of those who have passed to the great beyond, and there will be no regrets should a tear or a flower fall on the grave of one who wore the gray.

"To-day they are decorating the graves of the brave American soldiers who have died in the great world conflict in France, but they and those who follow them will not have died in vain, because when the war is over, Kaiserism, autocracy, and the false doctrine that 'Might makes right' will have perished from the face of the earth.

"We are glad that the Red Cross is to have charge of the decoration of the graves of our soldiers and sailors in France. What a wonderful and Christian work the Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Salvation Army, and other organizations are doing 'over there,' and their timely and successful work will not be forgotten by a grateful people.

"Some 56 years ago you and your comrades were fighting to preserve the Union; fighting to hold the States together; fighting to make men free; fighting to uphold the Constitution; and you were fighting for the Stars and Stripes, the flag of our country, the emblem of liberty. When the war was over and you returned to your homes and your dear ones, you little dreamed that in fifty-odd years nearly the entire world would be at war, and that your sons and your grandsons and the sons and the grandsons of those who fought on the other side in that great struggle would be fighting side by side to uphold the rights of our Nation under international law, for our right to freedom of the seas, for the rights of the weaker nations against the oppression of the stronger, for the establishment of the fact that a treaty between nations is more than 'a scrap of paper,' and that they would be fighting for civilization throughout the world. We have always had faith in the supremacy of God, the controller of the destinies of nations and the movements of men. When the establishment of our Republic was in danger, when the need of a great leader was felt, there came forth in the struggling colonies George Washington. He has since been known as the 'first in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen.' When the contest was uncertain, and when assistance must be had, France sent to us Lafayette. France is now finding that the bread cast upon the waters is being returned, and we will send all the men needed to help drive the enemies of civilization and the invaders from Belgium and France.

"Later and in your time, when compromise after compromise had failed to settle a vital question and the time was near at hand when the strength of the Nation was to be put to the severest test, there moved to the West—to the then Territory of Kansas—a man who was to give his life to hasten the conflict which would settle that question once and for all. That man was old John Brown, of Ossawatomie. He did not live to see the object for which he gave his life accomplished, but you soldiers at the front quickened your steps as you sang 'John Brown's body lies mouldering in the grave, but his soul goes marching on.' Just a little later, when a leader was to be selected, the lot fell to a pioneer lawyer, a man who had not been trained in statecraft and diplomacy, but a man who knew men; a man who had a heart that beat and a mind that thought for the people. This man was elected President, and he made the greatest and the best President our country has ever had. That wonderful man was Abraham Lincoln. After the war came and after the Union forces had met defeat a number of times, and when the tide of war was uncertain, a great military leader was needed, and from the long list of gallant officers there was selected the silent soldier and the world was given its greatest general, U. S. Grant. It is unnecessary for me to name the great generals which the war produced; you remember them, you were glad to follow them—Sheridan, Meade, Hancock, Hooker, Sherman, and others—but these men could not have won the war without the splendid fighting and the loyal support of the brave men in the ranks.

"In 1914, when poor little Belgium was invaded and when Paris was threatened, there stood the great Gen. Joffre. As the war has continued there have been found to face and hold back that military machine Haig, Petain, Diaz, the great Foch, and our Black Jack Pershing. Our prayer to-day is that these men may be found equal to the great crisis which now confronts the allied forces, and may lead these forces to a final and decisive victory.

"History is repeating itself in this country. When President Lincoln took his oath of office there were some strong men from the North in the Congress who did not belong to his political party, and out in his own State of Illinois there were two very strong men who had opposed him—the little giant, Stephen A. Douglas, and the able and fearless John A. Logan—but when war came the President found Stephen A. Douglas one of his strongest supporters in the Senate, and he was found ever ready to do his part to help win the war; and the other, believing he could do more at the front, left his seat in the House, returned to his State, and helped secure volunteers, and afterwards John A. Logan became the greatest volunteer general the world had ever known. The loyal men in Congress then forgot party lines. In the Congress to-day, on matters pertaining to the war, there are no party lines drawn, and the members of one of the great political parties, the one to which the President does not belong, are doing everything they can to help win the war. On matters pertaining to the war the Members of the Republican Party, as well as the Democratic Party, are standing by the Government. They have upheld and will continue to uphold the hands of President Wilson in all legislation necessary to carry the war to a final victory. He is the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, and he will have the full support as such of the loyal men and women of the country. Then, again, I know you men and women remember the one man in the House who from the time the war began in 1914 and before our country became seriously involved urged the administration and the Congress to prepare for war. He pointed out our weakness and our unpreparedness on land and sea, and when war came he resigned his seat in the House, gave his services to his country, and was preparing and hoping to be sent to France with his command, but death took him from us. He was the brave and fearless Augustus P. Gardner, of Massachusetts, whose death we all mourn.

"I could name the Members of the Senate and House who belong to the minority who are ready and anxious to join with those of the majority and do everything that can be done to hasten the war to a victorious conclusion, but that is unnecessary, for you, the people of Washington, know them, and you know that when the President needs war legislation it is only necessary for him to call and those of the minority will join the members of his party in the Congress, and they will quickly and fully respond. It can truthfully be said that in this country to-day no political party has a monopoly on patriotism.

"In the great war in which you were actors there were slackers at home then, and there are some now. I hope those of to-day may be run down as fast as possible. You had spies then, and there are spies in this country now. May they be caught and punished as they deserve to be punished. I do not think action should be delayed until daybreak. There were profiteers then—we have them now. I hope they may be put out of business. You had brave men in every walk of life who were ready and willing to give their lives for their country's cause—we have the same kind of men to-day. The women were busy with their comfort committees, busy as nurses, and they were giving their love and gentle care, as they are now. To-day the women are filling the places and performing the duties of men. A vast majority of the people are ready and willing to do their part; all they ask is that the laws be honestly and faithfully administered and that the taxes they pay be economically expended, and that no favoritism be shown.

"You men have lived long and active lives; you have had many calls, but there is one call you will remember above all others, that was the call of your country, which you answered so quickly and proudly. You went to the front singing 'We are coming, Father Abraham, 300,000 strong.' You have never regretted your answer, you have always been proud of the fact that you helped hold the States together. To-day your boys are answering their country's call, and they will fight to the end. They, too, will never regret what they are doing for humanity and civilization. At the beginning of the great Civil War there were many who did not believe the Union could be saved, but they did not know the people of the North, East, and West, and some in the South. They did not know the make-up of the Union Army. Many thought that war would last but a few months, but it lasted four long hard and bloody years. It lasted until slavery was abolished in this country; it lasted until the rights of the Nation were recognized; yes, it did not end until there was a great and lasting victory for the Union, and I am happy to say that now the people of every section of the country are glad it ended as it did.

"I have been asked how long the present war will last. This I can not answer, but I know one thing, and that is it will not end until there is a victory of right over wrong. It will not end until there is a decisive and lasting victory for civilization.

"Your wonderful victory of 53 years ago opened the eyes of the world; you fought with the old-time cannon, musket, and bayonet. I have read accounts of the trench and other methods of fighting in the present great war, but I doubt if the real old-time fighting of your armies has been excelled. I know you who were in the cavalry would like to wake up some morning and read of a great and successful cavalry charge by our allied armies.

"They have new inventions now, and new methods. The airplane, an American invention, and, by the way, I hope we may soon be sending them over in large numbers—there is no reason, that I know of, why hundreds have not been sent, but we will not talk of what might have been done; we will express the hope for better results in the near future—and we hope the skies may soon be darkened with our airplanes, and that we will be supreme in the sky and on the land. Then there is the submarine, an American invention. May some of our inventors find a device that will put the submarine out of business. From recent reports we learn they are not doing as much damage as they were a short time ago. I am not here to talk of inventions. I do want to tell you how much this country is indebted to the Union soldiers and the loyal women of the country for their great, wonderful, and timely service from 1861 to 1865. We have enjoyed the blessings which came to us as a result of your loyalty and devotion to your country, a service which brought you honorable scars when you were making the earth tremble beneath your mighty tread. Our Union was preserved and our Constitution, the articles of which are cemented by the blood of our brave men and the tears of our noble women, was upheld.

"I do not intend to detain you by telling you of the great battles in which many of you were engaged; those awful times of shot and shell come back to you to-day more vividly than any tongue can describe or any brush can paint.

"Some years ago I went over the field of the great and decisive Battle of Gettysburg—what a victory was won there. It was surely the turning of the tide, the beginning of the end. You remember Shiloh, Mission Ridge, Winchester; some of you fought with Hooker above the clouds, and remember Lookout Mountain. Many, I know, marched with Sherman to the sea, and some of you saw the curtain fall at Appomattox, and if you did not see it, you were all glad it fell—glad to know the war was over and you could go back to the dear ones left behind. Over there are the remains of 2,111 unknown dead; their names are unknown and there is no record here of their brave deeds, but their names and deeds are recorded in the great book.

"I am glad to see the mothers, wives, and sisters here to-day. You did your full duty then and you had your share of suffering, but you suffered in silence then as you and others are suffering in silence now. The noble work of the women from '61 to '65 will not be forgotten, and if you have no dear one 'over there' your hearts go out to your sisters who have. Long live the splendid organizations such as the Women's Relief Corps, the Women of the Grand Army of the Republic, and other similar organizations, and may their good work go on and on. May I mention the Sons of Veterans, and express the hope that every son of an ex-Union soldier may join the splendid organization?

"You who wore the blue made up the grandest army and you fought in the greatest war which history had recorded up to that time. The victory you won was greater than was first realized. It united the people of this country as they had never been united before, it wiped out the curse of slavery, and it made the United States a great world power.

"The real test did not come until 20 years ago, when our country was compelled to go to war with Spain, when you saw the sons of the rich man and the sons of the poor man, you saw the boys of the North and the South and the East and the West fighting side by side to uphold the honor of our common and united country. That war did not last long, but it demonstrated what the young men of the country were willing to do—they were ready to fight in a foreign land for the sake of humanity. I have always believed that the young men of this country should be reared with a definite understanding of the principles for which you and your comrades fought from '61 to '65, for as long as we remain true to those principles there will be no danger to our form of government; but if those principles are ever forgotten or abandoned, no one can tell what will happen. For one, I have full faith and confidence in the wisdom of the American people, and so long as we have a Government of, for, and by the people, we are in no danger.

"With our great success and wonderful prosperity we have neglected to keep as well prepared as we should have, and I hope the future will find our beloved country prepared for any danger which may arise, for a little preparation at the proper time would have saved many lives, would have saved millions of money, and would have prevented untold suffering.

"Some of you marched down Pennsylvania Avenue in the grand review. If you did, you read inscribed on a canvas attached to the Treasury Building the following: 'There is one debt which we can never pay; that is the debt we owe to our soldiers and sailors.' That was true then, and it is true to-day. Since I have been in Congress I have always voted for all legislation proposed for the benefit of the Union soldier, his widow and orphans, and in behalf of the soldiers of other wars and their widows and orphans, because of the debt we owed the brave soldiers of our land. You won the war, you preserved the Union, and after the war many of the Union soldiers became pioneers and the frontier disappeared before them. Our country has been developed, her great resources have been uncovered, and it has become a rich and prosperous Nation.

"After the beginning of the war in 1914 we were neutral, and we hoped and prayed that we might be permitted to remain so, but it was decreed that we should be drawn into that great war. Our rights as neutrals and the rights of all neutrals were openly disregarded. International law was violated, the freedom of the seas was denied, and the false doctrine of 'Might makes right' was openly advocated, and our citizens—men, women, and children—were sent to the bottom of the sea without warning. A state of war was forced upon us, and now we will remain in it until international laws are obeyed, until the freedom of the seas is recognized, until treaties between nations are regarded as binding obligations, and until there is a lasting and decisive victory. I believe some day there will be lasting peace, for it is written, 'And He shall judge among many people and rebuke strong nations afar off, and they shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.' Why can not the victory in this war be so great that the promise made shall be fulfilled at this time?

"We have been the great melting pot of the world, and now in this crisis we are to find out if the metal is base or the pure gold of Americanism. Its purity can only be shown by those who have gone through the fire and emerged American citizens, ready to put the United States, their adopted country, ahead of all other countries, and are ready and willing to stand for and defend our country against the world. This is the only true test.

"Mr. Commander, soldiers and sailors of the War of 1861 to 1865, we stand before you to-day with bowed and uncovered heads, because we know the great debt we owe you. Our Constitution still stands as a model to other nations. You fought to uphold it. Our Union of States is still secure. You offered your lives to preserve it. Our Government still stands. It was good enough for you to fight for; it was good enough for your comrades whose graves are being decorated to-day to die for; it was good enough for our mothers to pray and suffer for; and it is good enough for every true and loyal American citizen.

"We have but one prayer to-day, and that is that the Stars and Stripes, our flag, may always remain what you fought to make it, the true emblem of liberty and a protection to every American citizen in every part of the civilized world."

GRADES OF MEDICAL OFFICERS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. OWEN. I submit for the RECORD a comment on the grades for the medical officers of the Army by Maj. Louis L. Seaman. It is a very short, pungent comment, and I think it ought to be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRADES OF MEDICAL OFFICERS IN THE ARMY.

[By Maj. Louis L. Seaman, M. D.]

"A grave crisis for the American soldier awaits the decision of Congress—a military question of most serious import, although to the casual observer it may seem comparatively trivial. It is embodied in the bills introduced by Mr. OWEN in the Senate and Mr. HICKS in the House for 'fixing the grades of the commissioned officers of the Medical Corps of the United States Army on active duty, and for other purposes,' and is as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the commissioned officers of the Medical Corps and of the Medical Reserve Corps of the United States Army on active duty shall be distributed in the several grades in the same ratios heretofore established by law in the Medical Corps of the United States Navy. The Surgeon General shall have authority to designate as 'consultants' officers of either corps, and relieve them as the interest of the service may require.

"SEC. 2. That the Medical Corps, through its officers, shall have supervision and control of the hygiene and sanitation of posts, camps, commands, and troops under such regulations as the President may establish, with authority to issue and enforce such orders as will prevent or diminish disease, except that when such orders interfere with necessary war operations the military commander may suspend them.

"All of which means as follows:

"Shall the American soldier in the present war be sacrificed to preventable diseases, through red tape and the petty jealousies of line and staff officers—as has occurred to a frightful extent in past wars—or shall he be allowed to retain his health under the most advanced science of the age?

"That is the real question Congress is asked to settle, and when it is remembered that in every war in which the United States has engaged, indeed in all the prolonged wars of history—except the Russo-Japanese War—the medical officer has had to combat the foe that has caused 80 per cent of the mortality—never less than four times, and often twenty times as many as the artillery, infantry, mines, and all other methods of physical destruction combined, there should be no question as to the result.

"The Surgeon General of the Army asks for higher rank for the members of his corps, that they shall be graded the same as in the Medical Department of the Navy, because it will add to the prestige of the corps, and thereby increase their influence. Unquestionably, increased rank will have some effect, especially when it is remembered that the reserve corps to-day constitute over 80 per cent of the total Medical Corps of the Army, and is made up of the cream of the American medical profession. But at the hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate on March 15, when discussing sanitary regulations and recommendations made by medical officers, Senator OWEN said:

"A brigadier general of the line does not hesitate to disregard advice bearing on typhoid fever or pneumonia which is given by an officer of subordinate rank, and unless the Medical Department has rank it is difficult for the line officers to realize that the advice which the medical officer gives should be taken upon the basis of its merits and not upon the basis of the rank of the one who makes the recommendation. Upon that point I think Gen. Gorgas should explain to the committee his opinion.

"Gen. GORGAS. I think that is the real argument from the standpoint of efficiency for this increased rank.

"Later, Senator HITCHCOCK asked this question:

"Suppose a division commander or a camp commander refuses to take the advice of a medical officer, advice which the medical officer deems essential; has he any way of bringing it up to you, and can you issue superior orders to compel the recognition of the medical officer's advice through your rank as compared with the rank of that officer?

"Gen. GORGAS. Cases of that kind are constantly coming up, where the medical officer disagrees with his division commander. He sends it up through The Adjutant General. You know, I am just an advisory officer. I have no direct authority anywhere. The Adjutant General sends it over to me practically for advice, but my action would go with regard to it. If I concur with the medical officer, the Secretary and Adjutant General would take it into consideration. Of course, they are the final authorities in the matter.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. The Secretary and The Adjutant General would finally decide the question?

"Gen. GORGAS. Yes.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. So that your power is only advisory?

"General GORGAS. My power is only advisory.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. And even if there were a brigadier general on the spot, his powers would be only advisory?

"Gen. GORGAS. In the Medical Department? Yes; his powers are only advisory.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. So that mere rank does not give authority?

"Gen. GORGAS. It does not give authority.

"Thus it is seen the medical officer or department in the Army to-day has no authority. Without some authority, which may be exercised without interfering with the strategy or military operations of war, i. e., when the army as not actually engaged in battle, it is possible his department may again prove a humiliating failure, as it has in every war in which our forces have ever engaged. I have been present, either as an officer or observer, in eight wars, in every continent in the world, and I assert that the medical officer in our Army has not even the privileges which would enable him to maintain the health of the men who are intrusted to his care. He selects recruits because of their youth, health, and physical ability to withstand the hardship of war. It should be his business first, last, and nearly all the time to maintain this condition, and he would do it if given adequate authority. Then if he failed he should be court-martialed and dismissed from the service. But he has no authority, not even over the ration. The vast majority of diseases which incapacitate an army result from autointoxications, which could be prevented by proper dietary. Witness the Spanish-American War, where in a period of three months, as stated in the report of the Surgeon General, '293 men died from battle and other casualties and 3,681 from disease'; and in this army of 170,000 there were 158,000 hospital admissions, or 90 per cent, although three-fourths of the men never left the camps of their native land. The Japanese Army had for the same period about 4 per cent hospital admissions, including their wounded, or about one twenty-second times as many. The vast difference in these figures illustrates the value of a medical and sanitary department properly equipped and empowered to enforce practical sanitation and supervision of the dietary. I believe that if this department had been properly systematized, with sufficient numbers, with supervisory control over the ration, and with power to enforce sanitary and hygienic regulations, the units of our Army would have returned to their homes at the close of the Spanish-American campaign in better physical condition than when they entered it.

"Disease is the silent foe that lingers in every camp and bivouac. It is this foe, as the records for the past 200 years prove, that has been responsible for four times as many deaths as the guns of the enemy, not to mention the vast number of invalided and pensions, the cost of which every 25 years is equal to the entire cost of the war from which they resulted.

"Every death from preventable disease is an insult to the intelligence of the age, and when it occurs in the Army, where the units are subject to discipline, it becomes a governmental crime. The State deprives the soldier of his liberty, prescribes his hours of rest, his exercise, equipment, dress, diet, and the locality in which he shall reside, and in the hour of danger expects him, if necessary, to lay down his life in defense of its honor. It should, therefore, give him the best sanitation and the best medical supervision that the science of the age can devise. For just as surely as the engineer who disregards the signal or the train dispatcher who gives wrong orders is responsible for the loss of human life which follows, so Congress is responsible for the thousands of soldiers' lives stupidly, criminally sacrificed, not on the glorious field of battle, but in camps from known preventable causes. It is for these men, never for those who fall gallantly fighting, that I offer my prayer.

"The rank of Surgeon General should be commensurate with the importance of the department of which he is the head. He should be a member of the War College and responsible only to the Secretary of War or to the President. There should be conferred upon him and his subordinates final authority in all matters of sanitation and hygiene, except in the emergency of battle, when, of course, all authority should devolve upon the officers of the line.

"The importance of the medical as compared with other staff departments has never been sufficiently recognized or appreciated in our country. Until it is clearly realized that the most important function of the medical officer is the prevention of disease rather than its cure the old custom will prevail. To be efficient the medical officer must not only be a good surgeon but a sanitarian, a bacteriologist, a chemist, and an administrator. Upon him devolves the duty of preventing disease, and his part in maintaining the effectiveness of the units makes him a most important factor in the Military Establishment.

"The following resolution was submitted by the writer at the meeting of the International Congress of Military Surgeons in St. Louis, 1904, and, after favorable report by the executive committee, was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the Association of Military Surgeons of the United States now assembled respectfully petitions Congress at its next session to reorganize the Medical Departments of the United States Army and Navy on a broad basis similar to that of the countries most advanced in military sanitation, giving to their officers equivalent rank, dignity, and power, and to their personnel ample numbers for the proper care of the ill and injured in military and naval service.

"The adoption of the bills introduced by Senator OWEN and Representative HICKS will go far toward rectifying a humiliating failure—one which, if the present war is sufficiently prolonged, may result in the defeat of our Army, for more wars have been decided by disease than by bullets.

"LOUIS L. SEAMAN, M. D."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2933) for the relief of the Philippine Scouts, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 469) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2176) for the relief of George B. Hughes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 470) thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4427) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 473) thereon.

ESTATE OF THOMAS H. HALL.

Mr. TRAMMELL. From the Committee on Claims I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2374) to relieve the estate of Thomas H. Hall, deceased, late postmaster at Panacea, Fla., and the bondsmen of said Thomas H. Hall of the payment of money alleged to have been misappropriated by a clerk in said office, and I submit a report (No. 474) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the estate of Thomas H. Hall, deceased, late postmaster at Panacea, Fla., and the bondsmen of the said Thomas H. Hall as such postmaster, be, and they are hereby, relieved of the payment of $544.73, together with the amount of the costs which may have accrued on account of the United States bringing an action to enforce the payment of said sum, the said sum being the amount of cash and funds held by the Post Office Department to be due from said Hall's estate to the United States for money misappropriated to his own use by a clerk in said office while the proffered resignation of said Hall was pending in the Post Office Department and while the said clerk was acting as postmaster with the consent and acquiescence of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida if this party while he was acting as postmaster was under bond or not?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator asks if the assistant was under bond?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the assistant who was acting postmaster.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not think he was. I can in about two minutes explain the situation, if the Senator desires an explanation.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator explain it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. Hall was postmaster at Panacea, Fla., a little summer resort. He had a hotel there and it was leased to a man named Knapp. Mr. Knapp was the assistant postmaster. In December, 1911, Mr. Hall, who was at that time absent from home, was advised that there was a shortage of $213 in the post office at Panacea. He immediately returned home and checked it up and found that it was correct and paid the $213. His health being bad, and being originally from Boston, he wanted to seek treatment in Boston, where his former home was. So he set about to resign as postmaster. He did resign as postmaster and was advised January 4, 1912, that his resignation had been accepted.

A man by the name of McLaurin was appointed postmaster. On January 20, 1912, Mr. McLaurin advised Mr. Hall that he had executed his bond and had signed all the appointment papers and had mailed them to the Postmaster General. Thereupon, Mr. Hall, who was really in bad physical health, left and went to Boston for treatment, presuming he had been relieved and his resignation had been accepted, as he had been advised through his then Congressman, Mr. Mays, from that district. Mr. McLaurin advised him that he had qualified. But it seems that Mr. Knapp, the assistant postmaster, who really had been guilty of this defalcation, had evidently withheld the papers and not forwarded them to Washington.

Some eight or ten months subsequent to that time Mr. Hall, then in Boston in a critical condition, was advised that when the accounts of the post office for the quarter ending June 30, 1912, were audited there was a shortage of about $1,200. He immediately wired that he had not been postmaster since January and was then too ill to come to Washington. So his wife came here and investigated the matter. Mr. Knapp was then, upon the suggestion of Mr. Hall, arrested and while he was out on bond he paid some $700 of the shortage and reduced it to five hundred and forty-odd dollars.

The matter has been before both the Senate and House committees and has been favorably recommended in each instance, the position being that Mr. Hall, in all good faith, thought he was relieved from responsibility, and the peculiar circumstances arose on account of the rascality and dishonesty of the man who really was in charge of the post office and withheld the mail.

Mr. WARREN. I understand from the Senator that the bill is not to pay out the money, but to cancel the account.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes; to relieve the estate from the suit. The attorney representing the department has not proceeded to press the suit with any vigor for the reason that he thought it was a meritorious matter for the consideration of Congress. The suit is pending, but no judgment has yet been procured in the suit against the estate of Mr. Hall. That in brief states the situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMISSION TO STANDARDIZE SCREW THREADS.

Mr. KENYON. I report back favorably from the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 10852) to provide for the appointment of a commission to standardize screw threads, and I submit a report (No. 471) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. If it leads to any particular discussion, I shall not ask to take up the time of the Senate to consider it. The bill, I will say, is considered to be of great importance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like to again have the title of the bill stated.

The Secretary read the bill by title.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will say that the bill has passed the House of Representatives unanimously and is unanimously reported from the committee of the Senate. While on the face of it it may appear to be a trivial bill, I will say to the Senator from Georgia that the testimony before the committee was to the effect that, because of the failure to have any standardization of this kind, the Government has already lost some $50,000,000. The bill involves no expense at all to the Government.

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like to have the bill read before we decide whether we shall now consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created, to be known as the commission for the standardization of screw threads, hereinafter referred to as the commission, which shall be composed of five commissioners, one of whom shall be the Director of the Bureau of Standards, who shall be chairman of the commission; one a commissioned officer of the Army, to be appointed by the Secretary of War; one a commissioned officer of the Navy, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy; and two to be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce, one of whom shall be chosen from nominations made by the American Society of Mechanical Engineers and one from nominations made by the Society of Automotive Engineers.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of said commission to ascertain and establish standards for screw threads, which shall be submitted to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce for their acceptance and approval. Such standards, when thus accepted and approved, shall be adopted and used in the several manufacturing plants under the control of the War and Navy Departments, and, so far as practicable, in all specifications for screw threads in proposals for manufactured articles, parts, or materials to be used under the direction of these departments.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Commerce shall promulgate such standards for use by the public and cause the same to be published as a public document.

SEC. 4. That the commission shall serve without compensation, but nothing herein shall be held to affect the pay of the commissioners appointed from the Army and Navy or of the Director of the Bureau of Standards.

SEC. 5. That the commission may adopt rules and regulations in regard to its procedure and the conduct of its business.

SEC. 6. That the commission shall cease and terminate at the end of one year from the date of its appointment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I presume that this is an important matter, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has said, but I wonder if this bill did not have its origin prior to the passage of the Overman law. If the Overman law does not permit the coordination of action with reference to such matters as this, I can not understand why it was passed at all. If we are going to continue to create commissions and to diversify these different activities, notwithstanding the fact that we enacted the Overman law, it seems to me that we shall be insisting upon doing that which the Overman law was enacted to prevent. I should like to have the views of the Senator from Iowa as to the necessity for the passage of this bill in view of the facts which I have stated.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, as I understand the matter, there is now no authority to do the particular work which is provided for by this bill. If there were a commission authorized to do it, it could be coordinated with other commissions or united with them under the Overman law. I do not understand that under the Overman law authority would be conferred to do work of this character. It is true that this bill originated before the Overman law was enacted. This bill passed the House, I think, along about the same time as the passage of the Overman law.

Mr. BORAH. I am not going to object to the bill, in view of the fact that it is reported from the Senator's committee, and he has given it more consideration, of course, than it has been possible for me to give it, and I accept his judgment.

Mr. KENYON. I have not given the bill any consideration in connection with the question which the Senator from Idaho has raised as to the effect of the passage of the Overman law.

Mr. BORAH. But there is some one somewhere in the Government who has been dealing with this matter, and under the Overman law the work could be centralized, and, in my judgment, it ought to be done instead of being diversified.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho whether or not this commission has any jurisdiction to do anything else except to standardize screw threads?

Mr. KENYON. It will only have authority to standardize bolts and nuts used in aeroplanes, in motor trucks, and in all such things for the Army and the Navy, and it is proposed to standardize the screw threads as to those.

Mr. HARDWICK. But it does not apply to business generally throughout the country?

Mr. KENYON. It does not.

Mr. HARDWICK. In the reading of the bill I heard something about publishing this information.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; but it would only be persuasive, because it would cover all Government contracts, and the manufacturers would have to standardize if they carried Government contracts.

Mr. HARDWICK. But can not the officials of the Army and the Navy and of the other governmental agencies do this work without any such law as this at all?

Mr. KENYON. But in that case the Army will have one standard and the Navy will have another standard, and so it will go.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have a standardizing bureau, which is known as the Bureau of Standards, which acts with the War Department and the Navy Department.

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that the Bureau of Standards is very much in favor of the passage of this bill. The director of that bureau was before the committee and gave his testimony, which the Senator will find in the hearings. The director stated that this was a very essential measure.

Mr. HARDWICK. But under the Overman law everything provided for in this bill could be done, could it not?

Mr. KENYON. I am not certain as to that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think it could be.

Mr. KENYON. I doubt it.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia allow me, as a member of the committee, to submit an observation?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. The necessity for standardization was so apparent to members of the committee and to those who testified before the committee that it is a perfect marvel that this has never been done before.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. HARDING. I quite agree with the contention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and with that of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], that, with the proper exercise of authority under the Overman law, this work could be accomplished without a commission; but the enactment of this bill will call the matter to the attention of the manufacturers of the country in a perfectly agreeable way, and will establish a commission, without any cost, which will proceed with this work upon scientific lines and with the cooperation of the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. HARDWICK. I was wondering if the Senator from Ohio thinks it is wise policy to be enacting legislation here in Congress merely to direct the attention of the manufacturers of the country to something there is already ample authority of law for doing. If we embark in that field, there may be a million things of an administrative character already provided for by existing law that we might think we could emphasize a little by passing a law through Congress with reference to them. That is the only objection I have to the bill.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, if I may disavow any desire to criticize the Overman law or the sponsor therefor, I want to say that the enactment of the Overman law does not persuade me that I am to surrender all my functions as a Member of Congress. While I agree that all this might have been accomplished without legislation, I am perfectly confident that the enactment of this bill will expedite the matter and accomplish great good. All there is to it is that it is designed to bring together these highly capable representatives of the Society of Engineers and the automotive organizations of the country to do a thing that ought to have been done long ago.

The Senator from Iowa and myself might join in a discourse on the technical phases of this question which would be beyond the understanding of ourselves and of Members of the Senate; but it is all related to the pitch and the toleration of the screw or the bolt and the opposite of that thread in the nut. It needs only the judgment of technical men to fix the standard and set the time in advance when every manufacturer of bolts and screws in the United States in reestablishing his machinery, which must be done after a few days, may conform to that standard.

Mr. HARDWICK. Was the Senator on the committee that investigated this matter?

Mr. HARDING. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish to say to the Senator that I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill, and I am not going to vote against it. My only observation was that it looked to me like an unnecessary piece of legislation, because it has already been covered by legislation, and I doubt the wisdom of establishing the policy of legislating about the details of administrative matters that are already provided for by law.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, before the Senator from Georgia goes out, I should like to call his attention to the fact that the Overman bill accomplished its purpose when it was enacted; that was the purpose for which it was introduced; but we are not to surrender our functions or cease to perform our duties because of it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; but I hardly think it is the function of legislation to take care of things of this sort, which ought to be left to administrative officers of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am wondering what effect this new order would have upon the screws and nuts already in existence?

Mr. HARDING. There are millions of screws and nuts manufactured every day, and there are millions of them cast aside every day; that is unavoidable, as the testimony shows. The answer to the Senator from Michigan is this, that the standards will be adopted and proclaimed several weeks in advance. The manufacturer of nuts and bolts has his dies, which are required to be renewed every few weeks, and he will get notice long enough prior to the necessary renewal to adjust the new dies to the standards fixed by the Government. It does not impose any hardship upon anybody, and the sole purpose is to effect, first, an economy; and, second, to speed up the production of Government necessities in time of war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no doubt of the necessity of this kind of legislation, but I do think that this is an insidious attack upon the Overman bill.

Mr. HARDING. Well, let it be so. Whether it is an attack on it or not, if it adds to the Government efficiency at this time of need, let us pass it at once.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that this is merely to advertise the fact that this ought to be done, and to let the manufacturers know that, if this bill passes, it will be done. The purpose of the bill is advertisement.

Mr. HARDING. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood the Senator to say so.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator please, let us be serious about this matter. The truth is that the contracting agents of the Army and the contracting agents of the Navy have never had the practical sense to get together and fix a standard which they could demand for Government use. The manufacturers themselves, recognizing the great waste and difficulty in meeting conflicting specifications, have asked that proper authority in this country fix standards for Government service in that particular line. It is not going to involve any expense, and it ought to be done instantly. I was never so shocked in my life as at the statement made by an eminent authority before the committee that the waste in bolts and nuts since we entered the war had exceeded $50,000,000. I think the Senate ought to pass the bill without objection and get it out of the way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to know whether the Overman law would apply to this commission if it shall be constituted? My opinion is that this would be later legislation and that the proposed commission would be absolutely free from any of the control of the Overman law. I think it is very objectionable legislation to create commissions. Congress has already created innumerable commissions, which, like Tennyson's brook, run on forever, even when their authority has ceased. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. From the Committee on Rules I report back with an amendment Senate resolution No. 235, to amend the rules of the Senate relating to the limitation of debate, and I submit a report (No. 472) thereon. As the resolution relates to a limitation of debate in the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the report may be read for the information of Senators, and I will ask that it go over until to-morrow. I desire to call it up at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

"Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following report:

"The Committee on Rules, to which was referred Senate resolution 235 'to amend the rules of the Senate relating to the limitation of debate,' having given consideration to said resolution, report the same back to the Senate with an amendment providing that all the language in the proposed resolution be stricken out and in lieu thereof the following be adopted:

"Resolved, That during the period of the present war the rules of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following:

"'That no Member shall occupy more than one hour in debate, unless by unanimous consent, on any bill or resolution and not over 20 minutes on each amendment proposed thereto.'

"The Committee on Rules recommend that the resolution as amended do pass.

"The history of the parliamentary bodies of the world disclose the fact that no question involving parliamentary procedure has been productive of more contention than the issue involved in proposals to place limitations on the time of debate. The questions involved have time and time again been thrashed out from every conceivable angle and are as ancient as the establishment of legislative government.

"The effort to close debate in order that the main question might be voted on has been proposed in many ways and approached from many angles.

"In the old form as first adopted in the House of Representatives the question was, 'Shall the main question be now put?' An affirmative vote had the effect of cutting off further debate and further amendment and bringing the House to a direct vote upon the pending question.

"This form of the question was originally proposed in the First Congress under the Constitution by Members who had served in the Continental Congress. Subsequently the motion was changed so that the Member seeking to cut off debate moved 'the previous question,' and this has been the form of a cloture motion in the House for a century past. The Senate has declined to adopt, until this Congress, for its ordinary business, this or any other method of cloture for debate. On August 28, 1850, Mr. Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, introduced a resolution providing for a 'previous question' in the Senate, but it was defeated. Since that time the Senate has considered the business before it without any general limitation on debate, except where it was accomplished by unanimous-consent agreements from time to time until a rule was adopted in this Congress on the 8th day of March, 1917, authorizing a cloture motion on petition of 16 Members, requiring a two-thirds vote to adopt the same.

"This rule, although it has proved effective in some noticeable instances, is not adapted to ordinary work of the Senate. It is not flexible, and when once adopted prevents all debate and all further consideration of the main subject and all amendments thereto, so that, except in the case of a deliberate filibuster attempted to delay the passage of legislation which has the support of a very large majority of the Members of the Senate, it can not be used to expedite the consideration and passage of pending legislation.

"It is, therefore, proposed that instead of amending the existing cloture rule, that the delay and lack of consideration given important legislation, which is caused by unlimited debate, be met and remedied for the period of the present war by fixing a reasonable limitation on the time that each Member shall be privileged to discuss pending legislation, and limiting that time to 1 hour to the main question and 20 minutes to amendments thereto, unless the Member desiring additional time obtains the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed.

"It is rarely the case that a bill or resolution pending before the Senate requires more than one hour for a Member to clearly and concisely present his views on the subject, and in the exceptional case there is no probability that the unanimous consent of the Senate can not be obtained for the Member to proceed where the debate is legitimate and not intended to delay procedure.

"It is true that many able speeches in the Senate have occupied more than one hour's time, but this does not negative the suggestion that the question could have been as ably debated within the hour's limitation.

"The real question involved in the consideration of a cloture rule is the question of numbers in a parliamentary body. Three men associated together in a triumvirate could discuss the issues between them without a chairman and without rules and accomplish results. A board of directors composed of a dozen men would need a chairman to give recognition to the member desiring to speak and would require some rules as to parliamentary procedure, but would not need a rule to close debate in order to attend to business within reasonable limitations. On the other hand, a parliamentary body composed of a thousand men would require the most stringent rules for the consideration of business coming before it and the absolute power of the majority to close debate at any time on any pending question in order that business might be transacted at all.

"When the Senate was first organized the Union was composed of 13 sovereign States, which were represented by 26 Senators. To-day there are 48 States in the Union, represented by 96 Senators. The rules of the Senate governing the limitation of debate are practically the same to-day as they were in the first Congress, and yet it must be apparent to all the 96 men, legislating for more than 100,000,000 people, with the many and varied questions that are presented to the National Government for consideration, that they can not possibly properly attend to business under the same rules and regulations as those adopted by the 26 original Senators, representing a sparsely settled country with national issues few and far between.

"There is a certain amount of important legislative business that must be transacted by the Senate in each year in order that the Government may exist and perform its functions. Undue delays or unlimited debate on one question of necessity cuts down the time for the consideration of all other questions. A careful study of the legislative history of the United States Senate will clearly demonstrate the fact that where there has been long and protracted debate on some one question pending before the Senate, that a large number of other questions of vital importance to the country have been ultimately speedily and hastily passed without the consideration that their importance merited.

"To-day we are confronted by the gravest crisis that has ever faced the civilized world. It is clear that the burden of carrying on the war for civilization and freedom must ultimately rest on our country and our people. Many, many questions of vital importance to the world's civilization and our country's safety must come before the Senate for consideration before peace is obtained. They are entitled to the most careful consideration and to reasonable speed in legislative attainment.

"The only way that this can be accomplished is by the establishment of a reasonable limitation on the time allowed for debate to each Member.

"The proposal now made by the Committee on Rules does not apply a gag rule, does not cut off debate on any question at any time, but merely provides that each Member shall be restricted in the time that he may occupy in the discussion of the questions before the Senate to a reasonable opportunity to express his views. The committee has limited the scope of the rule to the length of the present war. Within that time it can be tried out. If it proves satisfactory it can be extended by reenactment. If it should prove unsatisfactory at the close of the war it will cease to be a rule of the Senate by the time limitation contained in the resolution."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask that the resolution go to the calendar; and I desire to give notice that after the disposition of the routine morning business on Monday next I shall ask the Senate to consider it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Alabama if this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it was not unanimous. A large majority of the members of the committee who were present at the meetings voted in favor of the report. I believe there was one dissenting vote by a Senator who was actually present at the meetings, and there were some other members of the committee who probably would not have agreed to the report if they had been present; but on the part of the members present there was only one dissenting vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 4630) to repeal the act of Congress approved February 1, 1905, and to transfer national forests from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 4631) to amend section 107 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as heretofore amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HARDWICK:

A bill (S. 4632) to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. HARDING:

A bill (S. 4633) granting a pension to Edward McCabe; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 4634) granting a pension to Joseph Danielson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 4635) granting a pension to Theodore Reed; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan:

A bill (S. 4636) to authorize the coinage of 2-cent pieces, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. HENDERSON:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 156) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the years 1919 and 1920; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment providing that during the fiscal year 1919 and thereafter the courts, including the appellate courts of the United States, shall be open to seamen without furnishing bonds or prepayment of fees, without making deposits to secure fees, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that the sum appropriated by section 1661, Revised Statutes, for making and equipping the whole body of the militia the sum of $3,700 out of the sum apportioned to the State of Oklahoma for the year 1917–18 be made available for the purpose of paying the expenses incurred by that State over and above the allotments made by the Secretary of War to the State of Oklahoma, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining and ordered to be printed.

OPPRESSED RACES OF AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 251), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas there was held in the city of Rome, Italy, on the 8th, 9th, and 10th of April, 1918, a congress of the oppressed races of Austria-Hungary, at which resolutions were adopted protesting against the tyranny to which they had been subjected, and setting forth the nationalistic aspirations of the various peoples represented at said congress; and

Whereas said resolutions assert principles concerning government and the right of people to determine the form of government under which they shall live, and in substance declare that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed: Therefore

Resolved, That we express our approval of the principles and statements contained in said resolutions, and that we express our earnest sympathy in behalf of the nationalistic aspirations of the peoples represented in said congress.

THE BOHEMIAN PEOPLE.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 252), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas Bohemia for centuries has struggled for independence and the realization of her nationalistic ideals and aspirations, and the people of said country by their inherent greatness, moral worth, industrial progress, and intellectual capacity and achievements are entitled to self-government and all the rights and prerogatives that belong to a free people and to an independent, sovereign State; and

Whereas in this dark hour the people of said country are striving to realize their nationalistic aspirations and to establish a government of and by and for the people of said country and to emancipate themselves from the absolutism and oppression of the Austrian and German Empires: Therefore

Resolved, That the nationalistic aspirations of the Bohemian people for freedom and self-government have the earnest sympathy of the United States, and that this Nation will welcome the Bohemian people and the sovereign independent state which they may organize into the community and fellowship of free and liberty-loving peoples.

THE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 256), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency or any subcommittee thereof be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

DATA RELATIVE TO PROFITEERING AND THE REVENUE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 253), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

1. Any and all facts, figures, data, or information now in possession of the Treasury Department relative to profiteering which would in any way enable Congress to deal with the matter either through the present proposed revenue legislation or through enactment of more effective criminal statutes.

2. The figures showing the amount of money which the Government has raised up to this time since the beginning of the war by taxation and the amount which it has raised by loans.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for just a moment until I explain my object and purpose in introducing this resolution and my desire to have the information brought to the Senate, and, after having been brought to the Senate, that it may have the consideration of the Senate.

There is one portion of the President's great message upon taxation, delivered a day or two ago, to which it seems to me sufficient attention has not been given in public discussion, and that is the part which reads as follows:

> There is abundant fuel for the light in the records of the Treasury with regards to profits of every sort. The profiteering that can not be got at by the restraints of conscience and love of country can be got at by taxation. There is such profiteering now and the information with regard to it is available and indisputable.

That statement is evidently based upon facts within the knowledge of the administration and, I take it, in the possession of the Treasury Department. The President, in my judgment, suggests a very proper and efficient way in which to deal with the subject of profiteering, and that is by taxation. You can not reach it in all instances, in its subtle and devious ways of carrying on its work, by criminal statutes. While criminal statutes are desirable and should be passed wherever it is thought that they can meet the situation there is no doubt but that an effective aid to any criminal statute is that of taxation. In many instances where it could not be reached at all by any other method it can be reached effectively by taxation.

I am, therefore, in hearty accord with the expression of the President with reference to the method of reaching profiteering; but, Mr. President, I regarded that statement, when made by the President, as somewhat startling. If it had been said by some private citizen, it would likely have startled him upon the way to the penitentiary. But the President has made the statement and it was most proper—indeed, not only proper, but has developed upon us the duty—to discuss the subject and deal with it. I take it that he would not have incorporated it in his message had he not regarded it as of transcendent moment, and worthy of the speedy consideration of Congress.

To say that profiteering is here, and that the evidence of it is indisputable, and that it is subject to the call of Congress, is to notify the Congress that more important than dealing with the general subject of revenue—which we might deal with later, perhaps effectively—is dealing with this particular subject of profiteering. That should be dealt with at once. Summer or no summer, vacation or no vacation, that should have our immediate attention. Mr. President, of course in referring to a profiteer we do not refer to a man who is simply conducting his business in a skillful and efficient way and securing the reward of such skillfulness and efficiency by taking a reasonable profit for his efforts. The man to whom the President refers, and I presume to whom we refer when we speak of profiteers, is the man who takes advantage of his country's condition, of its perilous situation to gather extraordinary profits, who is taking advantage of his country's stress and trial to increase enormously and unjustly and unfairly his individual and private gain.

To my mind, and I presume I simply express the view of every patriot, the man who does that is upon a lower moral level than the foreign spy. The foreign spy is at least loyal to his flag, he is loyal to his country; he takes his life in his hands to serve that country; but the man who claims the protection of the flag, who professes his loyalty to the Government and his devotion to the flag, and at the same time takes advantage of the Nation's peril and the Government's dire necessities to increase his private gain, thereby demoralizing the efforts of the people, impeding the progress of the war, and finally working for its ultimate failure, is infinitely lower in morals, in my humble judgment, than the foreign spy who takes his life in his hands for his own government.

The Congress of the United States is now advised unmistakably in terms which can not be contradicted or about which there can be no doubt that this profiteering is active and the evidence indisputable. If that be true, there should be no talk of adjournment until this bill shall have passed. While we might provide the revenue a month or a month and a half or two or three months from now, the profiteer should not be permitted to escape beyond the time within which we can act intelligently and effectively.

Mr. President, a few days ago a noted woman in this country with whose methods as to government most of us disagree, but with whose humanitarian objects and purposes many of us agree, was convicted in an American court. Here is the statement upon which that conviction was founded, or at least one of the counts of the indictment:

No government which is for the profiteers can also be for the people.

Nothing is truer than that statement. No government which is for the profiteer can be for the people. If the Government of the United States possesses the facts as to the existence of these profiteers and fails to prosecute, fails to deal with them by taxation or otherwise, the Government is derelict and justly subject to the criticism of everybody who is for the people; and not only for the people but, in the broader sense, for the Government, for a government can not long exist which will not eliminate the profiteer—

And I am for the people, while the Government is for the profiteers.

Now, it is up to Congress to justify the conviction of Rose Pastor Stokes in that court. It is up to us to demonstrate beyond question that the Government of the United States is not with the profiteer, and we can not do so if we leave the evidence before us undealt with and legislation unenacted.

I do not assume at this time that the Government is friendly to the profiteers, but there will be no defense to the charge made by these people if the Congress shall adjourn without most drastic legislation concerning this matter. If the facts are here, and the President tells us and the American people they are here, and we fail to deal with the situation, Rose Pastor Stokes will no longer be a criminal, but a martyr. This Government can not be a slacker in dealing with those who pad the pay rolls and cheat the taxpayer, who scheme for the possession of the money which the Government must have to prosecute the war, who, while our boys are dying and liberty stands in hourly peril, extort through overreaching and fraud from their struggling Nation and at the same time justify the conviction of those people who denounce it.

Now, a government may close the lips of an individual; you may reduce them all to silence for a time; but every time you close the lips of an individual and fail to remedy the wrong you put a thousand more to thinking, and you can not prevent people from thinking. In time their thinking will ripen into action. If we would have the people contented and confident; if we would have our country relieved of a multitude of prosecutions, it devolves upon us here and now to remove the evil which is now conceded by the Government to exist and the facts concerning which are at our disposal.

Mr. President, I do not desire to go further into detail or take the time of the Senate longer at this time. But in conclusion let me say this Congress now assembled will mortgage the energy and the capacity of the American people for the next 250 years. When we think of the reluctance of a national debt once established to release its hold upon the sweat and toil of men, when we reflect upon its remorseless demands for annual tribute we can well believe that two and a half centuries will still find a portion of this obligation we are so speedily imposing a burden upon the people. One shudders to contemplate the deprivation, the self-denial, the suffering, and the sacrifice which its payment will involve. From decade to decade, from generation to generation families will bend under the burden, and the average citizen through long years will feel its haunting presence at the fireside and at his table.

With every necessary dollar expended no patriot will find fault—it is the price we pay for the liberty we love, for the freedom we would transmit to our children. But if we falter in cutting out waste and extravagance we will receive, and justly, the execrations of those who must meet this gigantic debt. If we delay one hour beyond the time necessary to shape the law to deal with the execrable wretch, the hated of earth, the alien from hell who would profit off his country's peril, we will deserve what we will receive—the anathemas and the curses of posterity. The profiteer! That scavenger of civilization, that tarautula burying its fangs in the veins and arteries of the wounded and the grief stricken, yet the President says he is in our midst, that the evidence is here and indisputable. In the name, therefore, of the success of this war, in the name of every patriot in the land making his sacrifice and contributing his efforts to the common cause, let us proceed to his destruction. We can either drive him from his prey—the American people—or we can turn his ill-gotten gains into the Treasury of the United States to meet the burdens of this war. The President is right. We can deal with him effectually and conclusively by taxation, and I trust that in the passage of this resolution we will not falter in doing our full duty in that respect.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to move to proceed to the consideration of House bill 9864.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator wait just a moment? It has been suggested that I ask for the consideration of the resolution which I submitted. I should like to have it agreed to, if there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho asks for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. There is a little bill on the calendar that I should like to dispose of that should be passed by the 1st of June.

Mr. BORAH. If there is any debate——

Mr. SWANSON. There will be no debate on this bill. It simply rearranges the terms of the courts in Virginia and must become operative by the 1st of June.

Mr. BORAH. There would not be any debate on the resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia was recognized.

Mr. BORAH subsequently said:

Mr. President, since addressing the Chair before, a Senator has asked that the resolution go over, in order that he may have an opportunity to read it and consider it. I ask leave now to introduce two other resolutions addressed to other departments on the same subject matter, and that they may go over also, to be dealt with at the same time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order.

Senate resolution 254, submitted by Mr. BORAH, is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

Any and all facts, figures, data, or information now in possession of the War Department relative to profiteering which would in any way enable Congress to deal with the matter either through the present proposed revenue legislation or through enactment of more effective criminal statutes.

Senate resolution 255, submitted by Mr. BORAH, is as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

Any and all facts, figures, data, or information now in possession of the Federal Trade Commission relative to profiteering which would in any way enable Congress to deal with the matter either through the present proposed revenue legislation or through enactment of more effective criminal statutes.

COURTS IN VIRGINIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 9864.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 9864) to amend section 111 of the Judicial Code in respect to the western district of Virginia; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out section 1 and in lieu thereof to insert:

That section 111 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 111. The State of Virginia is divided into two districts, to be known as the eastern and western districts of Virginia.

"The eastern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Accomac, Alexandria, Amelia, Brunswick, Caroline, Charles City, Chesterfield, Culpeper, Dinwiddie, Elizabeth City, Essex, Fairfax, Fauquier, Gloucester, Goochland, Greensville, Hanover, Henrico, Isle of Wight, James City, King and Queen, King George, King William, Lancaster, Loudoun, Louisa, Lunenburg, Mathews, Mecklenburg, Middlesex, Nansemond, New Kent, Norfolk, Northampton, Northumberland, Nottoway, Orange, Powhatan, Prince Edward, Prince George, Prince William, Princess Anne, Richmond, Southampton, Spotsylvania, Stafford, Surry, Sussex, Warwick, Westmoreland, and York.

"Terms of the district court shall be held at Richmond on the first Mondays in April and October; at Norfolk on the first Mondays in May and November; and at Alexandria on the first Mondays in January and July.

"The western district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Alleghany, Albemarle, Amherst, Appomattox, Augusta, Bath, Bedford, Bland, Botetourt, Buchanan, Buckingham, Campbell, Carroll, Charlotte, Clarke, Craig, Cumberland, Dickenson, Floyd, Fluvanna, Franklin, Frederick, Giles, Grayson, Greene, Halifax, Henry, Highland, Lee, Madison, Montgomery, Nelson, Page, Patrick, Pulaski, Pittsylvania, Rappahannock, Roanoke, Rockbridge, Rockingham, Russell, Scott, Shenandoah, Smyth, Tazewell, Warren, Washington, Wise, and Wythe.

"Terms of the district court shall be held at Lynchburg on the second Mondays in January and July; at Roanoke on the second Monday in February and the first Monday in August; at Danville on the second Monday in March and the third Monday in September; at Charlottesville on the second Mondays in April and November; at Harrisonburg on the fourth Mondays in April and November; at Big Stone Gap on the third Monday in May and the second Monday in October; and at Abingdon on the second Mondays in June and December.

"The clerk of the court for the western district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Lynchburg, Roanoke, Danville, Charlottesville, Harrisonburg, Big Stone Gap, and Abingdon, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court."

Mr. HARDING. I wish to ask the Senator if the bill proposes to create an additional judge?

Mr. SWANSON. It does not. There are only two judges in Virginia. This changes the terms of court. It provides for no new judges and no increase in salary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 111 of the Judicial Code."

COMMISSION TO STANDARDIZE SCREW THREADS.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10852) to provide for the appointment of a commission to standardize screw threads, to which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] objected. The objection to its consideration has been removed by a proposed amendment to section 6 of the bill. I should like to propose that amendment and ask for the passage of the bill at this time. The amendment is that section 6 shall be made to read:

That the commission shall cease and terminate at the end of 60 days from the date of its appointment.

Striking out, on line 2, page 3, the words "one year," and substituting therefor "60 days."

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to have the bill go over. I should like to look into it and see how it may affect the Overman law.

Mr. HARDING. Is it a very fine thing to have the bill go over? We have lost $50,000,000 already by the failure to standardize in this simple matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think screw threads ought to be standardized. The only question in my mind is as to the effect of the bill on the act we passed.

Mr. KENYON. What is the use of delay? All Senators who have studied the bill and know anything about it favor its passage.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall not object to its consideration, but I thought it ought to go over for the present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to determine who has the floor. The Senator from Iowa was speaking, and the Chair recognizes him as entitled to the floor.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will not withdraw his objection to the bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My chief objection, and the most serious one to the bill I can see, is that it creates a commission which might become a debating society for a considerable time. That objection is largely removed by the proposed amendment of the Senator from Ohio, by which the commission will cease to exist within 60 days. I therefore withdraw my objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. KENYON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The amendments of the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures were, in section 1, page 1, line 6, before the word "commissioners," to strike out "five" and insert "nine"; in line 8, before the word "commissioned," to strike out "one a" and insert "two," and after the word "commissioned," in the same line, to strike out the word "officer" and insert "officers"; in line 9, before the word "commissioned," strike out "one a" and insert "two"; in line 10, after the word "commissioned," to strike out "officer" and insert "officers"; line 11, to strike out "two" and insert the word "four"; on page 2, line 1, to strike out "one" and insert "two"; and in line 3, before the word "from," to strike out "one" and insert "two," so as to make the section read:

That a commission is hereby created, to be known as the commission for the standardization of screw threads, hereinafter referred to as the commission, which shall be composed of nine commissioners, one of whom shall be the Director of the Bureau of Standards, who shall be chairman of the commission; two commissioned officers of the Army, to be appointed by the Secretary of War; two commissioned officers of the Navy, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy; and four to be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce, two of whom shall be chosen from nominations made by the American Society of Mechanical Engineers and two from nominations made by the Society of Automotive Engineers.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HARDING. On page 3, line 2, I move to strike out the words "one year" and substitute therefor "60 days," so as to read:

SEC. 6. That the commission shall cease and terminate at the end of 60 days from the date of its appointment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. KENYON, Mr. HARDING, and Mr. SHIELDS conferees on the part of the Senate.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. SIMMONS. On account of the enforced absence by reason of illness in his family of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], one of the conferees on Senate bill 4482, I ask for the appointment of an additional conferee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina requests unanimous consent that the Chair appoint an additional conferee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and will appoint the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] as an additional conferee on the part of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the dates given, approved and signed the following acts:

On May 23, 1918:

S. 3935. An act to prohibit the sale, manufacture, and importation of intoxicating liquors in the Territory of Hawaii during the period of the war, except as hereinafter provided.

On May 25, 1918:

S. 4409. An act to amend section 15 of the act approved June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," as amended by the act approved May 12, 1917, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes."

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11185) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. There has been almost a universal request that the Senate shall adjourn over the week end. I was in hopes, of course, that we would take up the pension bill to-day, but in conformity with the request made I am perfectly willing to allow the consideration of the bill to go over until Monday.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will yield to me, I should like to ask him if he still objects to the consideration of Senate bill 2104 that we had up a few days ago, the purpose of which is to increase the salaries of the boiler inspectors. If there is not to be any opposition to that bill, it has been on the calendar for many months, and the department is very much desirous to have the legislation enacted.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I received in this morning's mail a number of communications upon the question of steamboat inspectors. I have not yet had time to read them, and I want the bill to go over at least until I can examine the letters which I have already received.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am not going to urge the consideration of the measure at this time, but it is very necessary that it shall be passed. I wish now to give notice that early next week I am going to ask the Senator from Utah to consider the question which it involves, and to be ready to act upon the bill.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 3, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 31, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in Heaven, for the splendid tributes poured out yesterday all over the land for our heroes in every war we as a people have been called upon to wage from the inception of a Government of the people; for all the prayers that ascended to Thee from devout hearts in behalf of our soldiers, sailors, and their allies, who are fighting to-day for the same principles which our soldiers of the past fought for.

Grant that the day, hallowed by precious memories, the tributes and the prayers which were poured out, may be an inspiration and solace to our heroes of to-day.

May their courage and valor drive back the barbarians and bring to the world an everlasting peace, in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, May 29, 1918, was read and approved.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES LIABLE TO MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. MADDEN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of moving the discharge of various committees from further consideration of some privileged resolutions which were introduced several days ago, a week ago last Wednesday, and of asking that they be taken up for consideration at this time and passed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We will have to have one at a time.

The SPEAKER. Send one of them up.

Mr. MADDEN. I shall send them all up, and they can come in their order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 356.

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested to report to the House the number of men in the service of the commission liable to military service for whom requests have been made and obtained for exemption from military duty, the names and addresses of such persons, and the character of work they are performing in the service of the commission.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order on the resolution. With the purpose the gentleman has in mind I am in entire sympathy, at least in so far as I understand the purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. The only purpose is to get the names and addresses of these people.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That necessarily requires an expression of opinion; that is, as to those liable to military service.

Mr. MADDEN. I mean within the draft age.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know about that. The resolution does not say so.

Mr. MADDEN. I am asking only for those who are exempted upon request from military duty and those within the draft age. Of course, they are liable to military duty if they are within the draft age.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But unfortunately the resolution does not say so.

Mr. MADDEN. Then let us amend it so that it will say so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. For the time being I make a point of order on the resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the point of order is well taken; I think the resolution simply asks for facts. It does not ask for an opinion. It asks for information which ought to be in possession of the department to which the resolution is addressed.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman say about this language:

That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested to report to the House the number of men in the service of the commission liable to military service.

Mr. MADDEN. I mean within the draft age.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the resolution does not say so.

Mr. MADDEN. I will make it say so, if I may be permitted to amend the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, the gentleman can introduce a new resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not see why there should be any necessity for that. If it accomplishes the purpose by amending the language to which the gentleman objects at this time, why delay?

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, there is no more important function to be performed by the Congress of the United States than to ascertain whether or not we have a number of slackers in the different departments who are being made slackers and hidden away from the front-line trenches at the instance of the department heads, while the sons of the widows of America are compelled to go to the front and fight. The purpose I have in mind is that by the passage of these resolutions we shall be able to ascertain who these men are, what duties they are performing, where they are from, and whether the duties they are performing are of sufficient value to the department to justify exemption. I have no desire to cripple any department. If there is any man in a department who is being exempted from military service and who is within the draft age whose duties in the department are such as to make it essential that he should be exempted from military service, I would be the last man to object to it, but let us take, for example, the case of the Secretary of Agriculture, who asked and obtained exemption for 2,000 men of draft age in his department.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In a moment. There ought to be something done about that. If that condition exists in the Agricultural Department, it is fair to assume that it exists in other departments. Whether it does or not, we will soon be able to know if we get the information that they have in their possession, and this is a mere resolution of inquiry as to the facts.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does the gentleman know that there are that many within the draft age in the Agricultural Department who have been exempted?

Mr. MADDEN. It is admitted.

Mr. RAYBURN. By whom?

Mr. MADDEN. By the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BORLAND. I have not seen any such statement.

Mr. MADDEN. That statement was made on the floor of the House by the members of the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. BORLAND. The Secretary of Agriculture has not admitted any such statement.

Mr. MADDEN. My understanding is that he did admit it to the members of the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope that is not the case.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman said that he had admitted it—not that it was his opinion that he did.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the statement of the members of the Agricultural Committee on the floor of the House.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope the gentleman is wrong about that admission being made.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope he is, too.

Mr. BORLAND. I am free to say that if 2,000 men have been exempted in the Department of Agriculture from military service who are within the draft age——

Mr. MADDEN. That is true.

Mr. BORLAND. There is no justification for 100 men within the draft age being exempted as special employees of the department.

Mr. MADDEN. The charge was made on the floor during the consideration of the agricultural extension appropriation bill that that is the case, and the statement was made by members of the Committee on Agriculture to the effect that the Secretary of Agriculture himself said that in each case of exemption he gave it his personal consideration, and no one from the Agricultural Department—the Secretary of Agriculture or anybody else—has denied the statement.

Mr. BORLAND. I can not see the slightest harm in the gentleman's resolution, and I think it ought to be passed if such a statement as that was made.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If the gentleman will permit, how is it possible under the law for any man——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I reserved the point of order——

Mr. MADDEN. I would like for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] to be able to make a statement if he desires.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois how it is possible under the law for anyone to be exempted unless he is exempted lawfully? He must have been exempted by some particular board which had authority to do such a thing under the law. Does the gentleman object to that?

Mr. MADDEN. I object to the head of a department requesting exemption for men in his department and then having anybody given the power to grant the request to the extent of 2,000 in one department, when there are only 20,000 people—men, women, and boys—in that department.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No one can do it except the exemption board.

Mr. MADDEN. That does not make any difference.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman charge that the local exemption board——

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is quibbling.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am not; I am trying to find what must be the facts under the law.

Mr. MADDEN. I maintain that the head of a department exceeds his authority when he asks for an exemption, and nobody ought to be permitted to grant exemption to 2,000 people in a single department when the total number in that department—men, women, and boys—are only 20,000.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. But under the law——

Mr. MADDEN. Do not let us quibble about it; let us get the information and then we can take it up, and it seems to me we ought to have the information.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the difficulty about that, if the gentleman will permit, is the question of whether we will get the information that we desire under the resolution as it is drawn.

Mr. MADDEN. If there is any thought it will not accomplish the purpose, change it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand the purpose of the gentleman from Illinois, and I stated in the beginning when I reserved the point of order that I was in sympathy with him, but I do not want to do an injustice to anybody.

Mr. MADDEN. Neither do I.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And the question is whether under the resolution we would get the information that we really desire.

Mr. MADDEN. I am perfectly willing if there is any danger of not getting the information to withdraw the resolution and to have it prepared so that we will get the information.

The SPEAKER. That is the best way to settle it. The Chair is as much in favor of the gentleman's resolution as the gentleman is.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, before we do that I would like for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] to state what he knows about these exemptions in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Tennessee will permit, I desire to say this: I made a statement on the floor of the House, when the emergency appropriation bill was being considered, in reference to 2,000 exemptions in the Agriculture Department, and I put it in this way: The Secretary of Agriculture has recommended to the local boards as many as 2,000 men in the Department of Agriculture who are absolutely necessary and essential to do the work in the department. Then these local boards, of course, passed upon his recommendations. In some cases the local boards refused to grant the exemption; in other cases they were granted. I do not know where in the department these men are located. I am not opposing the suggestions made by the gentleman from Illinois. Let us find out where they are. I have an idea that a great many of them are in the Meat Inspection Department and the meat inspection must be continued under the law passed by Congress, and if the men in the Meat Inspection Department are not exempted the prospects are the meat inspection will have to stop. I do not know whether these men are in there or not, but I am sure some of them are.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] makes a point of order, as I understand it, that the resolution calls for an opinion rather than for a statement of facts?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow the Chair, while the Chair is in favor of the resolution, that has got nothing to do with it. The resolution is faulty and is knocked out by numerous decisions because it calls for an opinion. You can not change the rules——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the Chair will pardon me——

The SPEAKER. In a moment—you can not change the rules to conform to any particular case because the Speaker and all the Members of the House together want to do it. You have got to have some kind of a standard on which to go.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As I understand the Chair, he holds that portion of the resolution which provides that the commission report the number of men in the service of the commission "liable to military service" as expressing an opinion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to call the Chair's attention to the language of the resolution which is—

That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested—to report to the House the number of men in the service of the commission liable to military service.

That is the usual form—

Now, if reporting of the number of men liable to military service in the commission would be expressing an opinion, then, of course, the Chair is right under the rule, but it seems to me the commission would be required under this resolution to say to a man in its service, "Are you in the military service; are you subject to military service?" which would be a method of ascertaining a fact to be reported. Or the commission, without expressing an opinion, would look up his record and ascertain the facts, and if the man was subject to military service, so report. That is all there is to this resolution.

The SPEAKER. If this resolution provided that the civil service should report to the House the number of men between the ages of 21 and 31 years, that would be a mathematical fact that could be ascertained to a certainty, but it is going far afield to say that the Secretary of Agriculture or any other Secretary can, with the numerous decisions and modifications about this draft business, tell how many men are subject to military duty. It would be almost impossible.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the resolution and will reintroduce it to-morrow in the modified form.

The SPEAKER. That settles the matter. Now, the Clerk will report the second of these resolutions.

Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw them all.

ADDITIONAL URGENT DEFICIENCIES.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12280, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12280) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, these are the only amendments that the Senate put on the bill. Two of them are to pay the widows of deceased Senators and one is an amendment providing $4,000 for the contingent expenses of the Senate—the stationery expense.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is the provision or limitation in the bill as to cost-plus contracts the same as it left the House?

Mr. SHERLEY. Whatever was in the bill when it passed the House is still in it, and the only things new that are in it are the amendments to which I referred.

Mr. ANTHONY. I refer to section 7.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is still there exactly as it passed the House. Section 7, spoken of here, was a section in the housing bill, and the only change that was made in it at all, and the only reason it was carried in here, was to permit contracts of $1,000 or under to be let without competitive bidding. But it is the same as it passed the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN SENATE BILLS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the Chair to what appears to be erroneous references of several Senate bills, as appearing on page 7811 of Wednesday's daily RECORD. The bill S. 4428, an act to amend section 272 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It relates, it is true, to military offenses, but a proper reference of that, I submit, should have been to the Judiciary Committee. The bill S. 4451——

The SPEAKER. Wait a minute. Let us get through with the other one first.

The Parliamentary Clerk informs me that the reason he referred that bill to the Committee on Military Affairs was because the bill came from the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, that is no sound reason.

The SPEAKER. That may be.

Mr. WALSH. It is an act relating to offenses committed by officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy, but it is made a part of the Penal Code of the United States, and the rules provide that the codifications of the Judicial Code are in this body in the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I think I can relieve that situation. I have consistently taken the position that these bills should go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so referred. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. Are there any others?

Mr. WALSH. The bill S. 4277, an act providing for the protection of the uniform of friendly nations, and for other purposes, is another one, and the chairman of the committee agreed to have a House bill of similar tenor considered by the House Judiciary Committee. I think the gentleman will recall that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Heretofore there has been provision for the protection of the uniform carried along, as a matter of fact, in Army legislation introduced by the Committee on Military Affairs. What is the difference between that and the uniform of foreign armies?

Mr. DENT. We carried it in the national defense act, which really remodeled all the military laws of the country. But any change of the military laws of the country, I think, ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am talking about the uniform of the United States Army, and the forbidding of its being worn by anybody not a member of the United States Army.

Mr. DENT. It refers to the uniforms of our cobelligerents in this country, and carries a penalty with it.

Mr. WALSH. The House bill was referred to the House Judiciary Committee, and has been acted on and reported, and is upon the calendar. This is a bill of similar tenor, and I think it should be referred to the same committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks to rerefer the bill in question to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. The next bill is the bill S. 4451, an act to provide for allowances for and minimum pay of Army field clerks, to provide for increased pay to Army field clerks for service beyond the continental limits of the United States, and to provide quarters or commutation thereof to Army field clerks in certain cases. As it appears in the RECORD, it was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. That measure should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. That evidently was a clerical error, and it ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that it be rereferred.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be rereferred.

There was no objection.

RED CROSS CONTRIBUTION.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, in these days when all sections of our country are responding so generously to every call made by the Government for war activities it might appear ungracious and invidious to call attention to the recent record made by my home county, Walker County, Ala., in the recent Red Cross drive. But I have just received a letter from the chairman of the Red Cross organization in that county, the contents of which I ask permission of the House to read. I read:

Walker County, with a quota of $6,340, subscribed to the Red Cross war fund $67,254. [Applause.] The figures are not complete as to Dora and Carbon Hill. In addition to being a subscription of 1,000 per cent, it represents more than 4½ per cent of the total bank deposits. Subscriptions are still coming in.

I challenge any Congressman to show a better record by his constituents for patriotism and willingness to give until it hurts. I am sure my colleagues will join with me in appreciation of this splendid contribution by the people of Walker County for this great purpose. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DOWELL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. DOWELL. I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter received from the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Des Moines, Iowa, relative to the Postal Service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Des Moines about the Postal Service. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Does it refer to the zone system?

Mr. DOWELL. No, sir.

Mr. KITCHIN. To the service?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object. We get hundreds of letters about that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

CONFEREE ON OMNIBUS PENSION BILLS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, Gen. SHERWOOD, who is one of the conferees on nine omnibus pension bills, is now afflicted and advises me that he will probably not be on his feet for ten days or two weeks. He has requested me to have some one substituted in his place as a conferee, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] be substituted for him as a conferee on these nine pension bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that Mr. ASHBROOK be substituted as a conferee on the nine pension bills referred to in place of Gen. SHERWOOD, on account of the injury or accident to Gen. SHERWOOD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DOWELL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DOWELL. I desire to state that I omitted to submit this letter to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on subjects pertinent to the RECORD, referring particularly to the measure recently passed by the Senate in regard to the vocational training of injured soldiers and sailors.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is that the same measure pending before the House?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; it is; that and other measures pending. That is one of the chief.

Mr. DOWELL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. DOWELL. I was trying to object. I do object to the request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts, has been ill for some weeks in a hospital in Washington. He had a leave of absence extended to him some weeks ago, but that has expired. I now ask unanimous consent that he be given a continued and indefinite leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that his colleague, Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts, be granted an indefinite leave of absence on account of illness. Without objection, it will be granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to all gentlemen that the easiest way to get these leaves is to fill up a blank here and send it to the desk, and thus save time.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12281, the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12281, the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12281, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the paragraph, beginning on line 21 of page 31, covering "Incidental expenses, Quartermaster Corps."

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, the other day I read an announcement that an organization of negroes in the South had subscribed for $100,000 of liberty bonds, and that announcement reminded me of the splendid course of the negro race in America from the very beginning of the war in Europe even before America entered the war.

I thank God that at last America is united in purpose. We are resolved to win the war at all costs, but there were suggestions here and there of disloyalty, among a very few people it is true, in the early days of America's participation. But so far as I have heard, so far as I know, so far as I have read, in not one negro home in America is there even a suggestion of disloyalty. [Applause.] It is pleasant, indeed, to pay this tribute to this race of people, because they deserve it. They are doing their utmost to support their country in this great world crisis. They are subscribing to liberty bonds. They are giving to the Red Cross, and their young men are cheerfully responding to the draft call. This attitude of the negro race is not surprising to the people of the South, who probably know the negro character better than any people in the world.

The southern people saw him tried in the memorable days of the War between the States. They saw him tested as few people have ever been tested in the history of the world. His very soul was wrung in a struggle between love of freedom and love of friends, and the love for those who had been kind to him won the victory. The helpless women and children of the South during those four memorable years were left largely to the mercy of the negro race. Be it said to their everlasting credit that in not one instance did they prove treacherous. [Applause.]

Some day I hope to see a monument of pure white marble erected in this city so high that its summit pierces the clouds, so enduring it will outlive the ages. That monument should be built, and some day will be built, by the southern people as a tribute to the fidelity of the negro race in protecting and caring for the helpless of our population during the war between the States.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in this great world crisis the negro is being tested again, and he will not fail. He is ready to risk all. He will go wherever he is sent cheerfully and without question. In the early days of the war I read that German agents had been sent among the negroes of the South to stir up sedition. In common with other southern men, I felt no concern for the result of the work of these agents. I knew perfectly well that if these German agents ever went among the negroes they would be taken care of in a very proper and effective manner without any assistance whatever from the Department of Justice or any Government officials.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I had the honor to be in the gentleman's State during the week of the Red Cross drive, and in almost every community the colored people held meetings and made great contributions. In one meeting alone $650 was raised from that population.

Mr. POU. I am glad my friend from Washington has made that statement. The negroes not only in North Carolina, but all over the South, are supporting the Red Cross to the extent of their means. They have given and will give more. They are not a wealthy race, of course. They have accumulated slowly, but they are giving willingly of what they have.

Mr. Chairman, the negro race as a rule live in humble homes. As I stand here now I can see all over the South the vine-clad cabins of this kindly race. They have their faults, but disloyalty is not among those faults. In their homes you will find a burning love of country, a burning love for the flag. From these little homes throughout the South responding to their country's call the young negro men are now answering, "Here; we are ready." [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss several matters pertinent to the RECORD.

Some weeks past our Committee on Education and Labor, of which I am a member, acting with the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, held joint hearings in framing proper legislation inaugurating vocational training for the reeducation and rehabilitation of our injured soldiers and sailors who shortly from abroad will be returning to us maimed and helpless. In performing this task we have reviewed the experience of Belgium, France, Italy, England, and Canada, and have had the benefit of the study and wise counsel of many leading philanthropists and experts both in the United States and Canada. After exhaustive hearings and careful executive deliberation our House and Senate committees agreed upon a measure, which on May 20 was introduced in the Senate by its committee chairman as S. 4557, and on May 21 was introduced in the House by our chairman as H. R. 12212, Report No. 597.

This legislation is designed, just as far as modern surgery, medicine, science, ingenuity, and money will permit, to make the injured whole again in the sense of so reeducating and rehabilitating him that he shall be absolutely independent of alms and pensions by being qualified and able to successfully compete for numerous positions in the professional and industrial world. It is especially designed to dispel despair by filling the breast with hope and ambition immediately after disablement. Beginning in the hospital, even while skillful surgeons are remaking the body and restoring it to health and before being fitted with the latest inventions in artificial arms, legs, eyes, or fingers, a scientific inventory is taken of the maximum possibilities and adaptation to labor, and hopeful assurance is timely given the injured that he has a future worth while before him and that he will be made able once again to fill the honorable position of a useful and independent citizen.

In Canada to-day injured soldiers and sailors are being taught successfully 196 different trades and professions from which it is possible for them all to earn a living and maintain themselves.

We can not do too much for our brave boys when injury causes their return, and we must promptly allay their apprehensions by the definite assurance that while they are undergoing this rehabilitation and until proper self-sustaining placement is effected their dependents will be cared for by the Government.

These brave Americans are already returning. May I commend to my colleagues the expedition with which the Senate considered and passed this measure? It was called up on Thursday, May 23, and passed Saturday, May 25, by a vote of 61 to 0.

I indicated there were other matters I desired to mention. The President has clearly demonstrated that we can not adjourn July 1, even though the elections are upon us. Our duty is here, regardless of our political futures. The President has well said that we who do our duty need have no fear of elections. We should be willing to trust the people to do what is just and right. They well remember the good advice given by the Speaker of this House, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 17, 1916, namely:

A man has to learn to be a Representative, and a Member's usefulness to his country should increase with service; that useful and influential Congressmen are made largely by experience and practice; that it is an unwise performance for any district to change Representatives at short intervals. A new Congressman must begin at the foot of the class and spell up. Of course, the more brains, tact, energy, courage, and industry he has the quicker he will get up. If he possesses these qualities, and if his constituents will keep him in the House, he is as certain to rise as the sparks are to fly upward. No man should be elected to the House simply to gratify his ambition. All Members should be elected for the good of the country. The best rule, it seems to me, is for a district to select a man young enough to learn and to grow, with at least fair capacity, industrious, honest, energetic, sober, and courageous and keep him here so long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well.

When to win this war it has been necessary to take from the people so many constitutional rights and centralize this power in the worthy Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, Congress owes a solemn duty to the people to return to them each and every one of these rights just as soon as this war is over; hence if there ever were a time to apply President Lincoln's advice that "It is unwise to swap horses in the middle of the stream," it should be during the present war Congress.

May I not repeat what I have once said before—that this is no time for unjust criticisms, while duty keeps us far away from our constituents. Impulsive statements in this RECORD are unduly magnified and distorted. Where criticisms are deserved, let them come, but they should be deserved.

To keep the RECORD straight, I feel that it is my duty to correct a few unfounded criticisms. A charge has been made that I have a son on the Government pay roll drawing a salary of $2,000 as my secretary. That it was unwarranted is shown by the following:

WASHINGTON, D. C.

I, Mrs. R. L. Arceneaux, upon oath state: Since April, 1917, excepting a short interim, I have been on the clerical force in Congressman BLANTON'S office, and for some time I have been his chief clerk on a salary of $1,260 per annum. The charge that he has a son on the Government pay roll at a salary of $2,000 as his secretary is wholly untrue, and does him a great injustice. He certified his son's name merely to control the allowance for clerk hire, thus enabling him to employ an adequate office force.

In April, 1917, I left a salary of less than $50 per month as stenographer in a law office in Abilene, Tex., where I live and was raised, to accept an assistant clerkship with Mr. BLANTON at a salary of $60, with a raise of $5 each month. I replaced another lady, Miss Crump, of Washington, on the ground that being a constituent of his home county I had the first claim to the position. Until July, 1917, the allowance for clerk hire was only $1,500 per annum, or $125 per month, and until July, 1917, Congressman BLANTON paid Mr. Roy Davis $80 per month and paid me $60 plus a raise of $5 each month after April, 1917, totaling more than the amount allowed him for clerk hire, and all of his son's salary was paid out of his own pocket. Having 58 counties and several hundred miles of Mexican border in his district, I believe that Congressman BLANTON has twice as much correspondence and departmental business as any other Member here, and no one clerk living could handle all of his business. His oldest son, who is now only 17 years old, attends to all personal mail and the confidential correspondence files. The $500 increase per year for clerk hire in July, 1917, was the act of the Sixty-fourth Congress passed before Mr. BLANTON became a Member.

After Mr. Davis left, Mr. BLANTON has from time to time employed seven different people to do extra work, including another young lady from his district and Mr. Halbert Kiefer, from Anson, Tex. As soon as I became familiar with the departments and the general work of his office I was appointed chief clerk at a salary of $1,260 per year, with hours from 9 to 5, with one hour off for lunch, and besides his son, Mr. BLANTON now has a Miss Hamelin regularly employed in his office by the month, who does night work after 6 p. m. With few exceptions he is forced to work in his office every night and keeps two typewriters going practically all of the time, and has paid as high as 75 cents per hour for extra stenographic work. Being his chief clerk I am the one most interested in the proper disposition of his allowance for clerk hire, and as I am perfectly satisfied no one else should complain.

Mrs. R. L. ARCENEAUX.

Sworn to and subscribed before me on this the 15th day of May, A. D. 1918.

[SEAL.]

D. B. MULL,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

It has been charged that I do not sympathize with the problems which daily face our Government employees, and that because this House has seen fit to honor my 15-year-old son with the position of a page that it was inconsistent for me to defend the Postmaster General against unwarranted assaults labor organizations in my district were making against him and for me to fight the blanket raise in salary of $120 each to the 240,000 Government employees. I was heartily in favor of granting an adequate raise to all postal employees and to second, third, and fourth class postmasters, some of whom have not been able to pay running expenses; but this amendment proposed no increase whatever to them, but merely proposed a raise of $120 each to the 240,000 employees other than those in the Postal Service. I was in favor of granting a substantial increase to the worthy and meritorious men and women in our various departments, but to reward the slackers with the same increase given to the deserving seemed to be both unjust and outrageous. I insert here the remarks I made during this debate, to show that there was nothing inconsistent in my position:

[From CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Mar. 14, 1918, p. 3506 (debate on amendment proposing an increase in salary of $120 each to 240,000 Government employees).]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in order to show the spirit, temper, and teeth of the organizations who are demanding this increase, I want to read to you colleagues two excerpts from a petition which has been sent from one city in my district:

* * * * * * *

"Whereas a member of the Cabinet of the President of these United States has stated in his annual report that the organization of employees in his particular branch of the Federal Government is a menace to the public service; that such employees, though justly compensated (as he claims), are making many selfish demands, are endeavoring to unjustly influence Congress, and will inevitably go out on a strike, and that they will make impossible a provision for the economic conduct of the service: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the El Paso Central Labor Union of El Paso, Tex., and vicinity, That we, the representatives of over 3,000 workingmen of El Paso and vicinity, denounce and brand the statements of the said member of the Cabinet of our President as untrue, misleading, and farfetched in the main, and that we sincerely regret that he is a citizen of these United States and of the fair State of Texas and is a member of the Cabinet of the President of these United States, and do hope and trust that his resignation will be requested, if he shall not have the honor and manhood to present the same."

* * * * * * *

Simply because the able Postmaster General of the United States, Hon. Albert S. Burleson, under a sense of duty felt compelled to make certain recommendations to insure the best and most efficient service to the Government, organized labor is trying to cudgel him out of office. I was reared to young manhood on a farm and worked my own way through the university of my native State, and knowing by actual experience the many hardships which beset the man who toils for his daily bread, my heart has always beat in close sympathy with the labor problems of the land; but when organized labor becomes bigger than the Government and in a war crisis is selfishly making demand after demand at the expense of millions and millions of the unorganized toilers of our country, I must raise my voice against it, even though it may cause strong political antagonism against me in the future.

This is the spirit and temper of the organizations that are demanding this increase at this time. That is why, for one good reason, I am going to vote against this amendment. I want to say to my colleagues that I do not believe that there is a class of workmen anywhere in existence who are better cared for than the clerks in the employ of the United States Government, save and except postal employees and certain postmasters. Why, they get 30 days' vacation in summer on full pay; they get every single holiday that is enjoyed by the banks or individuals; they get each and every one of the 52 Sundays—something that the Members of Congress do not get. [Laughter.] They are entitled to as many as 30 days' sick leave on doctor's certificate on full pay. They enjoy the privilege of 12 half holidays in the summer and others on all special occasions in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield the balance of my time to the gentleman. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I will state to you gentlemen that these clerks are housed in the most comfortable quarters imaginable; they are surrounded by every kind of luxury found in department buildings; you will find many of them wearing the best tailor-made clothes in Washington; and many of them drive their own automobiles every day on the streets of this city. [Laughter.] You will find many of them in the most popular theaters in the city.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And they do all this on $480 a year?

Mr. BLANTON. That $480 a year is a myth. The new employees that have been coming here day after day from my district have been entered on the department pay roll at $75 a month, with increases, when some of them do not know how to run a typewriter and are absolutely inexperienced, and could not draw $40 a month in their home towns. [Applause.]

I know of assistant bank cashiers in my district, filling important and honorable positions of trust in national banks requiring high business qualifications, who do not now get over $100 per month. I know of a young lady who was drawing a salary of $60 in a bank in New Orleans, who accepted a position as interpreter of French in the Ordnance Department, beginning at a salary of $1,100, and one day this week she remarked to a friend that all she did that day was to translate three short letters, and that often she had nothing to do at all. I was told by the principal of Wood's Commercial College that girls are constantly being taken out of his school who hardly know the keyboard of a typewriter and started in at $1,000 and $1,100 salaries by the Government. I know of an employee in The Adjutant General's Office drawing $1,400 a year who is the secretary of a labor organization, and who spends part of his time during office hours in soliciting clerks to join the union, arguing to them convincingly how much influence over Congress such unions can exert in their behalf.

There is hardly a department in Washington where, if the employees all worked faithfully and diligently eight hours a day, it would not be possible to dispense with at least one-third of the employees. I have been told by conscientious clerks from my district working here that if Members of Congress could only see how much time is wasted each day, how much time is used by cigarette smokers in rolling, lighting, and smoking from 10 to 20 cigarettes each day, how much time is wasted by social conversation each day between many young men and young women, see just exactly how many time-wasting, clock watchers there are in the various departments of Government service in Washington among the 240,000 employees whose salaries this amendment seeks to raise, and which $28,000,000 increase the now already overburdened taxpayers will have to pay, that instead of granting this increase to each and every one of them alike, we would take steps to weed out these incompetents, decrease the salaries of the slackers, and raise the salaries only of the diligent employees who are giving good service and deserve it.

I have a 15-year-old son who is an employee of this House, receiving $2.50 per day, and no man in Washington better earns his pay, for from the day this session met in December he has not missed an hour, but sits at that desk there from the time Congress meets every day until it adjourns, including the Sunday sessions we have had, yet I do not think that he is entitled to the increase which this amendment would give him, and I am going to vote against it.

I am in favor of granting a substantial increase in salary to certain second, third, and fourth class postmasters, post-office clerks, railway mail clerks, and rural carriers, who are now making less than any family can live on, and I think that we should not further delay the passage of the bill providing for their relief, but this amendment offers them no relief whatever.

But during this war crisis, when we are taking young men between the ages of 21 and 31 from their families, their wives and children, and their private businesses and forcing them to fight in the trenches, knee-deep in mud for $30 per month, it does occur to me that these 240,000 employees we let stay safely at home, who are to be benefited by this bill, and most of whom get salaries ranging from $1,100 to $2,000, ought to be willing to make some sacrifice, dispense with some of their accustomed luxuries and extravagances, and neither demand these increases nor protest against working eight hours a day, especially while safely living in the Capital, and many filling positions vacated by soldier boys now in the trenches in France. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has exhausted his time. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Was this a trick purposely played on me by the gentleman from Tennessee? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time is kept by the timekeeper at the desk.

I deem it a great honor to him, to myself, and to my district for this honorable body to permit my young son to serve it as a humble page. In more than a dozen other employments in Washington he could make a larger salary. I presume that my critic would have me ask the fathers in my district to send some other young boy here, 2,000 miles from home, to serve us at $2.50 per day only while Congress is in session, when expenses to and from home and while here would largely exceed the total income received.

It has been further charged that in December I went to my district to make a political campaign. The people of my district know full well the urgent circumstances which required my presence in Texas last December, and the expense, inconvenience, and hardships I went to in performing my duty there. I had inspected my district after adjournment in October, but during the month of November there were 3,865 soldiers admitted to the hospital at Camp Travis, with 25 deaths, and 5,404 soldiers admitted to the hospital at Camp Bowie, with 42 deaths; and during December there were 4,378 soldiers admitted to the hospital at Camp Travis, with 56 deaths, and 4,155 soldiers admitted to the hospital at Camp Bowie, with 181 deaths. In these two hospitals were many west Texas boys from my district, some dying daily, and I felt that I owed it to their loyal fathers, who had sent me here, to inspect these camps and take all action possible to have furnished to these boys every safeguard and protection available. Moreover, following a very disloyal and unpatriotic speech made at Comanche, Tex., many socialistic petitions, numerously signed, came here demanding the repeal of the draft law, and my people appealed to me to help them remove this undercurrent of seditious sentiment. Up to this date I have not missed one hour from my official duties, from sickness or otherwise, except on this trip to Texas in December, during which I missed only 40 hours of the House proceedings, for during the entire time I was in Texas the House met only seven times and was in session altogether only 40 hours, for Congress adjourned on December 18 for the holiday recess, not to meet again until January 3. I spent the entire holidays 2,000 miles from my wife and children, traveling at my own expense, and spent Christmas Eve inspecting Camp Travis and Kelly Field, near San Antonio. Merely to keep the record straight, even at the risk of being tedious, I will insert sufficient brief excerpts from press reports of my speeches to show the absence of politics in my work:

Comanche Vanguard: "Congressman BLANTON made a telling speech on the Government's war policies. He had the audience to pledge undivided loyalty to the Government in winning the war."

Moran correspondent, Abilene Reporter: "He made one of the greatest speeches ever delivered in our town, his subject being the present war. Though very hoarse, having spoken at quite a number of places, he made his hearers understand so thoroughly the fact that they, too, were in this war, to lend their money, themselves, and, if need be, their lives, that we might win; that every man could do something—if he couldn't give $1, $10, or $100 to the Red Cross, and could not buy a liberty bond or a war stamp, that one thing was sure, that we could be patriotic and stand by the greatest man in the whole world to-day, Woodrow Wilson."

Stamford Leader: "He brought a ringing message, and every one of the 500 people present was interested, who gave loud and prolonged applause."

Hamlin Herald: "He spoke to a crowded house, saying he had pledged the loyalty of his people to the President and was here to tell them a few things they should know. He made it clear that he did not want his people to countenance disloyalty in any form, act, or word."

Ballinger Ledger: "He touched the hearts of 500 people, saying this was no political gathering, that this was no time for politics, but that politics had been brushed aside in Washington, and Democrats and Republicans alike were supporting the President. Leaving Abilene at 5 a. m. he addressed the high school for 30 minutes immediately after arriving here, and after his two hours' speech in the opera house he hurriedly left for Paint Rock, where he speaks at 1.30, then at Eden at 4, and at Junction to-night, making five speeches to-day."

Concho Herald: "He spoke to an appreciative audience on the subject of war, and had the sympathy and moral support of all present. We were glad to have heard him and feel that he is doing good."

Llano News: "He told them the issues of the war, and what is required at the hands of the people to win. He impressed every one with the absolute necessity of every man, woman, and child doing his part. It is regretted that every citizen of the county was not present."

Burnet Bulletin: "He delivered a vigorous address upon the war policies of our Government, which met with great applause."

Brady Standard: "He spoke on our Government's war policies, and his speech was nonpolitical."

San Saba News: "He said this Nation now has no place for politics or politicians; all are now Americans first, patriots who are defending the flag."

Coleman Democrat-Voice: "Speaking December 28 on the Government's war policies, he was cheered to the echo by the hundreds of people who braved a blizzard to hear his message. Politics did not enter."

Brownwood Bulletin: "BLANTON outlined United States war purposes and was greeted by large and appreciative audience at courthouse last night. An appeal was made for their loyal support to every phase of the Government's war plans."

Blanket Signal: "If a slacker had been in his audience (in Brownwood), he would have been converted; but no slackers attended, for everyone rose to his feet when the speaker tested their loyalty to the Government. Everyone went away seeing things in a different light, and had everybody in Brown County heard him the world war which is now very much in progress would indeed be taken more seriously, and the Red Cross and Y. M. C. A. would not need solicitors in their campaigns to raise funds for our soldier boys, and the importance of food conservation could have been more easily understood."

Georgetown Commercial: "Congressman BLANTON left Washington for the holiday recess at his own expense, denying himself the pleasure of being at home with his family on Christmas, and made speeches in his district setting forth our Government's position on the war. There is much ignorance on this and other public questions. The country has been too busy on immaterial things anyway, and it is nearly time there was an awakening. It is high time there was more patriotism, and patriotism without works is dead."

Austin American, December 26: "Congressman BLANTON has just inspected Camp Travis and Kelly Field and reports conditions improving. He regretted being away from his family during the holidays, but deemed it his duty to advise his people of war conditions. He stated that the one supreme thing needed to win the war was absolute loyalty of all the people."

The above excerpts show conclusively that I did not make the trip to Texas last December to conduct a political campaign.

In conclusion, let me state that we should all get much satisfaction out of the fact that the President is satisfied with our efforts. On October 6 President Wilson stated:

The Sixty-fifth Congress, now adjourning, deserves the gratitude and appreciation of a people whose will and purpose, I believe, it has faithfully expressed. One can not examine the record of its action without being impressed with its completeness, its courage, and its full comprehension of a great task.

In his address last Monday the President made our path of duty so clear and plain that no one of us will hesitate in carrying out his wishes. May I quote a portion of it:

[Excerpts from the address of the President, delivered May 27, 1918.]

Gentleman of the Congress, it is with unaffected reluctance that I come to ask you to prolong your session long enough to provide more adequate resources for the Treasury for the conduct of the war. I have reason to appreciate as fully as you do how arduous the session has been. Your labors have been severe and protracted. You have passed a long series of measures which required the debate of many doubtful questions of judgment and many exceedingly difficult questions of principle as well as of practice. The summer is upon us, in which labor and counsel are twice arduous and are constantly apt to be impaired by lassitude and fatigue. The elections are at hand and we ought as soon as possible to go and render an intimate account of our trusteeship to the people who delegated us to act for them in the weighty and anxious matters that crowd upon us in these days of critical choice and action. But we dare not go to the elections until we have done our duty to the full.

* * * * * * *

We can not in fairness wait until the end of the fiscal year is at hand to apprise our people of the taxes they must pay on their earnings of the present calendar year, whose accountings and expenditures will then be closed. We can not get increased taxes unless the country knows what they are to be and practices the necessary economy to make them available.

* * * * * * *

Only fair, equitably distributed taxation, of the widest incidence and drawing chiefly from the sources which would be likely to demoralize credit by their very abundance, can prevent inflation and keep our industrial system free of speculation and waste. We shall naturally turn, therefore, I suppose, to war profits and incomes and luxuries for the additional taxes. [Applause.]

* * * * * * *

The consideration that dominates every other now, and makes every other seem trivial and negligible, is the winning of the war. [Applause.] We are not only in the midst of the war, we are at the very peak and crisis of it. Hundreds of thousands of our men, carrying our hearts with them and our fortunes, are in the field, and ships are crowding faster and faster to the ports of France and England with regiment after regiment, thousand after thousand, to join them until the enemy shall be beaten and brought to a reckoning with mankind. [Applause.] There can be no pause or intermission. The great enterprise must, on the contrary, be pushed with greater and greater energy. The volume of our might must steadily and rapidly be augmented until there can be no question of resisting it. If that is to be accomplished, gentlemen, money must sustain it to the utmost. Our financial program must no more be left in doubt or suffered to lag than our ordnance program or our ship program or our munitions program or our program for making millions of men ready.

* * * * * * *

There is only one way to meet that duty. We must meet it without selfishness or fear of consequences. Politics is adjourned.

* * * * * * *

I, for one, am always confident that the people of this country will give a just verdict upon the service of the men who act for them when the facts are such that no man can disguise or conceal them.

* * * * * * *

The profiteers that can not be got at by the restraints of conscience and love of country can be got at by taxation. [Applause.]

* * * * * * *

May I add this word, gentlemen? Just as I was leaving the White House I was told that the expected drive on the western front had apparently begun. You can realize how that solemnized my feeling as I came to you, and how it seemed to strengthen the purpose which I have tried to express in these lines.

I have admired the work of this session. The way in which the two Houses of the Congress have cooperated with the Executive has been generous and admirable, and it is not in any spirit of suggesting duty neglected, but only to remind you of the common cause and the common obligation that I have ventured to come to you to-day. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of the Army and its supplies: For transportation of the Army and its supplies, including transportation of the troops when moving either by land or water, and of their baggage, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, including the cost of packing and crating; for transportation of recruits and recruiting parties; of applicants for enlistment between recruiting stations and recruiting depots; for travel allowance to officers and enlisted men on discharge; for payment of travel allowance as provided in section 126 of the act approved June 3, 1916, to enlisted men of the National Guard on their discharge from the service of the United States, and to members of the National Guard who have been mustered into the service of the United States and discharged on account of physical disability; for payment of travel pay to officers of the National Guard on their discharge from the service of the United States, as prescribed in the act approved March 2, 1901; for travel allowance to persons on their discharge from the United States disciplinary barracks or from any place in which they have been held under a sentence of dishonorable discharge and confinement for more than six months, or from the Government Hospital for the Insane after transfer thereto from such barracks or place, to their homes (or elsewhere as they may elect, provided the cost in each case shall not be greater than to the place of last enlistment; of the necessary agents and other employees, including per diem allowances in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 for those authorized to receive the per diem allowance; of clothing and equipage and other quartermaster stores from Army depots or places of purchase or delivery to the several posts and Army depots and from those depots to the troops in the field; of horse equipment; of ordnance and ordnance stores, and small arms from the foundries and armories to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; for payment of wharfage, tolls, and ferriages; for transportation of funds of the Army; for the hire of employees; for the payment of Army transportation lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds (to be adjusted in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases decided under such land-grant acts), but in no case shall more than 50 per cent of full amount of service be paid: Provided, That such compensation shall be computed upon the basis of the tariff or lower special rates for like transportation performed for the public at large and shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: Provided further, That in expending the money appropriated by this act a railroad company which has not received aid in bonds of the United States, and which obtained a grant of public land to aid in the construction of its railroad on conditions that such railroad should be a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and other Government services, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charge for such Government transportation, having claims against the United States for transportation of troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property over such aided railroads, shall be paid out of the moneys appropriated by the foregoing provision only on the basis of such rate for the transportation of such troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property as the Secretary of War shall deem just and reasonable under the foregoing provision, such rate not to exceed 50 per cent of the compensation of such Government transportation as shall at that time be charged to and paid by private parties to any such company for like and similar transportation; and the amount so fixed to be paid shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: And provided further, That nothing in the preceding provisos shall be construed to prevent the accounting officers of the Government from making full payment to land-grant railroads for transportation of property or persons where the courts of the United States have held that such property or persons do not come within the scope of the deductions provided for in the land-grant acts; for the purchase and hire of draft and pack animals in such numbers as are actually required for the service, including reasonable provision for replacing unserviceable animals; for the purchase, hire, operation, maintenance, and repair of such harness, wagons, carts, drays, other vehicles, and motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles as are required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for gasoline and lubricants for flying machines; for drayage and cartage at the several depots; for the hire of teamsters and other employees; for the purchase and repair of ships, boats, and other vessels required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for expenses of sailing public transports and other vessels on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, $1,532,606,103: Provided further, That $75,000 of the appropriation hereby made shall be available for additional pay of employees on harbor boats, quartermaster service, in lieu of subsistence: And provided further, That hereafter, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may direct, the authorized horses of mounted officers ordered for duty over the seas or to Alaska may be transported at public expense to remount depots or elsewhere in the United States for safekeeping during the absence of such officers: And provided further, That in the discretion of the Secretary of War, and under such regulations as he may prescribe, travel pay at the rate now prescribed by law for discharged soldiers may be given to all enlisted men for whom the law authorizes travel allowances as an incident to their entry upon and relief from active duty with the Army.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making this statement. The amount of this appropriation is $1,532,000,000, in round numbers. I have a letter indicating that perhaps this amount will possibly not be sufficient. I have endeavored to run down the additional amount that the department may possibly want, but I have not sufficiently accurate information to enable me to offer an amendment to cover the additional amount. In view of the fact that this information has just come to the committee, I hope that this item will be adopted, and if there is any mistake about it there can be a correction.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman if provision is made in the bill for a reduced rate for supplies sold to soldiers and their families?

Mr. DENT. I know of no such provision as that in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I believe that provision holds in the Navy Department—that officers and men may buy Navy Department supplies at a rate cheaper than the prevailing rate in the market.

Mr. DENT. I think there is some regulation on the subject, but there is nothing in the law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can an officer of the Army, living in Washington and having his family here, buy supplies for his family at a rate cheaper than a clerk in one of the departments can buy outside?

Mr. DENT. I can not answer the gentleman about that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. During the last two or three days the papers of Washington have given much publicity to the hoarding of food by a certain officer of the Navy, which raises a question that has been discussed during the last two or three weeks by the Federal Trade Commission as to what may be termed the commercial rake-off. People have wondered why an officer of the Navy would want to fill his house from cellar to roof with supplies apparently in excess of the immediate needs of his family. It may have been all right. The goods may have been purchased and paid for, but the incident brings to a head a great deal of talk that has been going on with regard to the manner in which supplies for both the Army and the Navy are distributed. I am not going to find fault with a soldier of the United States having the privilege, while he is in Washington or elsewhere, of obtaining some advantage through the purchase of supplies for his family which the outside public does not enjoy, although the system may be susceptible of a good deal of abuse, and doubtless is. But I do believe that if officers of the Army and Navy are stocking up their cellars and garrets with contributions that come to them from commercial sources because they have influence as to the amount and nature of purchases, then we ought to enact some legislation or attach a proviso to this bill that would stop the practice once for all. The Federal Trade Commission indicates that it has come to be a practice for purchasers of commercial houses to accept tribute from those who have commodities to sell, and thus raise the price to the public. I do not charge that such a practice prevails in the Army or Navy, but if it has started it ought to be stamped out immediately. Why should an officer of the Government buy and lay away for his own use substantially $2,000 worth of supplies in advance of the coming winter, when all other purchasers of supplies must await their turn at the corner grocery in the usual way under the Food Administration handicaps?

Mr. KAHN. As far as the Army is concerned, I doubt whether that could be possible, because the officers of the Army are frequently moved from post to post. How the Navy officer referred to by my friend from Pennsylvania could have wanted to stack up or store up a lot of provisions for the future without knowing beforehand whether he was going to continue at this station passes my comprehension.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is stated in the newspapers—I do not state the fact as authentic, because I have no direct knowledge—that in this one house have been discovered 2,200 pounds of granulated sugar and 637 pounds of lump sugar; 442 pounds of substitute lard, and a long list of articles, so numerous as to be sufficient if put into a grocery store to establish a good business, if sold at modern prices. Why does a man do that? Is it the ordinary precaution against a hard winter, or is it due to the fact that somebody in the service has the power to buy millions of dollars worth of goods, or because he has the power to buy large quantities for the Government and can favor particular goods? If such a practice prevails in the Army or Navy, I say again there ought to be some provision in a bill of this kind to stamp it out. The man who has the power to purchase Government supplies, and who takes money, or takes goods on the side, is guilty of bribery and should be rooted out of the service in disgrace.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In the case referred to by the gentleman, is not the officer under indictment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. I hesitate to name the man, because he may be innocent. I am using the case referred to as an illustration.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman intimates that there is a certain amount of bribery in these matters, but that is a case for the courts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The President of the United States from that rostrum two or three days ago said there was great extravagance, and indicated that there are lobbies in Washington. Some of those lobbies may be interested in the sale of goods to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested that perhaps it might be wise to put some penalty in this bill. I think upon reflection, carrying out the suggestion of the gentleman from Nebraska, that, so far as the civil law is concerned, of course the offense is taken care of by indictment in the civil courts. So far as concerns the status of the officer of the Army or the Navy, he is punishable under the articles of war for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This item alone carries an appropriation of a billion and a half dollars for supplies that are not to be advertised for in the usual way.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is mistaken. This item is for transportation; it has nothing to do with the purchase of supplies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, take the item for the purchase of supplies for the Army. They are not advertised under the law, are they?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not know the latest regulation, but customarily they are or were up to a recent time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Necessarily there must be cases of influence. It would be a distinct advantage to the seller to make terms with the purchasing agent.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is true under all circumstances anywhere.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But never anywhere in the history of the world as provided for in these lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman suggest that because of these large figures there must be a corresponding increase——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; but if in these Army and Navy appropriation bills you permit officers and men to be preferred customers and also to prefer the sellers, you hold out a temptation to certain people to use influence.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What is the remedy?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The remedy would be to punish both the man who tenders and the man who accepts a gratuity.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The law provides against that now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No matter whether it was a pound of lump sugar or a thousand dollars in cold cash, the law should provide punishment for any man who accepts gratuities from contractors, especially if he is an officer of the Government.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It does now, both the civil and military law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does not in the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; but by existing law or existing regulations.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This seems to be an appropriate place to ask this question, as this item deals with the transportation of the Army. It is reported in a morning paper that a gentleman standing high in official circles made with regard to the number of men abroad a definite statement in figures, and I will read a sentence or two from the article and ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether he agrees that the figures cited are correct. This article appears in this morning's Washington Post, and the headlines are:

MILLIONS IN UNITED STATES ARMY ABROAD, SAYS LEWIS—PREDICTS FORCE WILL EQUAL ENGLAND BY DECEMBER.

CHICAGO, May 30.

Senator JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS says in a speech here to-day that the United States now has 1,000,000 soldiers in foreign lands, and that by December 1 it will be numerically equal to that of England.

I desire to ask the chairman of the Military Committee to state whether or not, in his judgment, those figures give a correct idea to the American people of the number of American soldiers now abroad and the number expected to be there at the close of the year.

Mr. DENT. The chairman of the Military Committee of the House will have to strictly decline to answer that question; that is one subject the Military Committee of the House has tried to keep secret.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I can appreciate that the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee might well regard it as improper to state in public the number of soldiers that he knows officially to be now abroad, but in view of the fact that a distinguished Senator of the United States, himself high in the councils of the majority party, and a man who is at least believed to be one of the principal spokesmen of the administration, is reported to have made a statement in public which would tend to convey a false idea to the American people of the number of our soldiers abroad, I think it proper to ask on the floor of the House some gentleman to state whether or not those figures are exaggerated, without necessarily revealing any information as to the exact facts.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think that they are exaggerated?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then why is the gentleman asking that question of another gentleman?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Because I do not pretend to be an authority on the matter.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not the gentleman trying to have a little byplay at the expense of the Senator?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not at all. I have great respect for the Senator. I like the Senator very much, but I do criticize a statement by any man in public life which would tend to give to the American people an exaggerated view of any situation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know whether it is exaggerated or not?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am seeking information. Does the gentleman who addresses me know?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but I have not undertaken to advertise it and make the offense, if it be an offense, worse by advertising; therefore, I am asking the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman believe the statement to be exaggerated?

Mr. SHERLEY. Whether I believe it or not, I would not undertake, if I thought a mistake had been made, to make the mistake worse by the kind of comment in which the gentleman is indulging.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have simply asked for information, and if the gentleman can give it to me, I would be very glad to have it.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not need information, because he said he has an opinion already.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have an opinion.

Mr. SHERLEY. Far be it from me to suggest that the gentleman ever had an opinion without information.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I thank the gentleman for that. I am greatly obliged to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I shall not pursue the subject further under the circumstances.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I just desire to make this additional statement before we pass this item. I stated a few moments ago that we had some information that perhaps this item was not large enough now and might have to be increased, but we have not sufficient information to fix the increased figure. That perhaps may be increased in the other body. The reason I make this statement is because we have general information that the Government of the United States has been supplied with a very much larger number of ships for transport purposes than was anticipated only a short while ago.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is one of the largest items in this bill. It is made so by reason of the fact that it is taking care of the transportation of the initial supply for our greatly increased Army that we are sending to France. Each man who goes to France must have at least 6 tons of material sent to him during the year, and for each 5 men who go to France there must be sent 1 animal, and each animal must have forage and supplies weighing practically 6 tons per year, so that for each man that we have in the trenches there must be a daily supply of approximately 26 pounds. Immediately behind this man there must be a reserve stock within reaching distance of approximately 30 days' supply. Behind him is a railroad 300 miles long, over which the cars travel at the rate of about 20 miles per day, so that there must be a 15-day supply on the railroad to keep the reserve stock at the line in full quantity. Then at the port of entry there must be a reserve stock of about 3 months' supplies, and across the sea there must be in course of transportation the daily supply, and it takes 60 days to make a round trip, so that there must be a 30-day supply for each man of the Army on the sea at all times. On this side there must be a reserve depot or embarkation depot in which there is kept approximately 90 days' supply, and then there is behind that a reserve depot with 30 days' supply, and then we must figure the average distance between the factory and the place of concentration, and divide that number of miles by 20 to find the number of days' supply that must be on the railroad from the factory to the reserve depot. Besides that we must take into consideration the fact that all of our material must come first from the farm and from the mine, and over the quarter of a million miles of railroads now under operation in the United States there must be a continuous daily supply of raw material in transit. If you take the figures 26 pounds and multiply them by the number of men we have in France, and then multiply that by the number of days that you will find in 9 months, you will get the quantity of material that we must first put on the transportation facilities of this country before our men can fight a single day. It is true that a part of this supply has been furnished in France to begin with, which placed us in the position of a man who was drinking out of a rain barrel while waiting until the reservoir of a new waterworks had been constructed. That reservoir has been constructed. The pipe lines have been laid across the sea, and our people in France now are using the supplies that were manufactured here. The sum of $1,500,000,000 is only a small part of what it is going to cost us, and I am satisfied it will reach nearer $2,000,000,000 than to the present mark before the fiscal year has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clothing and camp garrison equipage: For cloth, woolens, materials, and for the purchase and manufacture of clothing for the Army, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, for issue and for sale at cost price according to the Army Regulations; for payment for clothing not drawn due to enlisted men on discharge; for altering and fitting clothing and washing and cleaning when necessary; for equipment and repair of equipment of laundries, dry-cleaning plants, salvage and sorting storehouses, hat-repairing shops, shoe-repair shops, clothing-repair shops, and garbage-reduction works; educational propaganda in connection with reclamation; for equipage, including authorized issues of toilet articles, barbers' and tailors' materials, for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances and applicants for enlistment while held under observation; issue of toilet kits to recruits upon their first enlistment, and issue of housewives to the Army; for expenses of packing and handling, and similar necessaries; for a suit of citizen's outer clothing, to cost not exceeding $10, to be issued upon release from confinement to each prisoner who has been confined under a court-martial sentence involving dishonorable discharge; to each enlisted man convicted by civil court for an offense resulting in confinement in a penitentiary or other civil prison; and to each enlisted man ordered interned by reason of the fact that he is an alien enemy, or, for the same reason, discharged without internment; for indemnity to officers and men of the Army for clothing and bedding, and so forth, destroyed since April 22, 1898, by order of medical officers of the Army for sanitary reasons, $1,230,190,089.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to speak for 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, the last words from Lieut. Col. Brett, of the Quartermaster's Department, are as follows:

The item of $1,230,000,000 for clothing and equipage is divided between the two as follows: Clothing, $999,000,000; equipage, $230,000,000.

Questions naturally arise in our minds with respect to the clothing of the Army. Are all men now in the service fully equipped? The latest from the Quartermaster Department is that they are fully equipped. Are they fully equipped as they go into the service? They are fully equipped as they have gone into the service, and there is a reserve supply for every soldier in uniform to-day of from two to three months. It may interest the House to know that provisions have been made at all of the cantonments to provide clothing for 233,000 men going into the cantonments between now and the 1st of July and a full outfit is now awaiting the men at the camps.

Some of these items may interest the House, such as shoes. The total purchases to May, 1918, of field shoes were 13,863,000 pairs; marching shoes, 11,310,000 pairs. Of the original orders for 21,000,000 pairs of shoes, 18,000,000 pairs of shoes have been delivered.

Mr. KAHN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. OLNEY. I will yield.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman believe that it will be as necessary to buy so many pairs of shoes in the future, in view of the reclamation service which the Quartermaster Corps has established?

Mr. OLNEY. No, indeed; and that is why the committee reduced the estimate from $1,253,000,000 to $1,230,000,000 for clothing. That is very true. Now, at the beginning of the war there was a notable lack of clothing in some camps; but do we ever stop to realize as a country that for three years before our entry into the war we were supplying the allies with all they needed to prosecute the war? We have kept the nations of Europe above water in giving to them what they asked of us. We have kept factories of Great Britain and France going night and day manufacturing our own supplies.

Now, concerning the question brought up in the House here about aeroplanes which might be cleared up, it is a fact, brought out by a question which I submitted to the war council, that we have over there nearly 1,300 aeroplanes equipped with all our material—lumber, steel, every bolt and nut that make up the aeroplane, except as to the engine.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman know that a number of those that were built on the other side were built by American mechanics who were sent to the other side for the purpose of building aeroplanes over there?

Mr. OLNEY. I thank the gentleman for bringing that fact to my attention. It is a fact our mechanics were sent over to France to assemble machines. We Americans forget that prior to our entrance into this great war we had furnished 50,000 men in various capacities on the fighting line as ambulance drivers, in the aviation section of our different allies—Italy, France, and Great Britain—and in the service of the line.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLNEY. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Before the gentleman leaves the point of clothing and equipment, will the gentleman indicate as to the supply of wool and whether there is any difficulty about getting an abundant supply of wool, knowing the gentleman to be an expert on that very important line of military preparation?

Mr. OLNEY. I thank the gentleman from Connecticut for bringing the wool question to my attention. It is a fact that since the beginning of the great war sheep and lambs the world over have been slaughtered to supply food to the conflicting armies. There is only one country in the world which has noted an increase in its wool supply, and that country is Australia. Our own sheep supply has dwindled from 55,000,000 sheep of five years ago until we have to-day about 47,000,000 sheep. The wool supply from 47,000,000 sheep amounts to 300,000,000 pounds of wool in the grease, which, being scoured, on the shrinkage basis yields 130,000,000 pounds of wool; but the women of the United States, the boys and girls, and even adults, are fast knitting away our enormous supply, and I want to tell you about the splendid work which the Red Cross has been doing for a year and more in knitting supplies for our allies and the American troops.

I figure out there are 10,000,000 of Americans knitting to-day useful articles like sweaters, helmets, wristlets, and stockings, and so assiduously have they been knitting for many months that the Quartermaster's Department has been obliged to request the Red Cross to have the women of the country knit those articles only which are most useful. Suppose that 10,000,000 of persons are knitting throughout the year and use a pound and a half of wool in yarn a month. You can easily reckon out they would consume easily 130,000,000 to 140,000,000 pounds of wool a year, therefore we are consuming in this manner our normal supply, and we need to import twice as much wool as we raise here. In the Senate Military Affairs Committee considerable attention was paid to the fact we did not have all-wool uniforms. As a matter of fact, in the early part of the war 35 per cent of cotton did creep into our uniforms, but to-day all uniforms are made of all-wool. The overcoats and the blankets are made of 65 per cent wool and 35 per cent reworked wool, or sometimes called shoddy; but shoddy, Mr. Chairman, is not as bad as it sounds. It is simply reworked wool of your clothing and my clothing, perhaps discarded, and put through a garnet machine and made into wool, which is just as useful as the best wool grown in this country for clothing purposes. We import for clothing purposes the wool which we need, the long staple or combing wool, the very best adapted for our Army uniform cloth, and we get those wools from South America, Australia, and some of the colonies of Great Britain, and we have on hand to-day in our encampments enough clothing to provide for 233,000 men going into various cantonments within the next 30 days, and I think that is a splendid record. [Applause.]

I want just to refer incidentally back to my old home town of Dedham and say to you that while the average quota under the draft provided for but 70 men, Dedham has sent out to the war in various capacities 400 men. [Applause.] The noble and self-sacrificing mother of one of the boys from Dedham, the boy being only 19 years of age, a volunteer, fighting in the line, a corporal, read a letter from him to me a few weeks ago, in which, after relating interesting incidents of his career in France, he concluded with this statement. "Mother, I am proud to tell you I was wounded to-day." [Applause.] Through our Commander in Chief we have called to Washington many well-known men in business and industry from all walks of life, and they are giving their services to this country gratuitously. Among others the names of Schwab, Baruch, Stettinius, Eidlitz, Hughes, Taft, and Davison, of the Red Cross are doing yeomen work, and all glory to these gentlemen who have sacrificed their business and have come to the assistance of the Government with their wide experience, brains, and intelligence in this time of emergency.

And we need all this civilian strength, this civilian brain, and we also should secure the best military geniuses we can find in our country to win this war. The boys are crying for a certain great military genius, and I hope some day in the near future we will have Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood in Europe to help our Army there win the war. [Applause.] In one great accomplishment alone, as the originator and the incorporator of the Plattsburg camp, he has made his name immortal in history, and the alumni, 50,000 strong, who have gone out from summer military training camps and have been commissioned are crying for Wood to go over, so that the firm will be Pershing, Wood & Co. A splendid testimonial was paid to Gen. Wood in Kansas only a week or ten days ago, when the legislature passed a resolution, signed by the governor, commending Wood for what he had done for the division at Camp Funston in instilling into his men military training, discipline, and the love and respect of the men for Wood the soldier and Wood the man.

We will have to pay our toll in France. Great Britain has paid a tremendous toll, as is evidenced by 500 cemeteries located from the French coast away almost to the front line, where 450,000 of the best blood of England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Australia, and Canada are buried, and where the wooden crosses shining in the sunlight and gleaming in the moonlight show the tremendous toll that Great Britain has paid in this war. We may expect to have our casualties come forth within the next week or ten days by the scores and the hundreds and even the thousands. But already we must pay a splendid tribute to the women, to the aged women of France, women who sent out their sons to the war, and who are already marking the graves of the few hundred American soldiers that have died "over there." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Storage and shipping facilities: For inland and port storage, including all necessary buildings, docks, tracks, handling, and other facilities for Government supplies, including rentals and purchase of land, the hire of employees, and for all other necessary expenses, $143,603,037.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], in charge of the bill, to suggest the purposes for which this sum is being carried.

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman that it would take some time to name all the purposes, but the general purpose, of course, is the erection of buildings to supply depots at embarkation points and points in France where soldiers are to disembark and where the cargoes are to be disembarked.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is aware that permanent and temporary construction of this character have always been carried in appropriations in the sundry civil bill and have not been carried in the military bill, where appropriations have only been in the way of repairs and improvements of buildings.

Mr. DENT. Yes. This is a new item in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I am under the impression, although I have not looked it up lately, that the appropriation for $1,500,000, which was made in about 1906, for the construction of Army transport docks and the warehouses at San Francisco, was carried in the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may or may not be true, although I would want to see the record before I admitted it was true. But while that is one instance that is doubtfully recited, I could call the gentleman's attention to dozens and dozens that have always been carried in connection with the sundry civil bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to make this general statement to the committee. The Committee on Appropriations has no desire at this time to be captious about its jurisdiction. This is a time in the history of the affairs of America when men must forget anything that is personal to them or to their work in the furtherance of the object that we all have a common interest in. And yet it is important that, pending a better arrangement touching jurisdictions of committees and the method of procedure in this House, there should be preserved in a broad general way the jurisdictions that belong to various committees. And the reason for that is in order that we may have a complete record of what we are doing. We are necessarily appropriating great sums of money without the fullest investigation, but the time will come when the records of those appropriations and the purposes for which they were made and the reasons given in justification of them will be very important in the checking up of the activities of the various departments of the Government, and the bringing about a return of the normal peace conditions of the Government.

Now, the deficiency act of March 17 carried an appropriation of $100,000,000 for this purpose, with a contract authorization of $50,000,000 more. From what I have understood by informally talking with Gen. Goethals, who has the expenditure in charge, they want not only the amount of money that is now being carried here but they want $50,000,000 more to make good the contract authorizations that they were given the right to incur. I am not going to make on behalf of the committee a point of order, but I am not going to let the matter be carried without the assertion of the right, the exclusive right, of the Committee on Appropriations to deal with this subject matter in order that the records may show that the carrying of it here is not to be taken as a precedent or to be used as a precedent in determining the jurisdictions that belong to respective committees hereafter.

For my own part, I hope that one of the benefits that will come out of the power conferred upon the President in connection with the Overman bill will be such a reorganization of the departments from an administrative standpoint as will do away with a great deal of the confusion that is occasioned now; and that as an incident to that, the Congress of the United States will have the courage and be willing to give the time to bring about a real and entire reform touching jurisdictions of committees of the Congress.

I hope that one of the good things that will come out of this war, and which will bring great relief, will be a modern method of transacting business. I want to say what I have so frequently said to the House, that the fault is by no means confined to the legislative branch of the Government, but that the legislative branch can never completely remedy the matter until there is an actual reform initiated on the part of administrative officers. I am not prepared entirely to state, although I think I know pretty accurately, the experience the Committee on Military Affairs is having in connection with appropriations, because I try to follow the estimates that come to every committee of this House in order to have some general idea as to what is being demanded in the way of appropriations; but I can say, speaking for the Committee on Appropriations itself, that the carelessness with which many estimates are sent to the House is beyond any possible excuse. And I have made that protest so pronounced to some of the administrative officers who are responsible that I hope we are going to have a marked reform in that regard.

Now, I want to repeat that in my judgment the committee ought not to have carried this item. I am not at all certain that it was because of any desire on their part; I am not at all sure that it did not result from just some of that looseness of estimating of which I am speaking. But I assume that they are familiar with some of the purposes that are intended to be carried out by virtue of this appropriation, and I suggest to them, inasmuch as they have got it in here, that unless I am very much misinformed as to the situation $50,000,000 more is being asked for by Gen. Goethals in connection with this work.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman very frankly that I am inclined to believe that we ought not to have carried this item. But in a $12,000,000,000 bill, $143,000,000 is quite liable to slip by, and it did slip by me in this case. I am glad the gentleman is not going to make a point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am frank to say that I am sure not only the gentleman from Alabama but the ranking Member on the minority side, has shown a disposition in connection with those matters belonging to that twilight zone lying between the two committees, to meet and consult in a spirit of perfect fairness. I am not making this statement with the idea of taking anybody to task, but simply for the purpose of keeping the record straight as we go on, and in the hope that incidentally they may impress upon the War Department the necessity of a more intelligent survey of the estimates in connection with the rules of the House of Representatives and the laws upon the statute books.

I withdraw the point of order. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the interesting statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] carries with it certain useful information for the House. Unfortunately two committees of the House are called upon to pass upon appropriations for military matters. The Committee on Appropriations has charge of fortifications. The seacoast artillery is all manufactured from money voted by the Committee on Appropriations. In the past—and I do not know whether the practice continues as much to-day as it did—the officers of the War Department would frequently bring an estimate to the Committee on Military Affairs, and, if it was turned down, they would go with the very same estimates to the Committee on Appropriations. I think the gentleman from Kentucky can bear me out in that statement.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that is true, except that I would reverse the process. They were usually turned down by us and then they went to you and got the money. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. That is immaterial after all. They generally went to the Committee on Appropriations to get in a deficiency item, and that committee considered their deficiency bill after the Army appropriation bill had passed. That is, if there was an appropriation made in the military bill this year and they did not have money enough they would go to the Committee on Appropriations in the following session with the new items and try to get the money from them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. They had another fine place where they could play both ends against the middle, and that was in the Field Artillery, which was cut in two, the jurisdiction for one part going to our committee and the jurisdiction for the other part going to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly. I fully appreciate the spirit in which the gentleman has acted in this matter. It is patriotic. It is broadgauged. It is thoroughly commendable. But I want to call to his attention the fact that in preparing this bill we found a number of paragraphs where the War Department had gone before his committee with deficiencies, and his committee put new language in the paragraph. We had no notice of that at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman will find that any changes that were made were so incidental as to be negligible, because the one thing that the committee did, and did it at the expense of great trouble, was to carry a lot of divisions that were in the Army bill into the deficiency bill so that you might check them up afterwards.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman that I asked officers of the War Department when they came before our committee and gave us the estimates whether there was any new language in the paragraphs, and on a number of occasions they said "Yes." I said, "Has it been in the law?" They said, "Yes." I asked, "Who put it into the law? Did this committee?" They said, "No; we got it into the law under the act of June 15 or October 6, which came from the Committee on Appropriations."

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, there may have been a few instances of that.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, the comparison of the new law with the former law shows that new language was inserted. And I say frankly the new language was necessary and was properly inserted.

But I submit that great good can be accomplished in this House if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would invite the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to come to the hearings when the Committee on Appropriations is considering military appropriations.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman tell me when the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will be able to attend to his own hearings if he attends mine?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, recently when the matter of an increase of the salary of the clerks and civilian employees of the Government was taken up by the gentleman's committee, he invited the chairman and the ranking member of all the appropriating committees to meet with him in the consideration of the subject. They did meet with him, and the increase recommended was in accordance with the unanimous report of those various chairmen and ranking members. So that there is no difficulty about it if we just go about it in the right way.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Kentucky has not only gone much further than the suggestion of the gentleman from California, but he went much further some time ago. The gentleman from Kentucky made to the House the suggestion of a program for centralizing appropriations nearly 10 years ago and has lost no opportunity in the 10 years last past to urge upon the House the necessity of the centralization of all appropriations, and this without regard to himself, because both he and his predecessor, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations at that time, Mr. Fitzgerald, offered to resign their places and forego any personal honor that might be supposed to come as the result of this consolidation. But they were met at every turn with ambitions of men who were either chairmen or prospective chairmen of committees and who objected to losing any of the power that they thought belonged to them. I do not say that unkindly, but I say it in the interest of historical accuracy as to what has happened in connection with the proposed centralization of appropriations. Now the suggestion made is practical only to a very slight degree. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] will bear witness that I have endeavored, wherever it was practicable, to keep in touch with him concerning appropriations at this time. The work that was done in connection with the deficiency appropriations last year was work that had to be done under the rules of the House by the Committee on Appropriations, because the gentleman's statement as to the jurisdiction of that committee is notable for what it leaves out rather than what it includes. The Committee on Appropriations has and always has had jurisdiction of the deficiency estimates of all the departments of the Government, and it is because of this that only at that one committee's table does there come a survey of all the expenditures and requests for appropriations of this Government and that there is any sort of check kept upon the governmental expenditures as a whole.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How does the gentleman define a deficiency in the providing of materials of war in war time? Is it not simply a new and original appropriation?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no. If the gentleman will look at the decisions, he will find many pages of decisions in connection with what constitute deficiencies.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In time of war, for war supplies and material?

Mr. SHERLEY. Some of them in time of war, when we were at war, and some of them in time of peace, when we were at peace.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How can you make an original estimate, when you are providing in war time for the destruction that takes place day by day?

Mr. SHERLEY. What the gentleman is stating is that inasmuch as the department may not be able to foresee, therefore the rule of deficiencies ought not to exist. There may or may not be some logic in that position. It has nothing to do with the present jurisdiction of the committees.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is not a question of being able to foresee. There is nothing to be foreseen. It is the expenditure for warfare day by day that nobody estimates anything about, but simply expends what he has on hand.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not agree with the gentleman at all. I think that argument has been the basis for very loose estimates and looser appropriations and that we are getting to the point where we ought to know something about details and estimates of appropriations. But all of that is aside. The only value of this discussion, if it have a value, is to emphasize the need that there is for a complete revolution in our method of doing business, both by the departments and by the Congress. I hope the time is shortly coming when all of the appropriating committees as such will be unrecognizable, including the Committee on Appropriations. Whether that involves my personal fortunes or not is a matter of the utmost indifference; but there must come a modern method of appropriating, and it must have a new fundamental factor in it altogether aside from committees. The Congress of the United States never can undertake to check up by question and answer all of the activities of government in spending these huge sums. What is needed is not only a centralization of appropriations but there is needed a separate audit that will be responsible to the legislative rather than to the administrative branch of the Government and whose work shall be available to some committee created for the purpose of checking up expenditures that have been made. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the day is fast approaching when the last suggestion of the gentleman may be made a real fact. I am in hearty accord with the suggestions he has just enunciated, and I trust that we will soon be able to formulate some plan by means of which we will have greater efficiency in appropriating the money, and less conflict of jurisdiction in committees, and more certainty and assurance of knowledge obtained from the audit which the gentleman has just outlined.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, there is only one way to accomplish this, and we are going to talk for weeks and do nothing unless that one way is adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us do it.

Mr. SHERLEY. This Congress, or this House if it can not get action otherwise, has got to pick out 5 or 6 or 7 or 10 men whom it believes in and give them the job of making a reorganization of procedure, and then when they come in here, unless they do a most foolish piece of work, the House, as a whole, must have the highest sort of legislative courage, and that is self-abnegation, and must accept their work. If they bring in a program here, and everyone who happens to have thought about the thing for 20 minutes at some time or has had some one make a suggestion to him, undertakes to deal with it, you will never get anywhere; you will get a hotchpotch. I have been waiting until public opinion was sufficiently strong to get this sort of attitude of mind on the part of the membership in this House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SMALL). The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. LONERGAN was given leave to extend his remarks on the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barracks and quarters: For barracks, quarters, stables, storehouses, magazines, administration and office buildings, sheds, shops, and other buildings necessary for the shelter of troops, public animals, and stores, and for administration purposes, except those pertaining to the Coast Artillery; for construction of reclamation plants; for constructing and repairing public buildings at military posts; for hire of employees; for rental of the authorized allowance of quarters for officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty, on duty with the troops at posts and stations where no public quarters are available; of barracks or authorized allowance of quarters for noncommissioned officers and enlisted men on duty where public quarters are not available, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve, retired enlisted men, and members of the Enlisted Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty; for grounds for cantonments, camp sites, and other military purposes, and for buildings or portions of buildings for occupation by troops, for use as stables, storehouses, and offices, and for other military purposes; for the hire of recruiting stations and lodgings for recruits; for such furniture for the public rooms of officers' messes and for officers' quarters at military posts as may be approved by the Secretary of War; for wall lockers in permanent barracks and refrigerators in barracks and quarters; for screen doors, window screens, storm doors and sash, and window shades for barracks, offices, and quarters, and for flooring and framing for tents, and for the National Guard when called or drafted into the service of the United States, $175,000,000.

Provided, That no part of the moneys so appropriated shall be paid for commutation of fuel or quarters to officers or enlisted men: Provided further, That the number of and total sum paid for civilian employees in the Quartermaster Corps shall be limited to the actual requirements of the service, and that no employee therein shall receive a salary of more than $150 per month, except upon the approval of the Secretary of War: Provided further, That in time of war, or when war is imminent, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to rent or lease any building or part of building in the District of Columbia that may be required for military purposes.

Provided further, That the following-described part of the naval reservation at Bishops Point, island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii, is hereby transferred to and placed under the control and jurisdiction of the War Department for use for military purposes: Beginning at an iron bolt driven in the coral at the northwest corner of the Bishops Point Naval Reservation, and running thence with the north line of the reservation by true azimuths and distances, as follows: First, azimuth 293° 49′ 430 feet to a concrete monument; second, azimuth 23° 49′ 375 feet to the high-water line, and thence along the high-water line to the point of beginning; containing three acres, more or less: And provided further, That there is hereby reserved to the use of the Navy Department a right of way over the said military reservation from the remaining portion of the naval reservation on Bishops Point to and upon any landing which may be built from the shore of the military reservation to water of sufficient depth to permit naval launches to moor alongside the said landing.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANTHONY: Page 42, line 8, after "$175,000,000," insert the following:

"Provided, That where practical so to do no work be done or contract made under or by authority of any provision of this act on or under a percentage or cost-plus basis, nor shall any contract be let involving more than $1,000 until at least three responsible competing contractors shall have been notified and considered in connection with such contract, and all contracts to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, the Government reserving the right to reject any and all bids."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is intended to convey to the War Department the desire of Congress that future contracts be awarded as far as practicable on a business basis. It is intended to do away, wherever possible, with the so-called cost-plus contracts, which undoubtedly have resulted in waste and extravagance, and the heads of most of the important bureaus say that they should be done away with. The language of the amendment is almost a duplicate of the language used in the deficiency bill to restrict expenditures in the $60,000,000 appropriation for housing, except that I recognize that in the military construction and in the award of contracts for military supplies there may be certain emergencies where it is desirable to waive practical business methods and adopt the cost-plus basis for a contract. The way is left open for the department, if confronted with an emergency, to use that system, but it conveys the direct information that it is our desire to do away with the cost-plus system, which is by many considered an unwise method of expending public moneys.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I did not get the entire reading of the amendment, but I understand from the gentleman's statement that it does not absolutely bind the War Department to a prohibition of the cost-plus system?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I use the words "where practical so to do." I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SMALL). The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DENT. It is entirely new legislation on an appropriation bill, and therefore not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that it is pertinent to inquire whether it reduces the appropriation.

Mr. DENT. How does it reduce the appropriation? It adds to the appropriation, as far as that is concerned. It requires advertisement for competitive bids. How can it reduce the appropriation where it requires competitive bids?

Mr. ANTHONY. The purpose of the amendment is along the line of economy. Undoubtedly it will tend to a reduction and economy in the expenditure of public funds. I understood the gentleman from Alabama to have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from Kansas and I do not generally misunderstand each other. I stated that I was in sympathy with the purpose of the amendment; but I would like to think over the proposition, and it occurs to me that in war times it might not be proper to handicap the War Department.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman understand that the language has been modified by using the words "where practical so to do," so that there is no rigid limitation?

Mr. DENT. I think that makes it practically meaningless. However, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. I renew the point of order, and I do it for this reason: I am in thorough sympathy with the gentleman from Kansas as to what he desires. I believe that, speaking by and large, contracts, particularly those that are made on the cost-plus system, result in extravagance, and at times in gross extravagance. I think they should never be entered into except as a last resort, but I do not believe that you can pass a hard and fast rule such as this without crippling the department.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the language has been changed.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is carried in the housing bill a provision which provides that the $50,000,000 shall be expended only under competitive conditions such as are set out. There was carried in the deficiency bill that has just passed section 7 of that law, amending it so as to get away from the restriction of the law in contracts of $1,000 or under. But section 7 carried in the deficiency bill applies only to the appropriation for the housing—$50,000,000. Now, it is perfectly manifest that you might with wisdom put a provision of that kind on that sort of an appropriation and yet not be able with wisdom to do it as to all appropriations in connection with the Army.

I do not quarrel at all with what the gentleman seeks; I am in hearty sympathy with him, but I submit to his own good judgment that it is not practical to say that in every instance money shall only be expended under competitive bidding.

Mr. ANTHONY. I modified the language that is used in the gentleman's deficiency bill by using the words "where practical so to do," recognizing the fact that in a military emergency it might be very necessary for the department to proceed at once under the cost-plus system. With that modification it leaves the amendment not binding at all, and the reasons advanced by the gentleman from Kentucky are not applicable.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am indebted to the gentleman's remarks in respect to the language of his amendment. I was in conversation with the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and was unable to ascertain the exact reading of it, but from what the gentleman had said to me earlier in the day in conversation I assumed that he had put a hard and fast provision there. If the matter has elasticity in it, I have no objection to it, because I am in sympathy with the purpose of it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported. I think some gentlemen have not heard it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that in the second paragraph, where he provides for competitive bids, he should repeat his language "when practical so to do."

Mr. ANTHONY. I used there the words "where circumstances may permit," which, I think, cover the contention of the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the words "where circumstances so permit" ought to follow the word "contract" several lines above instead of where it is written. As it reads now it is—

Nor shall any contract be let involving more than $1,000 until at least three responsible competing contractors shall have been notified and considered in connection with such contract where circumstances so permit.

I think it would read smoother and clearer if it provided as follows:

Nor where circumstances so permit shall any contract be let—

And so forth.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to the change.

Mr. DENT. I would suggest that the gentleman use the same language "where practical so to do."

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not fit in there.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it accomplishes the purpose the way it is now. I am willing to accept any reasonable amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is hard to make a smooth reading on the floor, but I suggest the gentleman amend his amendment by inserting after the word "contract," where it occurs the second time, the words "where circumstances so permit," and that said words be eliminated after the word "contract" where it appears the third time, and I ask the Clerk to read it as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "contract," where it appears the third time in the amendment, strike the words "where circumstances so permit," and after the word "contract," where it appears the second time in the amendment, insert the words "where circumstances so permit," so that the amendment as modified would read as follows:

"Provided, That where practical so to do no work be done or contract made under or by authority of any provision of this act, on or under a percentage or cost-plus percentage basis, nor shall any contract where circumstances so permit be let involving more than $1,000 until at least three responsible competing contractors shall have been notified and considered in connection with such contracts, and all contracts to be awarded to the lowest bidder, the Government reserving the right to reject any and all bids."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think all of us will agree that the language can be improved upon, and I realize the difficulty of hastily preparing or amending amendments on the floor so as to properly perfect them, but the bill will go to conference, and as we are agreed on what we want to do, I shall not now object. My original objection, as I stated in my opening sentence, was against absolutely tying the Government, and it was necessary that the point of order be immediately made if it was not to be lost.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. This amendment applies to the entire act. It does not apply to the section only to which it is attached.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand that.

Mr. DOWELL. Should it not follow at the close of the bill in a separate section? In that event gentlemen can take time to prepare the amendment as they desire.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it would be in better form, but, after all, the form of it can be worked out very much better off the floor than on it, and I am quite sure that the Senate will take notice of this debate, and that it will be worked out so as to carry out the views we all have in mind.

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course, it is the understanding that the widest latitude be permitted the War Department, and the purpose of it is to convey the desire of the House that these contracts be let to the lowest bidder, where practicable. I want the amendment to convey that information.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman's purpose, and inasmuch as it is not hard and fast I think it is a desirable thing to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a suggestion for unanimous consent, that the gentleman from Kansas withdraw that for the present and offer it at the close of the bill where general legislative matters are considered, if it is satisfactory to him.

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall withdraw it with the understanding that the chairman of the committee offer it at the close, if that is agreeable to him, for I may not be present.

Mr. DENT. I am willing to offer it after we put it in shape, but I hope the gentleman from Kansas will draw and reshape it.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the amendment be withdrawn at this stage. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LOBECK: Page 42, line 8, after the figures "$175,000,000," insert:

"Provided, That the amount of $250,000 of the above amount appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the construction, including plumbing, heating, lighting, and cold storage, of a warehouse upon the site of the quartermaster's depot, at Omaha, Nebr."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this amendment, and I do not think it is subject to the point of order, because, to my mind, it is a limitation of expenditures. The need of additional quarters at the Omaha Quartermaster Corps depot are well known. Col. Grant, the commander in charge of the quartermaster department at Omaha, who has been there for a number of years, has made a request of the War Department for an additional building to be built there. Col. Grant has been in the Quartermaster Service of the Army many years, and probably knows the necessities of additional buildings at Omaha better than anyone. I have received a statement from the Quartermaster General of the Army, dated May 28, 1918, of the amount of tonnage which has been handled at the Omaha depot since the declaration of war, and I find that it amounts to a total of 176,000,000 pounds. The classification of this tonnage is as follows: Subsistence, 105,000,000 pounds; other supplies, 71,000,000 pounds. The floor space used and the amount of rentals are as follows: The Government property at the Omaha depots covers 122,955 square feet, so there is no rental on that space, but Col. Grant has had to rent outside of the Government-owned property a total of 54,579 square feet. Of this 15,059 square feet a patriotic firm of Omaha rented a building to the Army at a dollar for six months, so the Government practically has had free use of this. Something had to be done to shelter the Government's supplies and this firm came to the rescue. For 20,000 square feet the Quartermaster Corps pays $1,000 per month—I understand that is for cold-storage purposes—and 10,000 square feet, 10 cents per square foot per month of space actually used; 9,520 square feet, at 60 cents per square foot per year. Summary: Government property, 122,955 square feet; private property rented, 54,579 square feet. There is ample room owned by the Government there for an additional building with railroad trackage. The railroad tracks are so located that there is an admirable space for a cold-storage plant on the first floor of the new building asked for by this amendment, so a cold-storage plant under the main floors can be easily maintained. There is much perishable product bought and secured by the Quartermaster Corps in the neighborhood of Omaha. Omaha at the present time has been made a zone for the Quartermaster's purchases for the western half of Iowa, Nebraska, Wyoming, and the contiguous territory, and it will not only be necessary now, during the war, but after the war this new building will be needed. During the last year a large amount of Army supplies could not be housed, and much of the purchases were housed on the outside with tarpaulins to cover over them, and every precaution used to protect the supplies. I can assure the Members that Col. Grant did everything to protect the supplies from the elements. He is built that way. I brought the need of a new building to the attention of the committee, and the committee, while they appreciated the necessity of an additional building at the Omaha Quartermaster Corps depot, felt that a special amendment for a building would cause other amendments to be offered; and their idea was to make the Army appropriation bill general in its scope, therefore they did not wish to make any special amendments or provisos throughout the bill. But I believe it is necessary to have this additional building to protect Army supplies and offer the amendment in good faith.

Now, so far as Omaha being a good point to buy supplies for the Army, it is one of the best points in the country to buy merchandise and subsistence. In conversation yesterday with Mr. Charles H. Pickens, of Omaha, the president of one of the largest mercantile and manufacturing concerns in the Middle West, he stated that he had been bidding on Government supplies for over 40 years—competition from everywhere—bidding for supplies to Army forts all through the central and western portions of the United States, and the bids for Army rations from Omaha averaged 19 cents per ration, whereas the average throughout the country by other bidders per ration was 21 cents. Omaha is a large railroad center, one of the best in the country; the transcontinental lines go through Omaha, with railroads radiating therefrom. The Army must purchase much of its needed supplies in the Missouri Valley country. Omaha can do its share, with its manufacturing output in 1917 amounting to $327,721,546, consisting in part of—

Alfalfa products	$3,500,000
Bags and bag-factory products	3,525,000
Bread and bakery	1,350,000
Butter manufactured	11,011,925
Coffee	1,334,000
Flour and mill products	6,217,319
Furnishing goods, ready to wear	2,022,000
Boots and shoes	1,500,000
Harness and saddles	514,000
Macaroni	1,040,000
Milk	1,800,000
Packing-house products	191,718,000
Smelter products	59,997,165
Soap and soap products	7,400,000
Structural steel and iron	2,615,783
Sirups and preserves	500,000
Tanks, stacks, drums, etc	876,334
Tents and awnings	336,948

All of which, with other manufactures, is called upon by the Army for supplies. I might add that live-stock receipts at Omaha for the year was 7,565,830 head. It is one of the great horse markets of the United States, and the grain receipts amounted (at Omaha) to 66,462,100 bushels. All of which shows that Omaha is in the center of a productive country, where the Army must look for and get supplies.

Therefore I hope, in the interest of economy and the protection of the necessary Army supplies, that it may be cared for at the Omaha depot. I hope the committee will adopt my amendment, and that the Chairman will overrule the point of order. I appreciate and thank the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. DENT, and his associates for their courtesy to me in this matter.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hate to insist upon the point of order in a matter of this kind because I am sure the gentleman's statement is entirely accurate, but I do not think matters of this kind ought to be put in an appropriation bill, and for that reason I shall have to insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order. Does the gentleman from Nebraska care to be heard?

Mr. LOBECK. No; I stated a moment ago I thought it was a limitation on the appropriation, and I leave it to the Chairman to determine, as he is more familiar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it carries a limitation in a legislative way, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I have voted for every bill which has been presented to Congress for the winning of this great war. I have given the administration every support, both as ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and on the floor of the House, which my ability affords. I shall vote for this bill providing $12,041,000,000 for the Army and the prosecution of the war. This sum is so great it staggers the imagination and is impossible of human conception.

It provides for an army of 3,000,000 men, with all those things which go to make it effective and powerful. It provides for thousands of aeroplanes and the men to properly operate them. It pleases me in that it is the clearest announcement of all the bills which have come before us that America is living up to its pledge of all its men and resources if needed for the prosecution of this war.

The winning of the war is the great question confronting the American people. All other questions in comparison sink into insignificance. It is a matter which will determine the construction of the maps of the world and the status of civilization. It will demonstrate whether or not the world is to be governed for democracy or whether autocracy shall stalk its hideous form throughout the future years. It means peace and happiness to all the people or a world in arms.

We have made wonderful progress from a peace status to a war basis. Our enterprise and organizations are rapidly demonstrating to the world that we can be a fighting people as well as a business people. The great shipyards of my city are working day and night in the construction of ships to carry the American soldiers and those products necessary for their equipment and support and for the prosecution of the war on the battle fields of Flanders. Only the other day one Knight, a colored riveter of the Bethlehem Steel Co. at Baltimore, drove 4,875 rivets in a single day, establishing a world record for himself and the shipyard. The pictures in the lobby outside this Hall, taken at midnight at the Baltimore Dry Docks & Shipbuilding Co., show the activities at that shipyard to be as great at midnight as midday.

The people of my city are active and energetic in supporting all measures for the prosecution of the war and for the comfort and convenience of the soldiers abroad and in the cantonments of the country.

We people of Baltimore have our entire attention focused upon the winning of the war. It is the one great question confronting us. We realize that success of the war means everything to our great Republic. Our people are determined, no matter what it costs, to see that success perches upon the American banner and the banners of its allies.

The members of the Committee on Military Affairs in the formation of this wonderful appropriation bill, the largest in the history of our country, the largest that has ever appeared before any legislative body in the history of the world, have performed with exactness a great work. I am told that if one could begin counting silver dollars at the birth of Christ and worked 10 hours per day from then until now he would not have completed 1,000,000,000.

The committee in the preparation of this great measure demonstrates to Congress and to the American people that it is composed of experienced men well versed in military needs. Long experience is a wonderful asset to Congress and to the Nation. It is this experience which means everything in a great conflict of this kind. It is like the experience of a great general, such as our Gen. Pershing in command "over there." Who would for a moment dare even suggest the removal of this soldier of experience to place in his stead one without experience, because he happened to be a good fellow, a friend, or associate? So it is with the various men of this great legislative body; their experience is a golden asset to the American people. Speaker CLARK in an address said that—

> A man has to learn to be a Representative, just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

The President of the United States in his address a few days ago, realizing the importance of every man being on the job in this crucial time, said:

> The consideration that dominates every other now, and makes every other seem trivial and negligible, is the winning of the war. [Applause.] We are not only in the midst of the war, we are at the very peak and crisis of it. Hundreds of thousands of our men, carrying our hearts with them and our fortunes, are in the field, and ships are crowding faster and faster to the ports of France and England with regiment after regiment, thousand after thousand, to join them until the enemy shall be beaten and brought to a reckoning with mankind. [Applause.] There can be no pause or intermission. The great enterprise must, on the contrary, be pushed with greater and greater energy. The volume of our might must steadily and rapidly be augmented until there can be no question of resisting it. If that is to be accomplished, gentlemen, money must sustain it to the utmost. Our financial programme must no more be left in doubt or suffered to lag than our ordnance programme or our ship programme or our munitions programme or our programme for making millions of men ready. These others are not programmes, indeed, but mere plans upon paper, unless there is to be an unquestionable supply of money.
> That is the situation, and it is the situation which creates the duty, no choice or preference of ours. There is only one way to meet that duty. We must meet it without selfishness or fear of consequences. Politics is adjourned. The elections will go to those who think least of it; to those who go to the constituencies without explanations or excuses, with a plain record of duty faithfully and disinterestedly performed. I, for one, am always confident that the people of this country will give a just verdict upon the service of the men who act for them when the facts are such that no man can disguise or conceal them. There is no danger of deceit now. An intense and pitiless light beats upon every man and every action in this tragic plot of war that is now upon the stage. If lobbyists hurry to Washington to attempt to turn what you do in the matter of taxation to their protection or advantage, the light will beat also upon them. There is abundant fuel for the light in the records of the Treasury with regard to profits of every sort. The profiteering that can not be got at by the restraints of conscience and love of country can be got at by taxation. [Applause.] There is such profiteering now and the information with regard to it is available and indisputable.

I am advising you to act upon this matter of taxation now, gentlemen, not because I do not know that you can see and interpret the facts and the duty they impose just as well and with as clear a perception of the obligations involved as I can, but because there is a certain solemn satisfaction in sharing with you the responsibilities of such a time. The world never stood in such case before. Men never before had so clear or so moving a vision of duty. I know that you will begrudge the work to be done here by us no more than the men begrudge us theirs who lie in the trenches and sally forth to their death. There is a stimulating comradeship knitting us all together. And this task to which I invite your immediate consideration will be performed under favorable influences if we will look to what the country is thinking and expecting and care nothing at all for what is being said and believed in the lobbies of Washington hotels, where the atmosphere seems to make it possible to believe what is believed nowhere else. [Applause.]

Have you not felt the spirit of the Nation rise and its thought become a single and common thought since these eventful days came in which we have been sending our boys to the other side? I think you must read that thought, as I do, to mean this, that the people of this country are not only united in the resolute purpose to win this war but are ready and willing to bear any burden and undergo any sacrifice that it may be necessary for them to bear in order to win it. [Applause.] We need not be afraid to tax them, if we lay taxes justly. They know that the war must be paid for and that it is they who must pay for it, and if the burden is justly distributed and the sacrifice made a common sacrifice from which none escapes who can bear it at all, they will carry it cheerfully and with a sort of solemn pride. I have always been proud to be an American, and was never more proud than now, when all that we have said and all that we have foreseen about our people is coming true. The great days have come when the only thing that they ask for or admire is duty greatly and adequately done; when their only wish for America is that she may share the freedom she enjoys; when a great, compelling sympathy wells up in their hearts for men everywhere who suffer and are oppressed; and when they see at last the high uses for which their wealth has been piled up and their mighty power accumulated and, counting neither blood nor treasure now that their final day of opportunity has come, rejoice to spend and to be spent through a long night of suffering and terror in order that they and men everywhere may see the dawn of a day of righteousness and justice and peace. Shall we grow weary when they bid us act? [Applause.]

May I add this word, gentlemen? Just as I was leaving the White House I was told that the expected drive on the western front had apparently begun. You can realize how that solemnized my feeling as I came to you, and how it seemed to strengthen the purpose which I have tried to express in these lines.

I have admired the work of this session. The way in which the two Houses of the Congress have cooperated with the Executive has been generous and admirable, and it is not in any spirit of suggesting duty neglected, but only to remind you of the common cause and the common obligation that I have ventured to come to you to-day. [Applause.]

The sentiment is rapidly spreading for the retention in Congress of those experienced Members who have supported the administration in the prosecution of the war and are in accord with the principles and doctrines laid down by the President, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. As evidence of this I quote from an editorial of the Baltimore News of May 10, 1918, headed "The Less Politics the Better," which says:

It is not possible to do away with elections because the Nation has a war on its hands, but it is possible to devote the minimum of time and attention to political maneuvering and wirepulling. The patriot who seeks office merely because he wants a job is doing both his party and his State poor service. This is one time that the man who is in should be left in unless there is imperative reason for making a change. * * * Col. George Harvey in the North American Review is urging that a political truce be declared for the duration of the war, and that the present Members of Congress be returned without any contest at all either for the nomination or election.

Only recently in an editorial, May 28, 1918, the Baltimore Sun, in commenting upon President Wilson's message, said:

ADJOURNING POLITICS.

"Politics is adjourned," said President Wilson in his address to Congress Monday. "The elections will go to those who think least of it; to those who go to the constituencies without explanations or excuses, with a plain record of duty faithfully and distinterestedly performed. I, for one, am always confident that the people of this country will give a just verdict upon the service of men who act for them when the facts are such that no man can disguise or conceal them."

Is the President right? Is politics adjourned? Was the President stating a fact or expressing an ideal? The answers to those questions depend upon the temper and opinions of the American people. If they feel with the President that politics is adjourned, then politics is adjourned.

In using those words the President, we believe, was not merely phrasing a glittering and pleasing generality; he had, we believe, something concrete and definite in mind. Our own idea as to that definite and concrete thing is this:

So far as possible, there should be no contests in the primary or general elections of this year, but every Congressman who is a candidate for reelection and who has proved his patriotism and faithfully supported the work of the war in office should be returned without opposition.

For those who have not faithfully supported the work of the war politics is not and should not be adjourned. The fights against both the nomination and election of these men should be made just as hot as is necessary to defeat them. But the men who have stood by their country, who have supported the war measures vigorously and sincerely, should be reelected without question.

We have faith that the great mass of the American people will adopt this attitude and will bring about a fulfillment of the President's prophecy that the elections will go to those who think the least of politics.

I have dwelt upon these matters for the purpose of showing that the sentiment of the country approves the splendid record made by this Congress of experienced legislators in their support of the administration; that they approve of its efforts upon broad, comprehensive, and enlarged plans, so that there can be no underrating of the task set before us; that they approve the appropriations of such magnitude as will put in the field a large army, which will render success assured; that all other questions are viewed with dismay except the prosecution of the undertaking with the greatest rapidity commensurate with preparation for the winning of the war, the greatest conflict the world has ever known.

I wish in conclusion to congratulate the committee upon their splendid work and adequate legislation. The country will applaud and the winning of the war by ample force and war munitions made easier.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I desire to address the committee for a few moments in the interest of historical accuracy. It is now universally recognized that the success of the selective-draft act has been primarily due to the fact that its administration has been placed in the hands of the State and local civilian authorities. Mark Sullivan, of Collier's Weekly, was among the first to give wide publicity to this supreme virtue of the draft law. On June 23, 1917, in his "Comments on Congress," he said:

MARK SULLIVAN'S EDITORIAL IN COLLIER'S.

Anyone who will read the draft bill closely or will search his recollection of the details of registration and draft which we are just passing through will discover this fact, a fact of the most fundamental importance, although utterly inconspicuous: At no point does a soldier come to a citizen and say "Come"; at no point does a military authority say to a civilian, "Come, you; take orders from me." This is conscription in the odious sense, and this is the thing which doesn't happen in our case. The administration wrote the bill and laid out the process so that at no place does the Army take a man from civil life; it is always civilians sending a man to the Army. What happens is that a group of civilians say to a man, "We have examined the circumstances of all the persons in our community, and we designate you as one best fitted to go and serve us; that is, to serve the civil population as a soldier." The board of civilians who make this designation are the local civil authorities, who have been elected to the offices they hold by the very voters whom they now survey and designate—the neighbors of the men drafted. And if the drafted man does not agree that his designation was a proper one or believes that he should be exempted, he has a chance to lay his reasons before the fellow civilians who have designated him. Finally, if the local board still insists on his designation, he has an appeal again to civilians. At all points it is civilians choosing a man from among themselves and sending him to serve them in the Army; at no point is it a case of soldiers taking a man. The subordination of the Army to the civil population is maintained. A loose or careless or hurried handling of our emergency by a man intent on quickness and expediency might have lost us a good deal.

Thus far Mr. Sullivan is absolutely correct in his appreciation of the merits of civilian tribunals, but he then goes on to attribute this most wise plan to the President:

The writer of this paragraph does not happen to know whether or not Mr. Wilson personally wrote or dictated the conscription bill. But it is certain that this feature of the fundamental structure of the bill is an emanation from Mr. Wilson's mind, a mind so well grounded in the principles of democratic society that it just naturally works right without being conscious of it. The bigness of this it is hardly possible to exaggerate, yet it passes merely as part of the day's work.

In the Philadelphia Public Ledger of May 16, 1918, there appeared an article entitled "How a great democracy created its Army," by William H. Taft, which gives credit for this legislative masterpiece to another individual. In discussing the origin of the selective-draft act, Mr. Taft says:

PRESIDENT TAFT'S COMMENTS.

Without abating in the slightest the credit of those who put through the bill, it is not too much to say that the real inventor of the system, the man who has done more than any other one person in the Government practically to carry it out, is Maj. Gen. Enoch H. Crowder, the Judge Advocate General of the United States. * * *

When we declared war and the question of the proper method of raising an Army was before the War Department, the General Staff was consulted and so was the Judge Advocate General. They both submitted plans and Gen. Crowder's was adopted; and the action of the administration in adopting it has been triumphantly vindicated by the result. * * *

In devising the mechanism needed, Gen. Crowder showed his broad vision and complete confidence in the self-governing capacity of the American people. He called for the voluntary action of State, county, and city officials and for the formation of committees of unofficial persons to execute the law. Through these agents, in a marvelously short time, nearly ten millions of men, between 21 and 31, were registered. Exemption boards, 4,500 in number, and district boards, 200 in number, with the duty of selection and examination, were created, and the amount of free and valuable service rendered by them speaks volumes for the patriotic spirit of their members. * * *

Now, I not only respect but sincerely admire the greatest of our living ex-Presidents. From the day he left the White House to this hour he has deserved the high esteem in which he is held by his fellow citizens everywhere. Since the declaration of war he has given to the limit of his time, his strength, and his great ability in the cause of victory for our arms. Under his persuasive leadership the most far-reaching compact in the history of American industry has been made. For the duration of the war the leaders of organized labor have agreed to abandon the right to strike, and the leaders of organized capital have recognized the justice and expediency of collective bargaining. Always constructive in his statesmanship, not one word of faultfinding or unfair criticism has escaped from his lips. Both during the war and long after its close our people will mention with pride the patriotic service of William Howard Taft, a true American. [Applause.]

I know that Mr. Taft would be the last man to bestow credit where credit is not due. It is easy to imagine how he fell into this error, particularly when praising one with whom he served in the Philippine Government. But now let us see who it was that is really responsible for the use of local civil tribunals to determine the men to be selected to do the actual fighting in this war.

HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATION.

Early in April, 1917, the Secretary of War sent to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs the original draft of the selective-draft act which, Mr. Taft says, was prepared by Gen. Crowder. Nowhere in this proposed bill is any mention made of tribunals or boards whose duty it would be to enforce the provisions of the law. The President is authorized to utilize all Federal or State officers, but beyond that no intimation is given of how citizens are to be selected for military service. On April 9, 1918, the Secretary of War made a statement before the Committee on Military Affairs in support of this bill and the record shows that he was accompanied by the Judge Advocate General. Beginning on page 61 of the hearings the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. SHALLENBERGER, made this statement and inquiry:

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Referring to the third section of this bill, which, as the chairman said, was discussed the other day, you have referred several times, and I think it is a very essential point, to the manner of the selection of those men. As I remember it, you stated that it was contemplated that something like 48 per cent, at least, or a large proportion of them, would be exempted for one reason or another. Now, in the application of that exemption there would have to be a tribunal to determine the questions that will arise in the administration of the law. Has the department determined whether this tribunal shall be a civil tribunal or a military tribunal?

Secretary BAKER. That has not yet been determined.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. You understand, of course, that some nations—Germany, for instance—has a military tribunal, while England has a civil tribunal to administer the law. Furthermore, you know, no doubt, that in Argentina, and, perhaps, in some other countries, there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction about the fairness of the administration of the law in making the selections. The matter presents difficulties that will make for a great deal of dissatisfaction, and I did not know whether or not you had determined that vital point.

Secretary BAKER. I have heard of the criticism of the Argentine administration of the law. This bill places at the disposal of the department or the Government all the administrative and executive agencies of every State, including, doubtless, the smallest administrative units in the State. Undoubtedly some system will have to be devised for a fair and public determination of those matters.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. But that has not yet been determined by the department?

Secretary BAKER. No.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think we will be asked about that on the floor and that the matter will be very fully discussed. If the department has determined upon its policy——

Secretary BAKER (interposing). We have determined our policy, but not how it will be administered. Those details have not been worked out yet.

On April 11 the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General were again before the committee. I read from page 117 of the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. Have you anything further to suggest, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary BAKER. There is only one other thing. There has been some question raised as to just what was done in Great Britain on the subject of conscription, and Gen. Crowder has kindly found for me the military-service act of the British Government, and I would like to read perhaps just enough of it to make the question clear.

Mr. CALDWELL. How much of it is there?

Secretary BAKER. It is not very long; only two or three pages.

Mr. KAHN. I think we would like to hear it.

Mr. CALDWELL. The only thing I had in mind was whether or not it would not be well to put the entire act in the record.

Secretary BAKER. I understood that to be the purport of your question.

Mr. GORDON. Is that the latest act which they have passed? The first act was passed in January, 1916, and the last act was enacted in May.

Secretary BAKER. My impression is that this is the act of January, 1916.

Gen. CROWDER. This is the act which set in force the conscription in 1916. It is the first of the acts. We have not the series of acts here.

Secretary BAKER. On the back of the act appears the indorsement, "Ordered by the House of Commons to be drawn on the 6th day of January, 1916."

Mr. GORDON. That was the original act.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And it has been considerably amended since then.

Secretary BAKER (reading):

"Be it enacted, etc., as follows:

"1. (1) Every male British subject who—

"(a) On the 15th day of August, 1915, was ordinarily resident in Great Britain and had attained the age of 18 years and had not attained the age of 41 years; and

"(b) On the 2d day of November, 1915, was unmarried or was a widower without any child dependent upon him—

"shall, unless he either is within the exceptions set out in the first schedule of this act or has attained the age of 41 years before the appointed date, be deemed as from the appointed date to have been duly enlisted in His Majesty's regular forces for general service with the colours or in the reserve for the period of the war and to have been forthwith transferred to the reserve."

* * * * * * *

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The second schedule, Mr. Secretary, shows the constitution of the tribunal in which this is administered, and that is the question I asked you about.

Secretary BAKER. Shall I read the second schedule?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is the one I asked you about yesterday.

Secretary BAKER. I will give you the substance of it, and will ask you, Governor, to follow me and see if I leave out anything that ought to be in:

"There shall be a military-service tribunal for each local registration district under the national registration act of 1915 in Great Britain, or for any division of any such district which may be adopted for the purpose by the registration authority of the district, consisting of such persons, not less than 5 and not exceeding 25 in number, as may be appointed for the purpose by that authority.

"2. There shall be appeal tribunals, acting within such areas as His Majesty may appoint, consisting of such persons as may be appointed for the purpose by His Majesty.

"3. Tribunals may act through committees appointed by them, consisting wholly or partly of members of the tribunal."

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The act I have before me says there shall be a local tribunal. It does not say a military tribunal at all.

Secretary BAKER. It says a military-service tribunal in the act I have. There are two other provisions:

"There shall be a central tribunal for Great Britain consisting of such persons as may be appointed for the purpose by His Majesty.

"5. His Majesty may, by order in council, make regulations with respect to the constitution, functions, and procedure of the military-service tribunals, the appeal tribunals, and the central tribunals; and, so far as provision is not made for procedure by those regulations, the procedure of the tribunal shall be such as may be determined by the tribunal."

Then there are two brief sentences on the subject of appeal:

"1. Any person aggrieved by the decision of the military-service tribunal and any person generally or specially authorized to appeal from the decision of that tribunal by the army council may appeal against the decision of the military-service tribunal to the appeal tribunal of the area.

"2. Any person aggrieved by the decision of an appeal tribunal, and any person generally or specially authorized to appeal from the decision of that tribunal by the army council, may, by leave of the appeal tribunal, appeal to the central tribunal."

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In the copy I have before me in every case where you have read "military-service tribunal" this says "local tribunal."

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Secretary, did you read all the subsequent acts to the act of January, 1916?

Secretary BAKER. That is the only one I have, Mr. GORDON.

Mr. GORDON. There have been two subsequent acts—one of January 27, 1916, and then one enacted in May.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose we put both of them in the record.

Secretary BAKER. Gov. SHALLENBERGER has copies of both of them, and I will ask him to submit them for the record, because this is the only copy the War Department has, so far as I know.

(The papers referred to follow:)

"GREAT BRITAIN.

"Military-service acts, 1916 (5 and 6 Geo. 5, c. 104).

"An act to make provision with respect to military service in connection with the present war. [27th January, 1916.]

"Be it enacted, etc., as follows—

I omit the first part of the act.

"SECOND SCHEDULE—CONSTITUTION OF TRIBUNALS.

"1. There shall be a local tribunal for each local registration district under the national registration act, 1915, in Great Britain, or for any division of any such district which may be adopted for the purpose by the registration authority of the district, consisting of such persons, not less than 5 and not exceeding 25 in number, as may be appointed for the purpose by that authority.

"2. There shall be appeal tribunals, acting within such areas as His Majesty may appoint, consisting of such persons as may be appointed for the purpose by His Majesty.

"3. Tribunals may act through committees appointed by them, consisting of members of the tribunal.

"4. There shall be a central tribunal for Great Britain consisting of such persons as may be appointed for the purpose by His Majesty.

"5. His Majesty may by order in council make regulations with respect to the constitution, functions, and procedure of the local tribunals, the appeal tribunals, and the central tribunal; and, so far as provision is not made for procedure by those regulations, the procedure of the tribunal shall be such as may be determined by the tribunal.

"Regulations made under this provision shall contain instructions to the local and appeal tribunals given with a view to securing uniformity of decision and practice amongst the several tribunals.

"Any order in council under this provision may be revoked or varied by any subsequent order in council, and any regulations made under any such order shall, as soon as may be, be presented to Parliament.

"6. If any difficulty arises with respect to the constitution of local tribunals, or otherwise in relation to the operation of this act with respect to local tribunals, the local government board, or, as respects

Scotland, the secretary for Scotland, may take any appointment and do anything which appears to them necessary or expedient for the establishment of those tribunals or for securing the full operation of this act with respect to those tribunals.

"APPEAL.

"1. Any person aggrieved by the decision of a local tribunal, and any person generally or specially authorized to appeal from the decision of that tribunal by the army council, may appeal against the decision of a local tribunal to the appeal tribunal of the area.

"2. Any person aggrieved by the decision of an appeal tribunal, and any person generally or specially authorized to appeal from the decision of that tribunal by the army council, may, by leave of the appeal tribunal, appeal to the central tribunal."

* * * * * * *

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Secretary, if it should develop, as it appeared from those two bills which you and I have submitted, that the British Government has rescinded its original declaration providing for a military tribunal and has changed it to a civil tribunal, would not that indicate that it is a matter of serious importance?

Secretary BAKER. It might well be, and I have no objection to that character of tribunal. I am indifferent on that subject so long as it is a tribunal that can act with swiftness. Certainty and swiftness are what we desire.

The Judge Advocate General will examine into that other question as soon as he gets the President's proclamation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAYDEN. All that I have quoted from the hearings demonstrates that neither the Secretary of War nor the Judge Advocate General had given any serious consideration to the question of how the draft tribunals were to be constituted. The gentleman from Nebraska, however, had devoted much thought and study to this question. He was quick to see the advantage of what Mark Sullivan calls "a fact of the most fundamental importance, the bigness of which it is hardly possible to exaggerate." Mr. SHALLENBERGER offered an amendment to the bill as drafted by the War Department which the Military Committee was glad to accept, so that when H. R. 3545 was reported to the House it contained the following proviso, of which he is the author:

CIVILIAN CONTROL FIRST PLACED IN THE LAW.

Provided, That the President is authorized and empowered to constitute and establish throughout the United States tribunals for the purpose of enforcing and carrying into effect the terms and provisions of this act, together with such regulations as he shall prescribe and determine necessary for its administration. A majority of the members of each tribunal shall be citizens of the United States not connected with the Military Establishment.

When the selective-draft bill was under discussion in the House on April 28, 1918, this colloquy occurred:

Mr. DEWALT. The only provision in the bill in reference to the selective mode is that which is contained on page 9, stating that the board shall be constituted and established by the President, and that a majority of the members of each board shall be citizens of the United States not connected with the Military Establishment.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; and that amendment to the bill was put in on my motion. I asked the Secretary of War how these boards were to be constituted. I learned that there are 900 or more of these boards operating in England, and in my opinion, from the best information I could get, there will have to be several thousand boards operating in the United States. The Secretary of War could not assure me that these boards were to be civilian boards, and so I offered the provision that at least a majority of them should be civilians. I have since learned that in England every member of the local board is a civilian. In that country—a kingdom fighting for its life—the people are so insistent upon subordinating the military to the civil department of the Government that they have provided that every man who decides upon the right of a man to go to war or stay at home shall be a civilian.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Could we not rely upon Army officers to be more free from prejudice and favoritism than any other class?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not think so; not upon a question of this sort. I think this plan will be accepted much more willingly by the country if the tribunal is a civil body.

HISTORY OF THE PROVISION IN THE SENATE.

The War Department draft of the bill was likewise introduced in the Senate without any provision for the establishment of local and district boards, which corroborates the fact that no one in the department realized, in the beginning, the importance of creating such boards. On May 28, a week after the House bill containing the Shallenberger amendment had been reported, the Senate agreed to an amendment to its bill which was offered by Senator KELLOGG of Minnesota. The Kellogg amendment is as follows:

The President shall make rules and regulations to carry out the terms and provisions of this section and provide for the issuance of certificates of exemption or partial or limited exemption and for a system to exclude and discharge individuals from selective draft. There shall be created under the direction of the President local tribunals in the several States or subdivisions thereof, composed of the members of the local civil government, to decide all questions of exemption under this act, and also all questions arising under the draft for partial military service or for including or discharging individuals or classes of individuals from the selective draft, which shall be made under the rules and regulations aforesaid, and shall also provide for an appeal tribunal.

The Senate struck out all after the enacting clause in the House bill and inserted its bill as one amendment. The entire subject matter being in conference, it was possible for the conferees to work out the details of the law as we now know it.

SHALLENBERGER AMENDMENT FIRST IN HOUSE BILL.

In view of the approval given to the Shallenberger amendment by the House Committee on Military Affairs and because of the favorable action taken by the House and the Senate, the War Department was, by that time, fully alive to the merits of his proposal. I have no doubt but that the Provost Marshal General assisted the conferees in working out the details of the last half of section 4 of the selective-draft act. But to say that any administrative officer conceived this plan is not correct, as I have demonstrated by the testimony taken when the War Department first presented this matter.

Far be it from me to detract in any way from the excellent record made by the executive branch of the Government in the administration of the draft law. The officials of every degree have performed wonders of work, but surely there is glory enough to go around without assigning credit for wise legislation where it does not belong. The country has a right to know, and history should record, that the members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives have not blindly accepted every departmental suggestion, but have acted with courage and intelligence on many notable occasions. If time would permit, I could mention numerous exhibitions of the same kind of statesmanship by other members of the committee, but in view of the wide publicity that has been given to claims of authorship for the local and district board provisions of the selective-draft act, I thought that it was due to the House that the credit for the origination of this legislation be given to one of its most able and distinguished Members, the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. SHALLENBERGER. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to testify to the splendid work that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] performs on the Committee on Military Affairs. But I want at this time to say that the Provost Marshal General, who is also the Judge Advocate General of the United States Army, in my opinion is one of the most efficient officers in the Army of the United States. [Applause.] He has repeatedly appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs and made valuable suggestions to that committee. Almost invariably the committee has been glad to follow his advice and suggestions. During the days preceding the passage of the selective-draft law I know that officer worked from 15 to 18 hours a day in perfecting the rules and regulations that the law provided. He was in communication with every governor of every State in this Union as early as the beginning of April, 1917. The selective-draft law passed this House on April 27. By April 23 he had sent to the governor of each State all the necessary forms and blanks for putting the law into effect. After the selective-draft law was passed, his work became still more onerous, and he performed it in a manner that drew the commendation of everybody in this country whose commendation was worth having. We were particularly fortunate, in my opinion, that we had in such an important administrative office a man of the legal attainments and constructive ability of Gen. Crowder. Ever since then, in trying to work out legislation for the improvement of the selective-draft law and the elimination of possible mistakes, he has been at his desk at all hours, morning, noon, and night. You can find him at his desk in the War Department at 8 o'clock in the morning, and you can find him at his desk in the War Department late into the night of the same day. I believe that an officer of that character is worthy of all the praise that can be bestowed upon him. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I realize, as the House does, that it would be not only impossible but presumptuous for me to try to add anything to the testimony to the character and efficiency of the Provost Marshal General that has been so eloquently expressed by my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. But perhaps the House will indulge me for a moment in pointing out a small but significant incident in the career of Maj. Gen. Crowder, which early gave promise of his great capacity for such a Herculean task as this which he has been called upon to perform, and has performed so ably that he is to-day one of the foremost military figures in the story of this generation. And it showed the temperament, it showed the inclination, it showed the industry, and the always high-spirited purposes of an officer in the United States Army many, many years ago, before anybody but the officer who paid him and his immediate superior had much idea that he wore a uniform at all.

Years ago when Enoch H. Crowder was a junior lieutenant in the United States Army, and that Army was so small, as many of us remember, that it was scattered up and down our country in little one-company posts here and there, largely out on the plains and down in Texas; he, like many other officers of his grade and in his time, found that there was for long intervals precious little for an active-minded military man to do. And while he was stationed at one period in an obscure post in the interior of Texas he found there by chance some old Government prints which told the story, in the old-fashioned, "pub. doc." style of the day, of the draft that had been invoked during the Civil War. It interested him, first, for its historical value and, next, because, as a military man, he was never losing any opportunity to prepare himself against the possibilities of the future. Bear in mind that he was then a junior lieutenant in the line, and probably in his most hopeful fancy never expected to reach the great responsibilities of a national character he is now discharging with such signal distinction. He spent days and weeks in the study of the official returns and reports of that old Civil-War draft, and he made up his mind then that sooner or later as this country developed and its military necessities grew correspondingly the time would come when the policy underlying a selective-service act would of necessity be adopted by this Nation.

So years and years ago, years before many men who sit on this floor had become qualified legal voters, this young officer of the Army began to develop his idea of a national policy upon which a selective-service act would be based.

He studied the matter of conscriptive military service from time to time during all the intervening period, and I dare say it may be stated with all fairness and due regard for the truth that he was perhaps the only man in the United States who was undertaking such a systematic and methodical study of that subject during that time. He continued it up to the recent day when, all at once, to the benefit of a great Nation, which during all its 140 years nearly had relied upon the volunteering system as its means of national defense, he was through his industry and foresight prepared to come forward in the emergency with the groundwork of the great fundamental system of what we know to-day as the selective-service law. And it might also be said, if it were not a somewhat fantastic paraphrasing of the myths of the classic days gone by, that the selective-service principle and policy, at least, sprang, armed cap-a-pie, from under the helmet of Enoch H. Crowder, just as the poet tells us a great contribution of wisdom personified sprang full-armed from the brain of the master of Olympus. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alaska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SULZER: Insert, page 44, after line 16, the following:

"Provided, That hereafter, so long as the construction and maintenance of 'military and post' roads in Alaska, and of other roads, bridges, and trails in that Territory shall remain under the direction of the Secretary of War, he be authorized to submit such estimates for the consideration of Congress as are, in his judgment, necessary for a proper prosecution of the work."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I realize, of course, that this amendment is subject to a point of order, but I trust the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will not insist upon the point, and for this reason: The War Department has been the agency through which the principal pioneer work of the Government in Alaska has been performed. In the early days of 1898, during the Klondike rush and the rush to the early gold fields of Alaska, the War Department was there as the principal representative of the Government in the maintenance of law and order. It is the agency which has constructed and maintained the telegraph and cable systems of Alaska, that provided communications between the different camps and settlements, and in doing all this splendid work, Mr. Chairman, the War Department has rendered a most notable service to the people of that Territory and to the people of the country, not only in performing their military duties, but in rendering aid and assistance to those who were in a perishing condition, rescuing many out of the cold and snow, in giving of their supplies, in providing medical relief in the hospitals which they constructed and maintained, and in innumerable other ways rendering assistance which could not have been rendered in any other way or by any other agency.

The War Department led the way in the pioneer work throughout Alaska. Its activities have not been confined to a few months of travel and observation during the summer season, for its agents have been on duty at all times, in and out of season, in summer and winter. In their performance of duty the agents of the War Department have paid their toll of life and have undergone unutterable hardships.

When the law was enacted in January, 1905, creating the Alaska Road Commission it was recognized by Congress that the War Department was the proper agency to undertake and carry on the work of building the roads and trails and bridges in the Territory of Alaska; but for some reason of which I am not aware, when the Alaska Road Commission was created there was no provision made in the law authorizing appropriations by Congress for the vigorous prosecution of the work, the law simply authorizing the road commission to use a percentage of the license funds collected in Alaska.

The commission and the War Department have struggled against the most tremendous difficulties in their work of endeavoring to build roads and trails and bridges throughout a Territory 600,000 square miles in extent. They have had tremendous obstacles to overcome, and they have had very limited appropriations to carry on the work which Congress gave them to do. Notwithstanding the fact that there was no provision in the law by which they could obtain appropriations, Congress has continuously, every year since the commission was created, appropriated certain sums of money, notwithstanding the fact that the items were subject to points of order. Some years the point of order was made and some years it was not made. Either in this House or in the Senate these items were put in, and appropriations varying in amount from year to year have been made for over 12 years.

The Alaska Road Commission has constructed over 1,000 miles of wagon road, 650 miles of winter sled road, and over 2,300 miles of trail, and has expended for all purposes a total of $3,969,611.23 to June 30, 1917, of which sum $2,265,000 has been appropriated by Congress and $1,704,611.23 has been provided by the people of Alaska through taxation. The work of the commission has covered all parts of the Territory, from Ketchikan to Nome, from Prince William Sound to points north of the Arctic Circle.

Officials representing many departments of the Government having activities in Alaska have commended the work. There came to my attention only this morning this document entitled "Soil reconnoissance in Alaska, with an estimate of the agricultural possibilities," by Hugh L. Bennett and Thomas D. Rice. On page 177 I find the following comment:

There is some summer travel over the Valdez-Fairbanks Road, but little freight thus far has been handled over this road this season. This road was constructed by the Alaska Road Commission under the direction of officers of the United States Army. The Alaska Road Commission is made up of two line officers and one engineer officer. Col. W. P. Richardson has been president of the commission since its inception. It represents a remarkable piece of work, particularly in view of the obstacles to road construction—the remoteness of the region crossed from points of supply, the large number of swift streams, some of which are dangerous glacial streams that had to be bridged, and the unfavorable road material and poor drainage conditions encountered in many places. There are long stretches of this road, which extends over 400 miles into the interior, that are so good that automobiles are enabled to make a high rate of speed at any time of the year. The writer went from Chitina to Fairbanks over this trail with a small automobile the latter part of August, 1914, under the most unfavorable conditions that have been known since the road was completed. An abnormally heavy rainfall had caused formidable slides, much damage to causeways and bridges, and had brought about a very soggy condition of the roadbed in places where both topography and character of material have militated against good drainage. It is true some exigencies had to be met on this trip; nevertheless good time was made, some two weeks or more having been saved in reaching the interior by this route. Under normal conditions automobiles make the trip easily. During winter mail for the interior is carried over this trail and some freight is distributed along the road and even carried to Fairbanks. The road houses are nearly all stocked with sufficient supplies during winter for the needs of the following summer.

The road commission, cooperating in some instances with local citizens, has constructed a number of good roads in the mining districts, notably in the Fairbanks district. Good wagon and automobile roads run from Fairbanks to Ester, Fox, Dome, Golden City, Olness, Meehan, Cleary City, Chatanika, and other points along the mining creeks. There is a good road from Hot Springs to Eureka. Trails for dog sleighs, which carry considerable freight during the winter, lead in many directions through this region.

With the extension of the mining and agricultural interests to other parts of this region, additional wagon roads will have to be built from time to time.

This tribute is from agents of the Department of Agriculture, and was made in 1914, and of course covers but a small portion of Alaska where work has been performed by the board of road commissioners. It is but fair to say, however, that the Valdez-Fairbanks Road, or what is now called the "Richardson Highway," is the principal military road built by the commission. This great highway, extending from the coast to the interior, has been vastly improved since the above report was written. Automobiles have recently made the trip of 400 miles in 30 hours, running time. I journeyed on this road in the fall of 1916 in a Cadilac automobile, carrying seven passengers and their baggage. There was no particular discomfort, and this trip is one of the most scenic that can be found in the world. Words can not describe or the imagination conceive of the beauties and the grandeur of the scenery that may be viewed from this great highway, which will ever stand as an enduring monument to the patience, courage, and splendid achievements of Brig. Gen. Wilds P. Richardson. And I want to take this opportunity of paying my respects to that officer, who, from the time of the organization of the road commission until a few months ago, acted as chairman of the board. No more able, conscientious, or hard-working officer was ever detailed to the Alaska field by the Federal Government. To use his own language, in his last report to the War Department—

The board, without precedent in the history of the department in the way of organization and methods of accounting, and without adequate funds to work with, at the outset found itself confronted with a problem the magnitude of which was little short of discouraging. It would not be easy to conceive a greater variety of difficulties to overcome from a physical viewpoint in a work of this character, or more vexatious phases of the "human equation" to deal with, than have come before the board in this work.

Gen. Richardson, Alaska's general, and the other Army officers of the board were given active commands with the colors shortly after the United States entered the war, and their experience in Alaska will give them many advantages in fighting the enemy. And in their new work go with them the well-wishes and God-speed of all patriotic Alaskans.

With the departure of Gen. Richardson and his associate officers from Alaska the management of the affairs of the Alaska Road Commission was placed in the hands of men thoroughly familiar with the work, who, acting under the orders of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, are now going forward in an entirely satisfactory manner.

It has been the history of the United States and Canada in the development of the pioneer sections that they must have adequate railroads and wagon roads. Their development has only been commensurate with the road and railroad improvements. First, there must be trails and roads to feed the country adjacent to the navigable streams and waters, then railroads, and, finally, a network of wagon roads over which to haul the tonnage for the railroads.

On the great American plains and in Canada the development was slow until railroads and wagon roads were built. But note how speedily these areas grew once the miner and the farmer had the facilities for getting their products to the market, and to obtain in return the manufactured articles, clothing, and supplies for their families.

Had they not been assisted by the Government in the building of these roads, areas that are thickly populated now would be, as they were for many years, the home of only a few of the more hardy pioneers still struggling for existence, and not a land of well-to-do and happy families.

So it is in Alaska. Great stretches of territory that are now sparsely settled would have prosperous farmers and miners and other residents if they could be furnished a means of getting their products to market and of receiving in return those articles which they would have to have but which they could not produce themselves.

Alaska must have a network of wagon roads to feed the great railroad which the Government is now building in the Territory and to feed the railroads which will be built in the future. But it must have more. It must have roads built and maintained from the rich mining camps to the great navigable waterways over which such a large portion of the freight of the country travels to-day, that the Nation may be enriched by the gold and other metals of which it is so badly in need.

And it is because of these latter roads that it is impracticable to have the road building and the railroad construction carried on under one head, as might be urged by some. The two organizations have two important, separate, and distinct functions to perform. The railroad constructors must furnish the means of transportation to a large area of territory, but the wagon-road builders must aid a vastly greater area. The War Department still seems to be the best agency to carry on this work, both from a military and an economic point of view. The department has gained a wide knowledge of all the intricate conditions to be met in the different parts of the Territory, has developed a splendid organization, and has the best means of obtaining satisfactory results.

The building of adequate roads is, as I have said, of the greatest importance in the development and settlement of Alaska, in placing the resources of the Territory at the disposal of the Nation, and in building up the great volume of trade between the States and Alaska, which, we all fondly anticipate, will continue to grow with rapid strides. Everyone knows that a new country must have roads in order that the settlers may obtain the communication and transportation necessary to conduct their affairs.

Mr. Chairman, it is very gratifying to know that this bill contains an appropriation of $100,000 for roads and trails in Alaska, and that a point of order has not been raised against this item. I appreciate this action on the part of the House, and I know that the people of Alaska appreciate it, and that it will serve a splendid purpose. But the amount is small for a work so great, and I regret the appropriation is not much larger, for the need is very great. However, I realize that the committee has done its best under all the circumstances.

In the past the funds provided were limited, and the fact that the road commission could never be certain that the appropriation would be made has been very unsatisfactory and has greatly handicapped the work. Supplies can not be obtained or crews engaged for the season's work until the appropriation bill is actually passed. This necessitates a delay in starting work, and often the better part of the season is thus lost. Most of the work is done during the months of June, July, August, and September, but in order to make the most of this short season, crews must be started for interior points in April and supplies must be freighted in during the winter months. These supplies must be contracted for during the months of November and December.

A continuing appropriation of $500,000 per annum for a number of years would accomplish much greater results than it has been possible to accomplish under the conditions existing in the past. I trust that some provision having this end in view may be found acceptable.

The demands for roads and trails from all sections of Alaska are most insistent. The pioneers who are seeking out and producing the gold, copper, silver, lead, tungsten, antimony, tin, chrome, and other metals; the farmers who are turning a wilderness into green fields dotted with homes; the fishermen who in many places need better communication in order to handle their product more expeditiously; the transport of the mails, and many other needs all cry out for roads. This work is of a permanent value and every dollar invested by the Government will return many fold.

In administering the public domain in Alaska the Government has pursued a different policy than that which brought about great development in the States. The Government has largely retained title and the local taxing power of the people has been very limited. It has therefore been necessary for the Government to provide the necessary facilities which, under different conditions, might have been provided by local taxation.

Alaskans have been doing everything in their power to aid in winning the war. They subscribed 247 per cent of their quota to the last liberty loan, and they desire nothing that will in any way handicap the great purpose of the Nation at this time, but we must not forget that when our victorious soldier boys return from the war we must provide opportunities for them, and Alaska can be made to offer those opportunities in a splendid manner if adequate provision is made to render the great resources of the Territory available to early and proper development.

The purpose of this amendment, Mr. Chairman, is to relieve the War Department and this commission from the embarrassing situation of having the responsibility of carrying on a great work under an act of Congress while not being able to submit estimates for appropriations to adequately carry on that work, and therefore all this amendment seeks to do is to authorize the Secretary of War to make estimates to Congress for proper appropriations for this work. I therefore earnestly hope that the amendment will be adopted and that the chairman of the committee will not insist upon his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama on the point of order if he desires to be heard.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, there has been some controversy as to whether this appropriation in the Army appropriation bill was not subject to a point of order. When the gentleman from Alaska submitted his amendment, as I understood it, it was to correct that proposition. There has been some objection to the Committee on Military Affairs making appropriations for roads in Alaska. But I do not see any objection to the gentleman's proposition legalizing what we have been doing all along, so I will not press the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Claims for damages to and loss of private property: For payment of claims for damages to and loss of private property incident to the training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army that have accrued, or may hereafter accrue, from time to time, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended: Provided, That settlement of such claims shall be made by the Auditor for the War Department, upon the approval and recommendation of the Secretary of War, where the amount of damages has been ascertained by the War Department, and payment thereof will be accepted by the owners of the property in full satisfaction of such damages, $30,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the pro forma motion in order to say that I have just returned from a visit to the National Soldiers' Home at Hampton Roads, Va., and that while there I met citizens from Newport News and Norfolk, Va., who, when they learned that I was a Member of the House of Representatives, expressed the opinion that this Congress had been "pretty easy" in that it let the Government be "worked" for a fancy figure for the site of the old Jamestown Exposition. They laughed and chaffed and joked over the fact that while that site had been hawked around for $300,000, and had, in fact, been sold at bankruptcy sale for a much less sum than that, it had finally been unloaded onto the Government as a "war necessity" for a cool million of dollars. That sale is still a matter of pleasantry in and around Norfolk, and while but a few of the citizens divided the "swag," all of them, so far as I could learn, seem pleased that the great sum was poured out in that community.

It strikes me that, having "worked" the Government, they should at least be kind enough to refrain from telling Members of Congress how "easy" they were. I was inclined to flare up at the statements made. I reminded those whom I met that the House had refused to pay this price; that our Naval Committee had turned it down; and that we stood by the committee until appeals came down from the Cabinet that the purchase of the Jamestown site at a million dollars was an absolute and immediate war necessity. If my memory serves me correctly, the promoters of the scheme insisted upon $1,200,000, but after one or two losing votes here they generously threw off $200,000 and accepted $1,000,000, which probably was three times too much—certainly one-half too much. It is useless to complain and criticize now, but I have felt that it was my duty to tell the membership how certain citizens of the Chesapeake Bay cities feel about our "liberality." I believe that the Committee on Military Affairs has exercised much diligence in an effort to protect the bill now under consideration, and I beg to assure all of the Members of the House that it behooves them to scan closely all of the appropriation bills, and to be everlastingly on watch for propositions of this kind. The President has called attention to profiteering. It is certain that outrageous and indefensible profiteering is going on all along the line. And here is a fine sample of it. Other localities have given valuable sites to the Government. Pierce County, the most populous county in the district which I have the honor to represent, bonded itself for a debt of $2,000,000 to buy and give to the Government a great tract of 80,000 acres of land for war purposes. The two transactions stand out in vivid contrast. I am sorry that my visit on Memorial Day to that beautiful home for the veterans at Hampton Roads was marred by hearing brag and blow of how the Government had been "stung" for money in these fearful days of war. How can we expect to get at the small profiteers and penny grabbers when such things as the Jamestown deal are pulled off and forced through an unwilling Congress. Here in the House we have stood by and let things like this go through under the guise of war necessities. We must not do it again. It is not too late to cut down these bills. It is time to quit throwing away money like water. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Medical and Hospital Department: For the manufacture and purchase of medical and hospital supplies, including gas masks, motor ambulances, and motorcycles for medical service, their maintenance, repair, and operation, and disinfectants, and the purchase and exchange of typewriting machines for military posts, camps, hospitals, hospital ships, and transports, and supplies required for mosquito destruction in and about the military posts in the Canal Zone: Provided, That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, select types and makes of motor ambulances for the Army and authorize their purchase without regard to the laws prescribing advertisement for proposals for supplies and material for the Army; for the purchase of veterinary supplies and hire of veterinary surgeons; for expenses of medical supply depots; for medical care and treatment not otherwise provided for, including care and subsistence in private hospitals, of officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees of the Army, of applicants for enlistment, and of prisoners of war and other persons in military custody or confinement, when entitled thereto by law, regulation, or contract: Provided, That this shall not apply to officers and enlisted men who are treated in private hospitals or by civilian physicians while on furlough; for the proper care and treatment of epidemic and contagious diseases in the Army or at military posts or stations, including measures to prevent the spread thereof, and the payment of reasonable damages not otherwise provided for, for bedding and clothing injured or destroyed in such prevention; for the pay of male and female nurses, not including the Nurse Corps (female), and of cooks, and other civilians employed for the proper care of sick officers and soldiers, under such regulations fixing their number, qualifications, assignment, pay, and allowances as shall have been or shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War; for the pay of civilian physicians employed to examine physically applicants for enlistment and enlisted men, and to render other professional services from time to time under proper authority; for the pay of other employees of the Medical Department; for the payment of express companies and local transfers employed directly by the Medical Department for the transportation of medical and hospital supplies, including bidders' samples and water for analysis; for supplies for use in teaching the art of cooking to the enlisted force of the Medical Department; for the supply of the Army and Navy Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark.; for advertising, printing, binding, laundry, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses of the Medical Department, $267,408,948.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 51, line 17, at the end of the paragraph insert as a new paragraph the following:

"The Secretary of War may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, provide for the employment of civilian medical service, including care and subsistence in private hospitals, for officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees of the Army, on leave of absence or furlough, or otherwise absent with leave from the status of duty: Provided, That it shall be impossible or impracticable for the Medical Department to furnish the necessary medical treatment and hospital care, and that the disabilities necessitating such service shall have originated in the line of duty."

Mr. DENT. I reserve a point of order on the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is simply to permit the payment by the Government of the cost of treating a soldier on furlough when he is in a private hospital as a result of illness or injury received while on duty. The amendment has the sanction and express approval of the War Department and of the Surgeon General.

On the 6th day of March I introduced the following bill (H. R. 10522):

The Secretary of War may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, reimburse officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees in the Military Establishment for actual disbursements for treatment in private hospitals and services by civilian physicians while on furlough: Provided, That the disability necessitating such treatment or service originated in the service and in line of duty.

The Committee on Military Affairs referred that bill to the War Department, and in the course of time, under date of March 26, the Acting Secretary of War, Mr. Benedict Crowell, reported back to the committee as follows:

I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of House bill 10522, referred to me with the request for any information relating thereto in the possession of the War Department.

Many Surgeons General have in the past frequently urged the equity of the assumption by the Government under some circumstances of medical expenses of officers and soldiers incurred while for the time being in the status of absence with leave from duty.

It is, of course, impossible to see whether our Medical Department will be able to handle efficiently all disabled men. It may be found necessary to accept the services of private hospitals and civilian physicians during the course of the war. If the employment of such private services is placed within the control of the Secretary of War it is assured there will be no unnecessary expense incidental to such service.

I notice, however, that the bill provides for the reimbursement of officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees in the Military Establishment for actual disbursements made by them. It would be preferable were the services paid directly from public funds rather than to have the payment made in the first place by private individuals and claims then made over against public funds.

I therefore recommend the following legislation in place of the bill as submitted.

Then follows the draft of the amendment which I have just offered, and which has been read from the Clerk's desk.

There are a great many cases where extreme hardship results from the present law. A soldier is taken ill in camp. He is not seriously ill at the moment. He applies to his company commander for a furlough. He goes home on furlough. It then develops that he has contracted pneumonia or some other serious illness. He has to go to a private hospital and to incur charges for his medical and hospital care. Under the law, although that illness was incurred in the service and in line of duty, there is no way by which he or his family can be reimbursed by the Government for the expenditures which have been necessitated by his military service. The Surgeon General has repeatedly recommended to the Congress—I have the list of the recommendations in my file here—that it should be possible, under suitable regulations promulgated by the Secretary of War, for these payments to be made. As the law now stands, it is an extremely arduous and, I think, entirely indefensible burden which is imposed upon the soldier and his family to meet these frequently very heavy and burdensome expenditures. I have sought to get a hearing upon this bill from the Committee on Military Affairs, but its time has been very much taken up with the consideration of the appropriation bill. In consultation with the chairman of the committee, he suggested that it might be one way to raise the point for me to propose this exact amendment to this bill. I hope that under the circumstances he will withdraw the point of order and allow the amendment to be retained in the bill.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that the idea that he has is a good one, but I do not believe we ought to handicap the War Department with too much legislation in this bill. That is the only real objection I have to it. I do not know what this will open up, and we ought at least to have a little more information from the War Department and their views upon the subject before we put it into the appropriation bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Will there be an opportunity for me to present this before the Committee on Military Affairs at some reasonably early date?

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman will pursue me, I will promise him that he shall certainly get a hearing within the next week or 10 days.

Mr. ROGERS. My pursuit has been very insistent, but unprofitable up to this time.

Mr. KAHN. The committee have had more important business before them.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman that if he wishes I will undertake to get him a hearing some day next week.

Mr. ROGERS. That is satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 50, line 17, after the word "contract," strike out the proviso down to and including the word "furlough," in line 19.

Mr. ROGERS. Just a word on that amendment, Mr. Chairman. I think it perhaps accomplishes the purpose of the previous amendment which was ruled out on the point of order, and yet is not open to the objection suggested by the chairman of the committee that it is loading down the appropriation bill with new legislation. I think if that proviso as it stands in the bill as reported by the committee were eliminated it would leave with the Secretary of War discretion to permit these payments in worthy cases.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I think the committee ought to be able to go into that question independently. This certainly does keep them from employing physicians and nurses and paying expenses in private hospitals.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Engineer School, Washington, D. C.: Equipment and maintenance of the Engineer School at Washington Barracks, D. C., including purchase and repair of instruments, machinery, implements, models, and materials for the use of the school and for instruction of Engineer troops in their special duties as sappers and miners; for land mining, pontoniering, and signaling; for purchase and binding of professional works and periodicals of recent date treating on military and civil engineering and kindred scientific subjects for the library of the United State Engineer School; for incidental expenses of the school, including chemicals, stationery, hardware, machinery, and boats; for pay of civilian clerks, draftsmen, electricians, mechanics, and laborers; compensation of civilian lecturers and payment of tuition fees of student officers at civil technical institutions; for unforeseen expenses; for travel expenses of officers on journeys approved by the Secretary of War and made for the purpose of instruction: Provided, That the traveling expenses herein provided for shall be in lieu of mileage and other allowances; and to provide means for the theoretical and practical instruction at the Engineer School by the purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, and for other absolutely necessary expenses, $30,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The next item carries an appropriation of $135,000,000 for the engineer equipment of troops, which I presume is to be spent very largely on the other side of the water.

Mr. KAHN. And also a great deal on this side for training material for troops.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am in favor of the item and of all appropriations for the Engineer Department, because I appreciate the value of that department to the Government in time of peace as well as in time of war. But I do not want the opportunity to pass without calling attention to the large appropriations for the Engineer Corps for a variety of purposes, not including the construction and development of waterways in this or in foreign countries. It seems appropriate now to say that while we have a great deal of harsh criticism in the United States of the work of United States Army Engineers on river and harbor improvements—a paltry appropriation of $21,000,000 being carried in this year's appropriation bill—yet we can pass an appropriation of $135,000,000 for the purpose of equipping engineers without a word of dissent. Just what practical results we get from it I am not going to discuss, but I would like to see a little more work done by the engineers of the United States Army in the upbuilding of waterways for our naval and Army craft, as well as for the merchant marine in the United States.

It may be a matter of some information to the House, apart from the Military Affairs Committee, that an engineer regiment is being formed now for the purpose of facilitating the movement of traffic on the canals in France. I happen to know of efforts being made to gather together boatmen and bargemen, men familiar with the movement of vessels on inside waterways and canals in the United States, for immediate service on the waterways of France.

The United States engineers in France evidently realize the value of canals and inland waterways in France, and they are using them to the full, as the French Army has used them to the full. But there are rumors abroad now, some published in the newspapers this morning, of the imminence of the submarine danger along the coast of the United States. We have had three or four reports that captains of large ships, some of them British captains, have seen submarines around the islands of the Caribbean Sea and on their way up the Atlantic coast. Some of them have been reported as approaching the mouth of Chesapeake Bay. Are we prepared for an invasion of this kind?

For many years I have called attention to the military importance, the strategic importance, if you please, of opening up our waterways along the Atlantic seaboard, and particularly of connecting up the two great bays—the Delaware and the Chesapeake—which would also connect the navy yards along the Atlantic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman think that if Congress should get busy and get the intercoastal canal finished up it might be of some use within six months or a year?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think so. I think Congress and the departments ought to get busy. I have been endeavoring to get Congress to get busy for more than 10 years. Congress has made a move in this matter, and there is now in the Engineer's office, unless it has emerged from that office into the Attorney General's office, authority for condemnation proceedings with regard to the particular canal I have been speaking of. But that is not the only reason I wanted to discuss this matter of the engineers. I wanted to call attention to the ease, the great ease, with which enormous appropriations may be made in bulk in both the Army and the Navy bills without objection, while trifling appropriations for river and harbor improvements seem to stir up the entire country to a spirit of revolt and denunciation. Is not this a retrograde policy?

If misfortune should ever come to the country because of the failure of any of the departments or of Congress to act on the advice of those who have been advocating the improvement of the inland waterways for the purpose of defense, the burden will not rest on those who have called attention to the matter. But is it not strange that men will find fault, that newspapers will go into paroxysms of fright and indignation, at the suggestion that two and a half millions be spent to take over an important connecting link in the waterways of the Atlantic coast, when, in one instance, without notice to Congress, the departments can spend $7,000,000 for a picric-acid plant and in another $4,000,000 for another picric-acid plant? I read from the Star, published in Washington:

Contracts have been let by the Ordnance Department for two picric-acid plants, one to cost $7,000,000, and to be located at Brunswick, Ga., and the other to cost about $4,000,000, to be located at Little Rock, Ark.

Can anyone tell us how these things are brought about without comment? Who in this House ever heard of the project of erecting a picric-acid plant to cost $4,000,000 at Little Rock? Have we had any discussion as to the wisdom of appropriating and spending $7,000,000 for a picric-acid plant at Brunswick, Ga.? You have heard something about inside waterways, something about the wisdom of taking over the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, or the utilization of the Cape Cod Canal; but who has informed this House about the expenditure of $7,000,000 for a picric-acid plant at Brunswick, Ga.?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I just want to call to the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that in peace times before we entered the war, in the fiscal year 1918, this item called for an appropriation of $1,174,000. The war has made it necessary to appropriate $135,000,000 for this item.

The Clerk read as follows:

Engineer operations in the field: For expenses incident to military engineer operations in the field, including the purchase of material and a reserve of material for such operations, the construction or rental of storehouses within and outside the District of Columbia, the purchase, operation, maintenance, and repair of horse-drawn and motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and such expenses as are ordinarily provided for under appropriations for "Engineer depots," "Civilian assistants to engineer officers," and "Maps, War Department": Provided, That when to the interest of the Government, funds appropriated under this head may be used for the purchase of options on material for use in engineer operations in the field, $892,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I presume under this paragraph carrying $892,000,000 the engineers would have authority to put boats upon canals in France.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They have the power here specifically to provide motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and in France just now barges are used to a large extent for the purpose of moving troops as well as to carry supplies and move them from one point to another. I think this is highly commendable, because while we are sending horseflesh abroad to carry our men and railroad material and railroad constructors to build railroads, it is entirely consistent that we should apply some of the great resources of the country to the utilization of the waterways of France, if it facilitates the purposes of the war. But suppose for a moment that the seat of action should be removed from France and transferred to the United States. Suppose there is some truth in the suggestion that submarines are hovering along the Atlantic seaboard. Suppose it is possible or probable that some new Deutschland may enter the port of Baltimore, as the original Deutschland did a couple of years ago, and our waterways in the United States are not ready to transport our troops or to transport our supplies from point to point. Suppose, having built up the waterways of France and helped to improve those of England with the resources of the United States, it should be found when the war develops upon our own frontier that we are unable to take advantage of our waterways because we have persisted in neglecting them.

It may be that military experts know about this subject more than I do; it may be that some of them have thought this thing over carefully and are thoroughly well prepared to meet the question, but I call your attention to the fact that some years ago when we sought to have the Secretary of the Navy send a few small craft through one of the canals from one navy yard to another along the Atlantic coast he was unable to do so because there was not sufficient depth of water to accommodate the boats. He sent them out into the open sea and they were driven by storm, and great damage occurred to the property of the United States; if I am not mistaken some lives were lost. On one occasion, a little more recent, we undertook to have some vessels of the Navy enter one of the ports of the United States up yonder in New England, but those battleships could not approach nearer than 7 miles of that city. I recall, too, that when the Secretary of the Navy came to a great convention in the cities of Albany and Troy, several years ago, we undertook to have one of the small vessels, one of the smallest of the torpedo boats, sent up the Hudson River to dock at the city of Albany. She did, and when she docked there she docked so successfully that upon the arrival of the Secretary of the Navy she had settled in the mud and was unable to move stem or stern. It might have been necessary for that small boat to pass through the Erie Canal into the Great Lakes. It may be that the day will come when vessels will have to be passed from the Great Lakes to the ocean.

The railroad control board is undertaking to meet the Erie Canal situation by putting barges on to carry grain from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, and the Shipping Board is putting on some barges to brave the open sea in times of stress. They are making a start, but I suggest that in the event of war upon our own shores we would have to speed up on our inland waterways or we would not be prepared for such an emergency.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rose just to cast my eye about to see if the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, is present. If he is not present, the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will have to go unanswered. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance service: For the current expenses of the Ordnance Department in connection with purchasing, receiving, storing, and issuing ordnance and ordnance stores, comprising police and office duties, rents, tolls, fuel, light, water, and advertising, stationery, typewriters, and adding machines, including their exchange, and office furniture, tools, and instruments of service; for incidental expenses of the Ordnance Service and those attending practical trials and tests of ordnance, small arms, and other ordnance stores; for publications for libraries of the Ordnance Department, including the Ordnance Office; subscriptions to periodicals, which may be paid for in advance; and payment for mechanical labor in the office of the Chief of Ordnance; and for purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, $30,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It will probably be remembered that when the regular minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], was last in attendance upon the House, he made a few remarks with reference to war preparations, and among other things expressed the hope and the confidence that American genius would before this war closed invent something that might very materially assist in turning the course of it toward victory for this country and our allies. I have had occasion recently to take note of two inventions the nature of which I do not care to go into at this time, although I do not know that it is kept especially secret, but which are such that I believe when they come into general use in our armies will give a great advantage to the side that has the opportunity of using them. Possibly they may go further. Their effect may be revolutionary. My understanding is that the War Department has so far approved these inventions that it has made what might be called a trial order in connection with them. I think that the War Department might go further in this respect and very much further with reference to the matter of promising inventions in general. I presume that I, as much as any other man, have objected to, and indeed at times criticized, the expenditures where I thought there was likely to be some waste and an unnecessary use of the public funds, not only in connection with matters that were not directly connected with the war, but also with some that were in fact directly connected with the war. But I want to say now, and I believe that I express the opinion of every Member of the House, and if not I shall be glad to have any who takes the contrary view express himself, that I think the department ought not to hesitate in the least about spending money for the trial of these new inventions. It may be that after putting many thousand dollars into these new inventions to which I have referred an actual trial in the field may possibly show that they are no improvement over what we already have.

But if the order is not made larger than what they have given the contract at this time it will not be possible to make a sufficient amount to have any appreciable effect on the great conflict before some time next year. I want to say for my part, as I believe for the great majority of the House, that I think no one would object to a million dollars being used in the trial of promising inventions. I have had some occasion to bring matters of this kind to the attention of the various boards, and I have regretted to see a disposition, perhaps inspired by the fact they might think they would be criticized in case the inventions turned out to be failures, a disposition to be somewhat niggardly in making a trial of inventions which seemed to be very promising and which the boards to whom they were submitted considered likely to be of great use and advantage. The present situation on the western front at this time indicates that the lack of success on the part of the allies and the almost interrupted success of the enemy in recent months is largely due to the fact that in a scientific way, in an inventive way, Germany has always been somewhat ahead of the allies. I think that has been the case with reference to flying machines. It has been the case as to various devices which have been used with great effect in this war, and it is probably the case with reference to gases which have been used by the Germans with such deadly effect and at times with such dreadful effect in turning the tide of victory in their favor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. May I have one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I bring this matter up at this time in the hope that all the officers of the department who are following any avenue of promising investigation may take a broader view with reference to the expenditures in that direction. I do not believe that there is any necessity for caution in that respect, and I do not believe that money can be considered as wasted even if it should turn out that some of the things that are being tried should not prove as effective as we might wish. There has always been, I think, somewhat of a tendency on the part of our Regular Army officers, and indeed those in the Navy, to view with skepticism new inventions which might come under their notice. It was the case in the Civil War, and I think it has been somewhat the case at this time, but I hope they will not be deterred in any way by the fact that Congress has been at times critical as to how it is spent, but, on the contrary, will use every dollar that is needed, if it be millions, to test the work of every invention that shows any promise of being of any help in this great conflict. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance stores, ammunition: Manufacture and purchase of ammunition for small arms and for hand use for reserve supply, ammunition for burials at the National Soldiers' Home in Washington, D. C., ammunition for firing the morning and evening gun at military posts prescribed by General Orders No. 70, Headquarters of the Army, dated July 23, 1867, and at National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and its several branches, including National Soldiers' Home at Washington,

D. C., and soldiers' and sailors' State homes, $390,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized to enter into contracts, or otherwise incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned in this item not to exceed $706,486,091, in addition to the appropriation herein and heretofore made.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Under this item in the bill I believe hand grenades are purchased. I think I owe it to the House to make an explanation, not of an error that I made in a previous talk to the House, but of a claim made by the Ordnance Department that was thought to be well founded at that time, which has not turned out to be correct. As I brought to the attention of the House the original claim, I think it is due the House to present the facts as they are in regard to the hand grenades.

As you know, the Mills grenade was used by Great Britain very successfully, but it was very dangerous to the men training with it and a great many lives were lost. So when we came to develop the hand grenade very properly we attempted to get as good a grenade and at the same time not have it so dangerous. This device was arranged on this grenade by which in addition to pulling the safety pin and releasing the lever, which had to be done in the case of the Mills grenade, there must also be a sidewise motion. After the safety pin was drawn, in addition to releasing the hand from the lever, which was all that needed to be done in the Mills grenade, there must be a sidewise motion bringing it around to one side in order to arm the grenade. In that way it was made safe for the man throwing it, but by the same token it was also made safe for the other fellow. It was found in actual practice that it was too safe, and the long and short of it is it has been discarded. They had already made several millions, probably two or three millions, of these Bouchon assemblies, but it is not all wasted, because they are able to saw off this handle and put on a new handle. All that is wasted is the labor of sawing off the old handle and the time and material used in making a new handle. This done we have a grenade just exactly as good and exactly as dangerous both to friend and foe as the Mills grenade. So we are back to just where we began in respect to hand grenades.

Now, we are developing another grenade, which I wish to show the House. It is the Wales grenade, that we hope is going to be superior to anything that has ever been developed. Grenades heretofore have been time-fuse arrangements. The one I hold in my hand is a time-fuse grenade, and the Mills grenade is also. After the lever has been released in that way [illustrating] the fulminate is fired, and 4½ seconds afterwards the grenade explodes. If you drop it where you are, it explodes in 4½ seconds, just the same as if it had been passed over to the enemy. In fact, grenades are all dangerous if they are any good. A man can not throw one far enough to get out of the way himself. In other words, he is in the danger zone himself as far as he can throw it if he is in the open where it might hit him.

We have been trying to invent an impact grenade, which has certain distinct advantages, and we think we have it in the Wales grenade. It has a double safety device. The safety pin must be withdrawn before it is dangerous at all. After that this chain must be drawn, and it has a pull about the same as a rifle-trigger pull—about a 6-pound pull. Taking the button between the fingers, the grenade is thrown like a baseball, holding on to the button. As the grenade leaves the hand it pulls the chain out, and when the chain is pulled out of the grenade the next thing it hits it explodes on impact. This is a very good feature in hand grenades, because it is very difficult to time the grenades accurately enough to make them explode at the right time.

This one explodes at the right time, because that is just when it hits, or it can be made to explode a certain time after the impact. In addition to the safety pin, which I have now removed, this chain must be removed. It is usually withdrawn in throwing, but I shall pull it out here. It is now what is called "armed," and if there were an explosive charge in the grenade it would explode when it strikes anything. If I should throw it just as far as I could, it would fire when it landed. If I dropped it at my feet, it would fire. [Mr. TILSON dropped the grenade into an empty wastebasket in front of the Speaker's desk, and the detonator fired with a loud report.] [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired. [Laughter and applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Small-arms target practice: For manufacture and purchase of ammunition, targets, and other accessories for small-arms, hand, and machine-gun target practice and instruction; marksmen's medals, prize arms, and insignia for all arms of the service; and ammunition, targets, target materials, and other accessories which may be issued for small-arms target practice and instruction at the educational institutions and State soldiers' and sailors' orphans' homes to which issues of small arms are lawfully made, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, $75,200,000; Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned in this item not to exceed $84,073,725, in addition to the appropriation herein and heretofore made.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Overman bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Overman bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I make a similar request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California submits a similar request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes a similar request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I will state for the benefit of the committee that when we go back into the House I propose to ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken upon this bill may have the privilege of extending their remarks within a certain period.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, the bill H. R. 12281, which we are now considering, the purpose of which is to appropriate funds for the maintenance of the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, carries a direct appropriation of $9,583,349,808.61 and an additional authorization of $2,458,332,801, making a total of $12,041,682,609.61, the largest amount of money ever appropriated or authorized in a single bill in any legislative body on earth. The sum is so large that it almost staggers the imagination of man. But our expenditures must be measured by our responsibilities at the present time, which are the heaviest, the most extensive, and the greatest ever assumed by any Nation from the dawn of civilization to the present hour. They are of such magnitude that the mind of man is not capable of fathoming their depths, measuring their height, or conceiving their extensiveness. But great as they are, they must be met and they will be met, for should we fail to meet and properly discharge them we would through such failure surrender the principles upon which our civic institution was founded and for which we live as a Nation—the principles for which our Puritan fathers said good-by to an oppressed people and braved the dangers of an unfathomed sea and an unexplored wilderness that those principles might be permitted to run their course and develop their virtues in the lives and the affairs of men.

Those principles for which our Revolutionary fathers defied the mother country and offered their fortunes, their blood, and their lives that they might be crystallized into the form of organized government for the protection, the benefits, and the blessings of their posterity and the generations to come after them, and should we of this day and generation fail to demonstrate the zeal and offer up the sacrifices demonstrated and offered up by our Puritan and Revolutionary fathers in the protection and for the perpetuity of those principles, the principles of religious and civil liberty, we would not be worthy to call them our fathers, but would, in our humiliation, be forced to hang our heads in shame amid the tombs where sleep their ashes. But we will not suffer humiliation or subject our posterity to the evil consequences that would follow our failure. But in a spirit of unanimity and by force of combined effort we will meet and discharge every responsibility that confronts us or may hereafter confront us in the prosecution and proper settlement of this war. For only its vigorous prosecution and proper settlement will insure our safety as a Nation and our peace in the future, and the more effort we exert, if exerted effectively, the sooner we will win, and with less sacrifice of life than would be required by a long-continued war of less vigor.

I do not mean by that assertion that we will win immediately with all the effort of which we are capable. I have realized from the beginning that it would require both time and effort to win this war, and have so stated both on this floor and elsewhere, but I do contend, as I have from the day that we entered the war, that we should prosecute it in the most vigorous manner regardless of the present cost, for any effort to economize at this time on necessary expenditures would be false economy and result in extravagance, or have the effect of extravagance in the end.

There will, of course, be some extravagance and some waste of money in building up a great institution like our Military Establishment, especially when constructed as rapidly as it has been constructed and with such proportions as it contains, but considering as a whole the work which has been done in a little more than one year we are forced to regard the success of the movement as almost immeasurable.

The building up of our Military Establishment from what it was at the beginning of the war to what it is to-day would be like entering upon an unexplored continent in the wilds with nothing to start with but its natural undeveloped resources, and converting it into a land of modern cities and manufacturing establishments of every character within a period of one year.

This result has not been accomplished without mistakes or without duplication in some instances and omissions resulting in great disadvantage in others. But, as I have previously said, that could only be expected in so rapid a growth of so great an institution.

I for one did not believe when we started on this great program that there would not be mistakes, but, quite to the contrary, I expected mistakes to be made, but did all in my power in my humble and feeble way to safeguard against mistakes as much as it was possible to do so; and I will say in passing that I have observed that some who were loudest in the expression of their belief, when the war first started, that our military men were infallible, and loudest in their condemnation of Members of Congress, and especially members of the Military Committee who endeavored to guard against mistakes, have since been loudest in their criticism of mistakes, both real and imaginary, on the part of both the administration and the Military Establishment; and I am frank to say, Mr. Chairman, that that sort of conduct always makes me tired. I have no patience with an extremist who blows first hot and then cold in their judgment of their fellow men.

We should weigh the virtues and achievements of men along with their shortcomings and their failures, and if we pass judgment upon the progress of the administration and the Military Establishment in that manner we must concede that their success in preparing for the prosecution of this war has exceeded the highest hopes of even the most optimistic.

Mr. Chairman, much criticism has been indulged in during this debate with regard to the Aviation Section of the Army. Some of it is probably well founded, but much of it wholly without foundation.

About 10 months ago we provided the appropriation to increase this branch of the service. There are business men here who have built up business organizations from the ground and who know something about the time that is required to build up a private institution that does not compare in any way in size with this great institution. First, we started on such a large scale as compared with what we had ever figured on before that it almost staggered the country, and I think, and have thought from the beginning, that the task which those in charge mapped out for their first year was impossible, and this was probably one of their greatest mistakes, as their failure to accomplish it resulted in disappointment and disappointment brought criticism. They had first to find the men who could figure out the plans for this organization. Then they had to find the factories throughout the country that could manufacture the different parts. That could not be done in a day. It took time. After the different factories were located it had to be decided what parts should be manufactured by one and what should be manufactured by another.

All that took time, and then the material with which to manufacture airplanes had to be procured, most of which had to be taken in its raw state from the forests and the mines. I know that mistakes have been made. But would not mistakes have been made in a private institution of the same size? Therefore I think it is unfair to brand the whole proposition as a fraud, as some people seem to try to do because mistakes have been made in building up this institution which has come up like a mushroom almost overnight. As I say, of course mistakes have been made, because this institution was built up by men, and the man who would contend that mistakes should not have been made would also have to contend that human beings have reached a state of perfection where mistakes are impossible, and if I should contend that we have reached a state of that kind, the man who finds the most fault would be the first to take issue with me. We should not become spasmodic in these days, although you know the American mind is subject to that. First the American people as a class are indifferent on great problems, and our indifference oftentimes causes unnecessary delay. Our indifference toward preparation for the proper defense of our country caused us to enter into this war wholly unprepared. Then our next chief characteristic is our spasmodic tendencies after we become aroused. After the first spasm has passed we then settle down to a sane business determination to perform the duty before us, and that is the plane upon which we are standing to-day. These mistakes are being corrected by the men who have made them. I have seen no evidence of graft. If there is a man anywhere in or connected with the Military Establishment who has indulged in graft of any character he should receive the severest punishment; but the man who has honestly made a mistake should not be branded as some of these men have been branded by some of the papers and some of the people throughout the country. This great organization has probably expanded faster than any other organization that has ever been built up in this country under the Government or under private control. It was all an experiment. There were only a handful of men who knew anything about the service, and in view of that fact, together with the magnitude of the responsibility that was laid upon their shoulders, it is a wonder that even greater mistakes were not made than have been made. I have no objection, and I know that the honest men who are charged with mistakes have no objection, to an honest, unbiased investigation, and because of the criticism that has been heralded throughout the country I think it is due them and due the country that a fair, impartial investigation be made, so that men who have not grafted may be exonerated; and if there be any who have grafted the punishment should be meted out to them that they deserve. But the investigation should be conducted in a spirit of fairness, with only one purpose in view, and that should be for the betterment of conditions in the service and for the meting out of justice to everyone concerned. Probably all branches of the service have made mistakes, and you know as a rule we hear more about the mistakes of men than we do about their achievements or the good things they do, but if we weigh the success and the achievements of the Military Establishments along with its mistakes and failures the latter will fade into insignificance.

I can not refer, in my limited time, to the many shining achievements of the Military Establishments since the war began, but I hope that I may have the time to refer briefly to a few of them. First, it has builded an Army, and, thanks be to God, an Army of men and not of children, that surpasses in size and efficiency the highest demands made by the critics of the administration when the task was first begun. It has built up its technical units with men of the highest skill in their respective trades, which adds untold strength and efficiency to the whole establishment, and it has converted the Medical Department, which was small at the beginning of the war, into one of the greatest institutions of its kind that the world has ever seen.

The country owes a debt of gratitude to Gen. Gorgas and the skilled and patriotic men who have labored with him in the splendid performance of that great task, and I may say in passing that no other branch of the Military Establishment appeals so much to the American people as does the Medical Department, which cares for and administers to our soldier boys—God bless them—when sick and wounded, and for that reason no other department finds so firm a place in the hearts of the people.

There is one other branch of the service in particular, the success of which I wish to refer to briefly, and that is the small-arms division of the Ordnance Department, over which we have just passed. The country is under obligations to that branch of the service for the magnificent work which it has done. The success of this branch of the service is a splendid illustration of the work of a man who is familiar with what he is doing. When the small-arms division took hold of its task at the opening of this war, under the management of Col. John T. Thompson, a man of practical experience, it had, so to speak, a broomstick to start with, but that department has attracted the attention of the press from one side of the country to the other.

I read from the editorial column of the Philadelphia Inquirer of March 11, 1918, the following:

One of the heads of the bureaus in Washington who will have no trouble in getting along famously with March is the chief of the small-arms division of the Ordnance Department, Col. John T. Thompson. This hustling expert left the Army a number of years ago to accept an offer from the Remington Rifle Co. He built the mammoth plant at Bridgeport, Conn., where the bulk of the guns made in this country for the British, French, and Russian Governments were turned out. Thompson returned to the Army when America entered the war, and is now smashing records for his own Government. Under his direction the Army is now getting rifles at the rate of 13,000 a day. This is a world record. According to War Department estimates, there are now more than a million and a quarter Springfield and modified Enfield rifles on hand. Consequently the Washington Government will have to direct Col. Thompson's energies to some other channel, or the Army will be buried under an avalanche of small arms.

And the Louisville Courier-Journal of March 26 said editorially:

PLENTY OF RIFLES.

When the German legions were pouring into France, a horde armed and equipped as men never before had been armed and equipped, the vanguard of an army of 12,000,000, according to figures which have been accepted as credible, young Englishmen were drilling with wooden guns.

When the war had been in progress more than three years, and when America had been drawn into the maelstrom, American recruits, some of them, began drilling with broomsticks.

* * * * * * *

The belaborers of Gen. Crozier and Col. Thompson, of the Ordnance Department, a short time ago, had their fling, and enjoyed it a great deal, but apparently there was no real cause for the perturbation about the inadequacy of the department; no reason for introducing the term "Crozierism" into the vocabulary of opprobrious terms. The Army and Navy Journal, in an article indorsing the type of rifle now being manufactured for the American troops, credits Col. Thompson, chief of the small-arms division of the Ordnance Department, "more than anyone else" with what it terms "one of the greatest accomplishments of the war, and perhaps the greatest single contribution we have made so far to the cause of the allies."

From broomsticks in May, 1917, to modified Enfields at the rate of 50,000 a week in March, 1918, with a larger developed manufacturing capacity, in a country whose firearms manufacturers outside of the Government arsenals made nothing but sporting rifles in 1914, is a record of which no American need be ashamed; an achievement which Col. Roosevelt, secretly and silently at least, must regard as "corking."

Also, the Arms and the Man of March 30 said in speaking of Col. Thompson:

He served in the ordnance branch in many capacities, including that of chief ordnance officer of the United States forces at Tampa, Fla., and that of instructor of ordnance and gunnery at West Point.

At the close of the Spanish War his work brought him in closer touch with small-arms problems, and he played an important part in the development of the Springfield rifle, model 1903, as well as in the development of the Army automatic pistol.

At the close of eight years of duty at the Springfield and Rock Island Arsenals he was detailed as senior assistant to the Chief of Ordnance, where among other duties there fell to him the task of supervising the methods of administration of ordnance establishments. During this service he prepared, at the request of the Chief of Ordnance, a paper on the "Art of Designing and Constructing Small Arms." This paper was presented before the International Engineering Congress in 1904. He was also selected to prepare the article on American small arms for the tenth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. For a considerable time he served as a member of the executive committee of the National Rifle Association.

Following his retirement from active duty and before his return to Army service at the outbreak of the war with Germany, Col. Thompson was general ordnance engineer of the Remington Arms U. M. C. Co., and in that capacity supervised the construction of the new rifle plant at Bridgeport, Conn. Following this he was consulting engineer of the Remington Arms Co. of Delaware, Eddystone, Pa., and here he was of great assistance in increasing the facilities of that plant in order to carry out the enormous demands of Great Britain for the Enfield rifle, model of 1914. When this country declared war on Germany Col. Thompson was called into active service and was assigned to the task of redesigning and modifying the British Enfield, for which his wide experience and special training in rifle production has fitted him. This service resulted in making available several rifle plants which had been making this rifle for the British Government to carry out the extensive production program for the U. S. rifle, model of 1917 (modified Enfield), which is now so successfully being met. To Col. Thompson must go the larger part of the credit for the world-record production of the modified Enfield and for its general excellence.

And another prominent paper recently said:

The one redeeming light in the whole ordnance business is the production of rifles and cartridges—the best in the world—away ahead of time and in such quantities that manufacturing is now being checked, to release skilled labor for other pressing war needs. To Col. John T. Thompson, who quietly achieved the whole thing, the whole country, no less than the Government, owes a debt of everlasting appreciation and gratitude.

Mr. Chairman, we are proud of the condition that the small-arms division has put itself in, such a condition that it could even discontinue the manufacture of the rifle as a whole for the manufacture of repair parts that will be used in repairing the guns that are put out of commission by use on the battle field.

Now, of course, we did not have experienced men like Col. Thompson for every task to be performed, and therefore the same success and the same showing could not be expected. But while we criticize mistakes that have been made, I feel that it is only fair to call attention to remarkable showing that have also been made. You know, we are rather given to magnifying the mistakes and overlooking the achievements of men. But I contend that if it is right to criticize where criticism is due, it is also right to give praise where praise is due, and I am submitting these observations in a spirit of fairness to the man who has performed his duty and performed it well. So much for that.

Now, in the last hours of the consideration of this bill, I want to refer briefly to the splendid and nonpartisan spirit that has manifested itself in the committee in the preparation of this bill, and that is now manifesting itself in the House during its consideration. I want to say, first, for the minority, that at no time in the preparation of this bill have the minority members even shown a shadow of political play or an effort to take political advantage of any kind whatsoever. [Applause.] We have met our tasks, not as Democrats or Republicans, but as American citizens, performing a duty laid upon us, not by our respective political parties, but by our country, that is involved in the greatest war of all time. [Applause.] And I am proud to see the same spirit asserting itself in the action of the citizenry throughout the country. There are criticisms sometimes, no doubt, that are not justified, but I believe that the American people as a whole are thinking less of politics to-day than ever before in the history of the Republic, and that should be their frame of mind until this conflict is ended. Because this is not a political war; it is the war of the Nation, and it can only be won by the people of the Nation in one united effort.

The committee has studied the estimates submitted by the War Department, and it has been the intention and the determination of the committee to give to the War Department every facility necessary to the proper prosecution of the war. Some estimates may seem extravagant, but at the best it was only a guess.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. I ask unanimous consent to continue for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FIELDS. We could not expect the executive officers to submit accurate estimates as to what they would need on many of the items in the next fiscal year, because time can only tell what the needs may be. If the war goes on, probably the next estimate will stagger the imagination of the American people. But whatever may come or whatever estimates may be submitted the Committee on Military Affairs of the House stands ready, on both sides of the aisle, to support the President and the War Department in the prosecution of this war to a successful conclusion. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Automatic machine rifles: For the purchase, manufacture, test, repair, and maintenance of automatic machine rifles, or other automatic or semiautomatic guns, including their mounts, sights, and equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture, $237,144,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized to enter into contracts, or otherwise incur obligations, for the purposes above mentioned in this item not to exceed $337,726,000, in addition to the appropriation herein and heretofore made.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, under this item of "purchase of machine guns" I wish to ask the indulgence of the committee for a very few minutes while I say a few words about machine-gun production.

I hold in my hand the so-called light Browning gun. I present it because comparatively few people realize that it is more a glorified rifle than a machine gun. I place beside it, in order to show the difference, a machine gun known as the Marlin aircraft gun, which is used in the airplane as a fusilage gun. We have given orders for a number of thousands of these, and they are in full production, so that they are coming in just as rapidly as we shall need them. There is no difficulty in securing all the Marlin aircraft guns we need, and of all the Lewis guns we need. Both are in full production and are coming right along.

Now, just a word as to what "production" means. So much has been said, founded on so little knowledge in regard to what "production" means, and about when an article is "in production," that I think an explanation is timely. We have even heard some talk of the "peak of production," seemingly without any idea of what "production" means. If you make one gun, that is production in a sense. You have made one. Our grandfathers would procure a gun barrel and then go to another man and get it "stocked." That is the way guns were made in those days. Our guns now are made by machinery. When they are made in large quantities they must be made by machinery, and in order to produce them in large quantities it is necessary to have the necessary machinery and the necessary tools. For certain operations it is necessary to have a large number of tools, because one operation may be performed very rapidly, and another operation, equally important and which must be done on each gun just the same as the other, can be done only very slowly. Therefore, in order to produce the guns at a certain given rate you must have greater preparation for doing those operations that take a long time than for those operations which take only a short time.

It is just as if you had a flow of water through a pipe of a certain size, where the flow is very slow; the pipe will admit only so much water. If you wish to enlarge the stream and build part of the pipe ten times as big, but leave the diameter of the pipe elsewhere just the same as before, you leave it at the original capacity; you will get no larger flow than through the original small pipe.

The smallest place is sometimes called the "neck of the bottle." It is the slowest point of production. In order to enlarge the production it is necessary to produce more tools, jigs, dies, and other essentials of manufacture. It may then be found that at another point is the "neck of the bottle," and so on until it is found out exactly the number of machines, tools, and other appliances of all kinds necessary for an even flow and a maximum amount of production from each operation. That is what is called "the peak of production."

Now, as to the Browning gun, neither the light nor the heavy gun has reached anything like the peak of production. Both of them are being put into production from the manufacturer's standpoint. The light Browning gun is much further advanced than the heavy Browning gun. Both are now being made by machinery; not full production yet, understand. It is necessary to tool up a great many departments and for many operations in order to have them come through rapidly. We are trying to find out where the "neck of the bottle" is, in regard to the manufacture of light and heavy Browning guns, and are enlarging it from day to day. We are hopeful that we are going to have by the end of the year a full maximum stream of production coming in. We are hopeful that we will be able even before the end of this year to equip some of the divisions in Europe with the light Browning, those that now have to be equipped with a foreign type of gun, which is a great disadvantage, because it does not shoot American ammunition. Along with the shoulder rifle that shoots American ammunition they must use a machine gun that uses at present a different ammunition.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would it be an advantage to assert the superiority of the Browning gun over the Lewis gun? The Lewis gun, I understand, is in production now.

Mr. TILSON. It is entirely different from the Lewis gun. The Lewis gun weighs about 26 pounds and is a portable gun, but you can not run and fight with it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the weight of that other gun?

Mr. TILSON. It is 15 pounds 8 ounces empty. It is a great gun for attack. It is something like a glorified rifle, as I said at the beginning, and it has this additional advantage, that it is not only automatic but semiautomatic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two minutes more.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. TILSON. I will try not to use it all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. How many shots will it fire?

Mr. TILSON. This fires 20 shots from this magazine. A larger magazine can be made to hold 40, but that makes more weight, and there is a disadvantage in that. This shoots 20 shots. It is not only automatic but semiautomatic.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Before you leave that magazine proposition, as I understand it, the soldier carries with him a certain number of those shot?

Mr. TILSON. The magazine?

Mr. TOWNER. Not the magazine itself, but the cartridges to put in the magazine. That is correct, is it?

Mr. TILSON. That is correct.

Mr. TOWNER. Now, can you explain to us how much of a motion and how long it takes to take out the expended cartridges and put in the new ones?

Mr. TILSON. The expended cartridges are gone. The shell comes out of this hole here [indicating], and the bullet goes out the muzzle of the gun. It is a simple matter to slip the clips right into the magazine five cartridges at a time. Besides, they carry extra magazines.

Let me explain the automatic and semiautomatic features. The machine is made full automatic by just changing a lever here; then by pulling the trigger and keeping on pulling every shot in it will go. Now, as to the semiautomatic, which is advantageous for certain kinds of service, you have to pull the trigger each time, making the motion indicated after you get the aim. So that the gun may be aimed a little more carefully; and as the expending of ammunition is sometimes a very serious matter, it is well to keep the gun, so far as possible, semiautomatic. It can be used quite rapidly in that way.

Mr. DICKINSON. The gun which the gentleman has in his hand is a light Browning gun, is it?

Mr. TILSON. The gun which I have in my hand is a light Browning gun.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman mind pointing that gun toward the other side for a little while? [Laughter.]

Mr. DICKINSON. What is the difference between that and the heavy Browning gun, and how is the heavy Browning gun carried or handled?

Mr. TILSON. The heavy Browning gun is not carried in battle. It weighs up toward 40 pounds, has a water jacket on it to cool it, and is used on a tripod. It is used in defensive positions, called "nests." It is a very rapid and very deadly gun. It can be held very steady on account of its weight and the use of a tripod.

Mr. DICKINSON. Is it carried just like the Lewis gun that we saw on the street last year some time?

Mr. TILSON. It is a little heavier than the Lewis gun. It is of about the same weight as the Vickers gun, takes the same place, and is used for the same purpose as the Vickers gun. When it is used on the ground, it also has a water jacket on it to cool it, because the cooling of a gun is a very important matter; but when it is used in an aeroplane, the water jacket is stripped from it. The heavy Browning gun is the one that is intended to be used for a fusilage gun in the air, with the water jacket stripped off. For the present we use this Marlin gun, which, as I said at the opening of my remarks, is already in production, and which synchronizes very beautifully; that is, it shoots between the propeller blades. The same is true of the heavy Browning gun, whereas no one has ever been able to synchronize the Lewis gun. Therefore the Lewis gun can be used only as a flexible gun on an aeroplane; that is, it is used as a free gun, to shoot in every other direction except between the propeller blades.

Mr. DICKINSON. I understand the gentleman to say that the heavy Browning gun is to be used on the aeroplanes?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; and on the ground. It is used on the aeroplanes without the water jacket.

Mr. DICKINSON. But these machine-gun companies are expected to use the heavy Browning gun?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; they use the heavy Browning and the light Browning.

Mr. DICKINSON. Both?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; these are the two guns they are expected to use.

Mr. DOWELL. Are the heavy Browning guns now being used?

Mr. TILSON. They are only being used for training purposes. The heavy Browning guns are not yet sufficiently in production to justify the arming of divisions in Europe with them.

Mr. DOWELL. Then, as I understand it, the Army has not been equipped either with the light or the heavy Browning gun?

Mr. TILSON. The Army has not.

Mr. DOWELL. What guns are they using?

Mr. TILSON. In France they are using the Hotchkiss gun, chambered for French ammunition, for the heavy work, and they are using the Chauchat gun, which weighs only about 3 pounds more than the light Browning. It is being used for an attacking gun.

Mr. DOWELL. Can the gentleman tell us when the Browning gun will be ready for use by the Army?

Mr. TILSON. That would be only an opinion of mine. The capacity for production is increasing so rapidly, as they increase the special tools, of which I have spoken so often, that I am very hopeful that long before the end of this year they will be able to equip any divisions they please with them, and that by the beginning of the year we will be making all the light and heavy Browning guns that we shall need.

Mr. KAHN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. If I remember correctly, the evidence before the committee was that a great many of the light Brownings have been manufactured and are now in the hands of troops.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. KAHN. And the heavy Browning it was believed was being made at only one factory, and that the work in that factory had been materially delayed, but since then the committee have been informed that the heavy Browning guns are also being manufactured at the Westinghouse Co.'s plant and the Remington Co.'s plant, and that they are now coming into quantity production.

Mr. TILSON. It depends on what the gentleman means by a great number. I could, if necessary, give the gentleman the exact number that have been made of the heavy and light Brownings, but that is not necessary. The most important point is not how many guns we have to-day. The important point is how many guns per day are we going to be able to manufacture in the days to come. As I have stated, we have not enough of these guns as yet to supply the entire Army, and it would be unwise to attempt to supply a small part of the Army at once. In my judgment it will be much wiser to use these guns for training purposes in this country for the present, training the men who are going to use them in the time to come.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I want to ask the gentleman from Connecticut a question. In reply to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] he said that a great many light Browning guns were now in use in France. What is meant by the expression "a great many"? How many does that cover?

Mr. TILSON. My answer to the gentleman from California was that it depends on what is meant by the expression "a great many." It depends on the viewpoint.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Can not the gentleman approximate that?

Mr. TILSON. I certainly could. I could not only approximate it, but I could give the exact number.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is there any reason why the House of Representatives should not know that?

Mr. TILSON. I have not thought it best to go into details as to the number. I will state to the gentleman privately, if he will come to me, and give him all the information I have. I have not felt as a junior member of the committee that it was my function to give out information supposed to be more or less confidential from the War Department and I prefer not to do it.

Mr. KAHN. How long does the gentleman think it will take to furnish every soldier who is called upon to carry a light Browning gun so that each will have one in his possession, at the rate we are making them now?

Mr. TILSON. At the rate they are making them now it would take two or three years, because as I have explained they are not in full production, but at the rate at which they are going to be able to turn them out a few weeks hence is another matter.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Does the gentleman think it proper to state how many machine guns of various kinds have actually been delivered to the American Army?

Mr. DENT. I hardly think so, further than what has been published in the report of the committee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have read a further statement on the part of a member of the committee, and may I ask the gentleman whether that statement is accurate or not?

Mr. DENT. What statement?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I refer to the speech in the RECORD, on page 7776, which purports to give the exact number of machine guns so far delivered.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Whose speech is it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. A member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MADDEN. Was it the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. DENT. I will state that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] has been here practically all the afternoon, but at the present moment he is out, and I think the gentleman ought to answer that question himself.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I asked the question of the chairman of the committee because I read two statements to-day, both apparently authoritative, coming from gentlemen who assume to know, and have no objection to stating publicly the number of machine guns actually delivered. I referred to a statement this morning with regard to the number of troops abroad made in a speech in Chicago in an article which I read. The chairman of the committee did not care to state, and I think quite properly so, what number he believed were abroad. In that paper from which I read this morning it is said that there are 100,000 machine guns actually delivered to the American Army.

Mr. MADDEN. And 1,000,000 troops abroad.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I referred to that this morning, and the members of the committee did not care to state whether that statement was exaggerated or not. I am now referring only to the statement that there were 100,000 machine guns delivered, and evidently the gentleman making it thought it was proper to state how many there were. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] goes with more detail into that matter, and specifies the different types of guns and the total number to be somewhere in the neighborhood of 40,000. Now, I am a little in doubt whether I ought to ask the chairman of the committee which statement he believes.

Mr. DENT. I do not think the gentleman ought to ask.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then I do not.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not mind the gentleman asking me the question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will ask the gentleman from New York then—and I assume, as he has published it, that he believes his statement is correct.

Mr. CALDWELL. On the date that I gave the information I am satisfied that the statement I made was absolutely correct. I will state, in addition to that, since the date of the information was acquired by me it is barely possible that the numbers I have stated have been substantially increased, and how much I do not know. The gentleman referred to in the other branch of the Government made his statement of the date on which he was speaking. He may have been absolutely accurate. I know the date that I took to make my statement from the statement was absolutely correct. I have been careful in all the statements I have made to take the figures that are not new enough to give the enemy any information or that he could benefit from. I have tried to take figures old enough so that we could be reasonably sure that the enemy knew all about them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask the gentleman when and where and from whom he acquired his information?

Mr. CALDWELL. I would rather not state that; but the gentleman may take my word as a Member of the House that I got information which I believed was true and that I felt justified in giving it to the House and to the country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Was it information that was authorized to be made public?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; it was given me with the understanding that I would make it public.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he took into consideration the guns in the possession of the United States Army in France—the machine guns?

Mr. CALDWELL. I think not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman states now that the number mentioned by another gentleman in a public speech may be correct.

Mr. CALDWELL. If he included the number manufactured since the date of my speech and the manufacture of foreign countries that we are using, it is highly possible it is correct.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I read the statement of the gentleman from New York, his statement was made on May 27?

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman will find that I stated that on such a date there had been delivered so many guns.

Mr. LONGWORTH. For instance, the gentleman says:

> We have 2,500 Colt, 2,500 Lewis, 3,400 Hotchkiss, 6,600 Vickers, of the heavy type, used only in the field. * * *
> Of the lighter machine guns, used for aircraft work, 16,000 of the Marlin synchronized type have been delivered up to May 1——

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman will notice that is some days ago. This is the 31st of May.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did the gentleman intend to state, as nearly as he could, the number of machine guns delivered to date? That is what I want to know, because that is the appearance of his speech.

Mr. CALDWELL. The statement is very plain that I was making a statement as of May 1.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; but the gentleman said "we have."

Mr. CALDWELL. The statement itself says May 1.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That refers to only one, the Marlin. The others were all under the statement, "We have 2,500 Colts," and so forth.

Mr. CALDWELL. I did not say "we have now." I said there have been delivered so many.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, no, no.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman will recognize it would be manifestly improper for me to give information that would give aid and comfort to our enemy, and the gentleman will certainly realize that no official statement or semiofficial statement of that character would be presented to this House as of up to the present minute. I have been careful in everything I have stated to this House to take figures of a date old enough so that I would not be giving information to our enemies. That is as plain as I can make it, and I think the rest of the House understands it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree with the gentleman that it is unwise at this time for any public man to state under show of authority that there have been certain numbers of machine guns delivered to the United States Army. I regard it as even more reprehensible to state a number which by any possibility can be an exaggeration of a number actually delivered. This is no time for a public man to make any statement which will tend to lull the people of America into a fancied state of security. [Applause.] It was for that reason only that I called the attention of the House this morning to a public speech delivered by a Member of another body, in which he stated there are a million American soldiers in France to-day; that on December 1 next there would be a number equivalent to the entire British Army; and also made a definite statement as to the number of machine guns actually delivered. I trust that the gentleman to whom I refer did not say that. I trust that he was incorrectly reported.

Mr. DENT. I was going to ask the gentleman whether he is sure that the Senator from Illinois was correctly reported.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I only know what I read in the newspaper, but this I do know that there have been statements——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This I do know, that statements have been repeatedly made by public men who the public at least believe know as to the accuracy of the facts they are stating, and these statements have been, as we all know, on repeated occasions grossly exaggerated, whether purposely so or not, and I repeat that the most indefensible thing to my mind that a public man can do in hours like these is to make statements to the American people which are exaggerated and which tend to make them believe that conditions are brighter than the facts justify.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact that the statement by the War Department that we would have 22,000 aeroplanes by the 1st of July of this year is responsible in part for the feeling among the American people that the program has broken down.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Unquestionably, and that was what I had in mind. That I regard as the worst of all these misstatements. The people were given the right to believe, because it was stated upon the authority of those who were assumed to know, that on the 1st of July we would have 20,000 aeroplanes produced in this country and delivered in France, and it is just such statements as that that I complain of.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. My colleague, were he at home, would find that the statement about our machine guns has been the subject of favorable editorials in almost every county paper in Ohio. I have been there and just came from there, and if the statement is misleading at all, it will certainly create a revision of opinion in due time, because it has been accepted as a statement of fact, and I simply rise to add that statement to the importance of what my colleague is saying. We are building up false hopes among the people and thereby a tremendous revulsion if we can not keep faith with them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree with my colleague entirely. I sincerely trust that the gentleman to whom I have referred has been incorrectly reported. I have great admiration for him and a great liking for him, but if what he actually said is an overestimate, either in respect to the number of American soldiers abroad or the number of machine guns delivered, it amounts, as my colleague says, to encouraging false hopes in the breasts of the American people and at a time in our history when it is most dangerous to encourage such false hopes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I know, of course, that an absolutely accurate statement of the accomplishments of this administration in carrying out the endeavor of the American people to do this thing in a great way is going to sit unpleasantly with a great many people in this country and particularly that branch of the people——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the gentleman is justified in making a statement of that sort on the floor of this House. The attitude of the membership of the House has not been such to justify it, nor has the attitude of the people generally.

Mr. CALDWELL. And the many people to whom I refer are the people who have in season and out of season criticized the administration for what it has done or failed to do, who have one day set a figure that they thought was higher than the administration could reach, and when the administration reached it quickly have raised their "ante" within the next breath and claimed the administration should have done two or three times that much.

Mr. McKENZIE rose.

Mr. CALDWELL. No; I can not yield, I have not the time. When it occurs that this administration can prepare and take over 10, 20, and 100 times as many men and their supplies as anybody in the country or any of our friends or any of our enemies thought we could take over, then they say we are disclosing secrets that ought to be kept under cover, and if somebody makes a statement of fact that tends to create confidence of the American people in our institution that these critics have been trying to destroy, then that man is subjected to criticism here upon the floor of this House.

On the 4th day of last July I was in my home city, Forest Hill, L. I., and at that time I had just received a telegram from my secretary informing me that an inquiry of the War and Navy Departments disclosed we had under arms in defense of this country a little more than a million men. At noon that day I had lunch with a distinguished gentleman, who has been the severest critic of this administration, at which I announced that fact. We were in my home city, where he was the guest of honor, and sitting at a table with me among my friends. He sought to destroy confidence in me by saying to me he did not believe it and asking me how many soldiers I thought we would have in France in a year from that date. I replied a million. He then got up in the company and asked to shake hands with me as an optimist. Thank God, I am an optimist. I have confidence in the administration. I am satisfied that on the 4th day of July of this year we will have a million of the best soldiers in the world, clothed with the best clothing ever prepared by any people for its soldiers, armed with the best guns and shooting the best ammunition, and surrounded by the most moral influences that ever surrounded an army in the history of the world. They will carry our cause to victory regardless of the unfounded criticism hurled at this administration because it happens to be Democratic. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word just to make this statement: I had hoped we could pass this bill this afternoon. It is now 4.30. It is not a partisan measure; it has not been a partisan measure before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, and I am sorry that anything should be injected into this discussion that would make this any sort of an unhappy occasion, because we have all worked together harmoniously, and I hope from now on we will proceed to act in the same way, and we will not have any further trouble about the passage of this bill because I do not believe that there is a single Member of this House who is not willing to vote for this bill after the Committee on Military Affairs, composed of Republicans and Democrats, have carefully gone over everything we need with the War Department and have decided upon the amount that ought to be given. I am sure that if we will but get in a happy humor we can pass this bill to-night and adjourn over until Monday. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pro forma amendment just for the purpose of calling attention to a demonstration and test made not long ago with one of the Browning machine guns. An officer took a belt that held 250 cartridges, displaced some of them by leaving several partly protruded, and also took a soft hammer and pounded three or four out of place, and then took the belt and twisted it around three or four times and laid it upon the ground and started the gun. He said that any other machine gun where the cartridges were not put in place would jam when that place was reached; also that any cartridge that was in any way deformed would cause the gun to jam. This officer, with whom I am very well acquainted, and know precisely what I am talking about, started the gun in operation and it shot 250 times, righting all of those errors as it went along. He made the statement that this was the only gun made to-day that would do that, and when I spoke to him about the comparative efficiency of the gun, he said that if we had a sufficient number so that our men could be well supplied there is no doubt that a good report of it will be made both by the men and the gun. You will permit me to say that much in favor of the program. I have not had any feeling of criticism other than just what was suggested a while ago that I think it is very, very unfortunate to build up a false hope, a promise that we are not able to keep. That is the reason I introduced a moment ago a note that might seem to be adverse.

I agree with my friends that when we are rightly equipped—and you can not do it at once—and our boys are in line, there is one way that this war will end, and that is the right way. By the superior ability of American troops we will end this war. The troops that are now moving away from Berlin, that were promised they could be back home in three months after they started, will certainly go back when they are driven back by the force of the American Army. I do not have any doubt even in this hour of depression, when you read the headlines as to what is going on. I think without doubt we will be able to dispose of more Germans than they will of us, and that will ultimately end the war in our favor. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Arming, equipping, and training the National Guard: To provide for the participation of the whole or any part of the National Guard in encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice and field and coast defense instruction, either independently or in conjunction with any part of the Regular Army, and there may be set aside from the funds apportioned for that purpose and allotted to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia such portion of said funds as may be necessary for the payment, subsistence, transportation, and other proper expenses of such portion of the National Guard of said State, Territory, or the District of Columbia as shall participate in such encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice and field and coast defense instruction; and the officers and enlisted men of such National Guard while so engaged shall be entitled to the same pay, subsistence, and transportation as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades of the Regular Army are or hereafter may be entitled to by law. To provide for camps of instruction for the instruction of officers and enlisted men of the National Guard. Such camps shall be conducted by officers of the Regular Army detailed by the Secretary of War for the purpose, and may be located either within or without the State, Territory, or District of Columbia to which the members of the National Guard designated to attend said camps shall belong. Officers and enlisted men attending such camps shall be entitled to pay and transportation and enlisted men to subsistence in addition at the same rate as for encampments or maneuvers for field and coast defense instruction: Provided, That of this sum so much thereof as may be necessary is authorized to be expended for the payment of transportation of troops of the Regular Army in connection with joint camps of instruction of the National Guard: Provided, That of this sum as much thereof as may be necessary is authorized to be expended for the pay, transportation, and subsistence of officers and enlisted men of the National Guard Reserve as may be authorized by the Secretary of War under the law to attend encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises of the National Guard, $2,473,650.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken an active part in the debate on this bill, because I was anxious to see it expedited as much as possible, but on this provision for the National Guard I want to submit a few observations and call the attention of the House to the fact, with which perhaps you may be familiar, that of our magnificent Army now in the field at home and abroad about one-half million of the best-trained men are the product of the National Guard of the various States. [Applause.] In other words, that under the provisions of the act approved June 3, 1916, providing for the extension and for the federalization of the National Guard the result has been that this Government has found itself furnished with almost one-half million of the best troops that now represent it at home or abroad. It has been shown by the figures of the War Department, much to the surprise of many people, that the death rate and the disease rate is much less in the National Guard than in any other branch of the Army, the National Army having the highest percentage of diseases of different kinds, the Regular Army second, and the National Guard third. And, in fact, the figures are so low in the National Guard that it is a matter of a great deal of favorable comment.

Now, I am not calling attention to this purely out of the desire that many of us have had all these years to see the National Guard a great national force. I think you will be fair enough to say that those of us who have had the welfare of the National Guard at heart have been the first to take up with the National Army and have been the first to further every effort to augment the efficiency and numbers of the Regular Establishment. It is not merely a matter of pride. With me it was the matter of doing the best we could for the only existing volunteer organization which we had prior to the beginning of the war.

There has, however, been a feeling in the country, and shared by many officers in the National Guard, that there has been undue prejudice in regard to the officers of the National Guard. I am not satisfied that that prejudice exists. I am satisfied, however, that one provision in the national-defense act has been used to a greater extent than it was ever intended to be used, and it is another example of the fact that the machinery you once start in motion sometimes, in a general way, becomes so automatic in its workings that it does a great deal of harm. It is impossible, of course, in dealing with millions of men to consult the feelings and desires at all times of the individual. But there must be in institutions of all kinds some laxity and some flexibility, and they should take into consideration the human element in all things.

Section 77 of the national-defense act reads as follows:

SEC. 77. Elimination and disposition of officers.—At any time the moral character, capacity, and general fitness for the service of any National Guard officer may be determined by an efficiency board of three commissioned officers, senior in rank to the officer whose fitness for service shall be under investigation, and if the findings of such board be unfavorable to such officer and be approved by the official authorized to appoint such an officer, he shall be discharged. Commissions of officers of the National Guard may be vacated upon resignation, absence without leave for three months, upon the recommendation of an efficiency board, or pursuant to sentence of a court-martial.

Under the circumstances that was rather an unfortunate wording. I speak of the one word "discharged." Because we have had numerous cases of splendid officers of the National Guard who, by reason of the reorganization of the Army units and the divisions, were compelled to take commands in a service with which they were not familiar. For instance, some of our best Infantry officers suddenly found themselves in command of a Field Artillery regiment. These men, thoroughly drilled, disciplined, and trained in Infantry matters, were sent to some technical school, and because of the fact that they were not able at their age in life to master the higher mathematics, integral calculus, and trigonometry, which are necessary to a thorough knowledge of the Artillery game, what was done? Instead of sending these men back to some other arm of the service or lowering them in rank and giving them a chance in the arm of the service where they really belonged, they were dismissed from the service, to which they had given their best years of study and preparation. They were proud of the fact that they had this training. They hated to go back home. And there was no use for their going back home, because they had been educated in the service and to good advantage. The lives of our young men depend on the good training of our officers, and I am glad to see this thorough training going on, but I do hate to see, under any general machinery put in motion, men not allowed to serve somewhere, but sent to their homes feeling that they are in a measure discredited in their home communities, men who have been willing and able and anxious to go into service and do their duty. I know of cases of this kind, where men have been transferred from Infantry to the Artillery, and have had to come home. They have said, "You can put me into any service in which you wish to enlist me." "You can place me in any rank that you want to give me." One man, a colonel, said, "I will gladly go as a lieutenant or as a captain, or I am willing to enlist in the ranks. I will shoulder a musket and go along with the boys in my organization."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CRAGO. I would like to have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAGO. There were some cases where men had slight physical disqualifications and could not stand the severe tests that were imposed for over-sea duty. What has happened to these men? They have been given 15 or 20 years' training. They have worked for years to acquire a knowledge of military science. Why should they not be assigned to these thousands of positions which have been suddenly created and filled with men who never took any interest whatever in military matters heretofore? These experienced men were sent back home. They would have made efficient men in the Ordnance and in the Quartermaster Departments and in other branches of the service. I doubt the wisdom of sending these men back home after they have given years of their lives to the service. I am deeply concerned about building up a great military establishment filled with highly qualified technical officers, but we need these men, anxious and willing to do their duty, more than we need men chosen from civil life suddenly and placed in commissions where they are lost and out of place.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Would the gentleman's committee entertain the advisability of amending the provision to which he has called attention?

Mr. CRAGO. My amendment would be along this line, that where an efficiency board found a man disqualified for the position he was then occupying they should make further inquiry as to his fitness for some other position, either in some other rank or in some other line of the service; and I think in that way there could be formed a reservoir from which men could be drawn to fill these places which are now being filled suddenly with men taken from civil life and invested with a captain's or a major's uniform.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is the Committee on Military Affairs proposing or considering an amendment of that kind?

Mr. CRAGO. Well, I will say that we have been so busy during the consideration of the present bill that we have not had opportunity to give it much attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAGO. Very little attention has been given to this. I hesitated to make any objection, because I did not want to interfere, and I know the members of the committee did not want to interfere in any way whatsoever with the plan of the department in forming this great Army. But I asked The Adjutant General the other day if the Secretary of War really knew of the splendid men who were being separated from the service because of some slight lack of technical knowledge as found by an efficiency board. I think the findings of the efficiency boards have been unduly severe, both as to physical and mental qualifications.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Is it not true that some of these trained men are being commissioned in a new branch of the military service known as United States Guards?

Mr. CRAGO. I think that is so. That is confined, however, to service in the United States, and it is not very comfortable for a man who has held himself out in his local community as a military man to be sent back home and go into an organization of that kind. The colonel that I spoke of was met by an order on the train as his regiment was entraining for a port of embarkation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has any prejudice or discrimination been manifested, so far as the National Guards of particular States have been concerned?

Mr. CRAGO. I do not think there has been any prejudice against the States or against the National Guard, because I think that in most of these boards there has been a National Guard officer. I think the trouble has been that they have not taken into consideration sufficiently the human element.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows that Pennsylvania had a fine National Guard, manned by enthusiastic officers, many of whom served seven months down on the border of Mexico, and some of whom have been thrown out entirely by these efficiency boards, although the ambition of their lives was to remain in the military service.

Mr. CRAGO. I do not think most of them have been thrown out, but many of them have been. Entirely too many, in my opinion.

Mr. LOBECK. What has been true of the officers from the gentleman's State, whom he knows of, has also been true of Nebraska men who have served their full two years on the Mexican border.

Mr. CRAGO. It has been true.

Mr. LOBECK. Men who have forgotten their geometry and trigonometry and could not pick them up readily.

Mr. CRAGO. These men ought to have been given places in other branches of the service.

Mr. LOBECK. I know some of them were excellent men, and they ought to have been retained in the service.

Mr. STEENERSON. I should like to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, on behalf of the other Members of the House, that we want to thank him for this explanation. It is a criticism that is quite general throughout the whole country, and I have been asked the reason for this apparent discrimination against National Guard officers. I have been unable to answer it as I would like to. Therefore I want to thank the gentleman for giving the explanation. It seems to me his view is correct—that it is in large part due to the wording of the statute; that they take it too literally—that he "shall be discharged." I hope the gentleman will cooperate with the members of the Committee on Military Affairs to correct that, so that we can utilize these men in the future.

Mr. CRAGO. There is just one way in which it can be corrected without additional legislation. It is in the power of the Secretary of War to commission these men, but the department does not seem to want to interfere with the rule which has been laid down.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DIXON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On May 23, 1918:

S. 3935. An act to prohibit the sale, manufacture, and importation of intoxicating liquors in the Territory of Hawaii during the period of the war, except as hereinafter provided.

On May 25, 1918:

S. 4409. An act to amend section 15 of the act approved June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," as amended by the act approved May 12, 1917, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes"; and

H. R. 8696. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

On May 29, 1918:

H. R. 9715. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Bayou Bartholomew, in Ashley County, Wilmot Township, State of Arkansas.

On May 31, 1918:

H. R. 4910. An act to authorize the establishment of a town site on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, Idaho; and

H. R. 5489. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange for lands in private ownership lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

To provide for pay of property and disbursing officers of the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia, $26,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Reading Clerk calls attention of the Chair to the fact that in line 8, page 64, the dollar mark is omitted before the figures "26,000." Without objection, he will be authorized to make this correction.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance equipment for Home Guard organizations: For procuring arms, ammunition, equipment, etc., for issue and use in connection with Home Guard organizations, in pursuance of the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 14, 1917, authorizing issues to Home Guard organizations, $2,500,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There are several Home Guard organizations in the country that are in uniform but without small arms. I have had several applications from various units asking whether there is any possibility of securing these small arms for practice and use. Will this item supply that?

Mr. DENT. This item is intended to supply that as far as it can be done. This item is largely, necessarily, a guess as to how much they can supply to the Home Guard organizations. The War Department asked for $4,500,000, but on the showing they made, we thought $2,500,000 would be all they could possibly supply without depleting the regular organization.

Mr. FESS. Is there any source for obtaining small arms without this provision? Are the War Department giving any of this equipment to any Home Guard organizations at the present time?

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman will recall, at the last session of Congress we passed a provision authorizing the distribution of those arms that the Government had that were not necessary for use in the Regular Establishment, and those have been distributed.

Mr. FESS. They have been distributed?

Mr. DENT. They have been distributed, as I understand it, as far as the department have been able to reach the situation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SLAYDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11185) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the appropriations herein made for the support of the Army and the National Guard are available for such printing, binding, and blank books as may be necessary in putting in effect the objects of the appropriations: And provided further, That hereafter printing, binding, and blank books required for use outside of the District of Columbia in connection with the support of the Army and the National Guard may be done or procured elsewhere than at the Government Printing Office when in the opinion of the Secretary of War such work can be more advantageously done or procured locally, the cost thereof to be paid from the proper appropriations.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask to return to page 21, line 4, where we passed an item by unanimous consent, for reserve veterinarians, $68,000. That is the only item in the bill that has been passed over, and we thought that perhaps there was some mistake about that. That item is just exactly as the committee approved it. It is the same amount as the appropriation that was made last year, and I understand that not one cent has been spent under it. So I think the committee acted wisely in making it $68,000 instead of $700,000 that was asked for.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked to return to the paragraph referred to by the gentleman from Alabama, on page 21, beginning with line 4.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, the item on page 21, line 4, "Reserve veterinarians, $68,000," should stand as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will stand as reported by the committee. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, on page 70, line 7, the word "hereafter" was stricken out by the committee, so as not to make it permanent law, and I move that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 70, line 7, after the word "that," strike out the word "hereafter."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 70, line 14, at the end of the paragraph, insert the following:

"Provided, That where practicable so to do, no work be done or contract made under or by authority of any provision in this act or under a percentage or cost-plus percentage basis, nor shall any contract, where circumstances so permit, be let involving more than $1,000 until at least three responsible competing contractors shall have been notified and considered in connection with such contract, and all contracts to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, the Government reserving the right to reject any and all bids."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to exchange a strip of land of about 200 feet in width, within the Aberdeen Proving Ground, and extending from Bush River to Magnolia, Md., and adjoining the right of way of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., for a tract of land situated inside the limits of the Aberdeen Proving Ground, and having an area of about 8 acres, upon the payment to the United States of such consideration, in addition to said tract of land, as the Secretary of War shall deem equitable.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This exchange of land seems to be within the Aberdeen Proving Ground, one fronting the Bush River and the other inside.

Mr. DENT. I will read a paragraph of a letter from the Acting Secretary of War:

The Pennsylvania Railroad Co. owns a small tract of land lying inside the boundaries of the Aberdeen Ordnance Proving Ground just south of Magnolia, Md. The railway company wishes to secure from the Government a strip of land 200 feet wide, extending from the Bush River to Magnolia, Md., adjacent to the present right of way of the company, for the purpose of constructing new tracks made necessary very largely in order to take care of the Government traffic. This commission has made a tentative agreement with the railroad company for an exchange of the land now owned by the Government and desired by the railroad company for right of way for the strip of land owned by the railroad company inside the proving ground, the Government to receive, in addition to the tract of land owned by the railroad company, a cash consideration of $13,500.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Two hundred feet fronting on the river to go to the railroad is within the proving ground?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And in consideration of $13,500 the Government is given land elsewhere. Will the gentleman state whether that is the ordnance proving ground? An effort was made to buy Kent Island, which failed, and a new site was obtained by the Ordnance Bureau for the purpose of a proving ground. What I would like to know is, if this is the proving ground which was thus obtained?

Mr. DENT. The letter of the Acting Secretary of War says that on February 20, 1918, Lieut. Col. John S. Dean, of the War Department board of appraisers, addressed to the Judge Advocate General the communication which I have read. This letter was submitted by the Judge Advocate General to the Ordnance Department, and under date of March 21, 1918, the Acting Chief of Ordnance formally approved the proposed transfer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; the exchange had the approval of the department, but is this the ordnance proving ground?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think it is the proving ground for bombs and explosives by the Ordnance Department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is this the ground that takes the place of the Kent Island site?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I can not answer that question.

Mr. KAHN. As I understand, this ground is along the Bush River near Aberdeen. The War Department found that the quantity of land that they had acquired there was not sufficient for carrying on experiments for the aeroplanes that are used in bombing operations. It was found that the test of the bombs was being held back by the fact that they had not enough land.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman from California to yield before my time expires. This is an ordnance site?

Mr. KAHN. Altogether.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And what have aeroplanes to do with it?

Mr. KAHN. Because they are taking the bombs up in the aeroplanes for experimentation on that land.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman say how much ground there is in the Aberdeen Proving Ground?

Mr. KAHN. No; but I understand it is a very large tract.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And runs up close to the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Mr. KAHN. I do not think it does; my impression is that it runs along the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania Railroad is getting 200 feet front on the Bush River, as I understand. I want to know if the tract runs up to the railroad?

Mr. KAHN. I am not in a position to inform the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, among the soldiers thus far contributed by America to the allied forces in France, no single individual has thus far distinguished himself by more heroic deeds or received wider or more deserving recognition for them than Maj. Raoul Lufbery, the American ace, whose dramatic death in battle a few days ago attracted the attention not only of this country but of the entire world. His name and his deeds are worthy of commemoration. He is worthy of the place on our roll of national heroes, which he now fills. His spirit will live in the hearts of the other young Americans who will aspire to take up the work he left unfinished.

Maj. Lufbery's home, so far as such an adventurous, roving spirit could be said to have a home, was at Wallingford, in my district. At one time he was employed by the International Silver Co. at that place. His brother and other members of his family still live there.

It would be interesting and instructive if there were the material at hand to record here a worthy biography of this remarkable young man. Lacking such authentic material, I shall insert in the RECORD, under leave granted, a newspaper story written by a New York Sun reporter and published in that paper a few days before Maj. Lufbery's death. It is written in characteristic Sunday newspaper style, but from it may be gleaned much that will help to give an insight into the life and character of one who gave all and gave it heroically to his country's cause.

LUFBERY, SOLDIER OF FORTUNE—STORY OF KING OF THE AIR AS TOLD BY HIS BROTHER.

"Charles Lufbery had forgotten that he must go back to the factory at 1 o'clock and that he had no luncheon; for he was telling with affectionate pride all he knew of his brother, Maj. Raoul Lufbery, now famous as an aviator in France.

"He could not give a complete record, a 'dossier,' he called it, of his brother.' Indeed, nobody but Raoul Lufbery himself could do that, for his life has led him through many unknown, sunlit byways. And then Charles had not seen him since he was in Wallingford, Conn., 10 years ago.

"Charles served with the French Army from July 10, 1915, until he was discharged on March 23, 1917. And, would I believe it, once he was within 15 miles of where Raoul was stationed, but his commanding officer said they must go right on and so he missed seeing his brother.

"People in Wallingford say that Charles is of the same general appearance as his brother. He is slight, not more than 5 feet 8 inches in height, with straight, brown hair and sad, luminous brown eyes. He must have got this sadness in his eyes during those 19 days he served without relief in the trenches at the Battle of the Somme. And here he was unknown and undecorated, telling stories of his brother with more joy than if they had been his own.

FAMILY NEVER UNDERSTOOD HIM.

"Raoul was the member of the Lufbery family whom none of the rest ever quite understood, but for this very mystery and the quiet charm of his personality they loved him more than they did any of the others.

"'We were never surprised at anything Raoul ever did, and sometimes,' Charles said, 'when we were alone he was as good as a story book. But you could not get him to talk if there was company.'

"At that noon hour in Wallingford we sat in the kitchen of the little brown cottage. Noise from the factory next door came like a liberal pizzicato of basses in a Puccini opera. Lawrence, Raoul's sister-in-law, searched through boxes for old letters, while Marcel, the 9-year-old son, gallantly spun his top in the hope that somebody would look that way. Little moving shadows from the great apple tree were on the floor, and there was a scent, as ever in Connecticut in May, of wood smoke and flowers and ferny meadows.

"I do not know just what time of year Raoul Lufbery came to Wallingford, but it should have been May, and I think he must have stood there on the common, looking off at the wooded hills and taking deep draughts of the rustic air, when he said to himself that Wallingford should always be his home wherever he happened to be.

"He was in Connecticut only a year and a half in all his life. His father was American, born in New York City, and spent most of his life in Wallingford, and his mother was French. He himself was born 34 years ago in Clermont, France.

SELDOM WROTE TO HOME FOLKS.

"Just when Raoul learned to fly Charles didn't know, but certainly he did learn, and they were very glad, for now they could hear of him through the newspapers. He hated to write, and when he was in Wallingford he used to tell them that when they did not hear from him they would know he was dead. However, some said vaguely that he learned piloting in Indo-China, and his sister, Yvonne, knew for sure that the celebrated Maurice Pourpre was his teacher.

"And after that conversation you can understand that Maj. Lufbery had to take to the air, as he had exhausted everything land and water had to offer by way of adventure.

"'He was always ready to risk everything,' Charles said, 'and the moment's joy was all he wanted from it. Ah, he is splendid for an army! He could dress wounds or cook or comfort the wounded, and do all those simple things which so few know how to do at all. He ought to know them. He has made his living so ever since he was 15.

"'You know when he thought he might come home they talked of giving him a great banquet. Well, Gerve' (so they call him), 'if he should hear of such an intention beforehand, would slip home incognito. He wouldn't know what to do with a banquet.'

"'Yes,' Mrs. Lufbery said, 'but he'd manage that better than the girl in South Dakota. This girl wrote and wanted to know when Raoul would be at home and where she could send something she had knitted him. He'd be terribly worried over this; so I sent the letter to Yvonne. You see they all think I am his mother and I'd be so honored; only I hope I don't look so old.

"'He was never the one to be popular with girls, or men, either. He liked to be alone, and sometimes he would sit looking and say nothing.'

RAOUL ALWAYS MOST MODEST.

"Charles said that in Paris he had seen aviators splendid in their decorations and uniforms, the most admired men in the hotels. But Raoul wouldn't cut much of a figure among them; indeed, he'd sooner face 20 German airplanes than try, 'because he does not care much about how he looks.'

"As Charles talked, now and then he rocked the cradle where his baby son, 5 weeks old, was trying to sleep. This, if you feel like meeting so distinguished a person, is Raoul Francis Lufbery, godson of his illustrious uncle, the American ace. But the baby, unimpressed by his own importance and by the exploits of his godfather, wept as if he were in a game where Maj. Raoul held four aces, instead of being one.

"Just to show you what sort of family Lufbery came from: Julian, his oldest brother, Charles, and he himself all went to help France, although they are American citizens. Maj. Raoul, probably because he never did have a dancing master, is not one to put his best foot forward. His family are poor, but when you know them you understand that culture and hospitality are not the exclusive property of the rich.

"Now, Raoul got his taste for high adventure early in life. His mother died when he was about 6 years old, leaving the three brothers to their grandmother's care. According to all accounts, the lady found it the hardest work in life. For Raoul was always restless.

"Like a true Frenchman—or an American of the world, as he really is—he decided when he was 15 that he just could not live another day unless he saw Paris. So he left his grandmother and set off.

"He never saw her again. For when Charles was in France, he went to Clermont to see her, and found 'to my great sadness that she was dead, and we had not heard of it.'

"Meanwhile the boys' father married again. From this marriage they have four sisters, Yvonne, Marie Louise, and Germaine, nurses in Boston, and Berthe, who is married and with whom Raoul's father now lives in Yalesville, Conn. There is another brother, Rene, who tried to enlist in the Aviation Service last spring, with what fortune I do not know.

"Unlike most great men from the Provinces Raoul was unimpressed by Paris. It was well enough, he used to say, for people who liked the order of the city. But obeying the police, dining in cafés, toiling, and paying your rent wasn't his idea of life.

"Under some protection which was on hand to look after the interests of the future aviator he sailed for Algeria. But the voyage was a very hard one, and he fell ill upon arriving at Algiers. While in the hospital, he became a great favorite with the doctors and nurses, as he always did with people whom he came to know. And, having no prospects, they made him an orderly in the hospital. Here he stayed for two years.

"From there he went to Egypt, where he says to this day he'd like to settle if he was compelled to settle any place, because the climate is so congenial to a vagabond.

TOLD OF ENTERTAINING ADVENTURES.

"In Wallingford on Sundays and when he was not working in the silver factory he would entertain his brother and sister-in-law with tales of these early adventures which he remembered more vividly than any of the later ones.

"One night in Garrah, for the sake of his personal preference and also his purse, he decided to spend the night sleeping in the sand near a ruined castle.

"'Just as he is sleeping,' his brother said, 'he sees a man crouching with a knife in his mouth, waiting for a chance to stab him. Raoul had nothing to fight with, but he wrestled with the man, and the noise they made brought some soldiers from the patrol, and they both were arrested.

"The chief was very angry and threatened to send Raoul to torture and prison. But luckily Raoul had money and the other fellow had a bad record, and they released my brother.

"Even in Egypt the people respected the person who had money. But this dollar, and that's all Lufbery had, was exceedingly valuable, because by its means he got into the first military uniform he ever wore. It came about this way:

"After that escape the moonlit nights of Egypt lost their charm for our hero aviator. So he decided to go back to Constantine, Algeria. It was more French and less ungodly there. Accordingly he set out and he reached to the beginning of the desert, where nobody could travel without a guide, though the way was short, only about two days' journey.

"Here he met a young Canadian, also bound for Constantine, and presently a man with three donkeys put in an appearance. The man wanted the boys to help with the merchandise, but he inquired where they were going, and if they had any money. Raoul produced his dollar and the Canadian had about that much. The man took it all and they started.

WAYLAID BY A ROBBER BAND.

"They had traveled one night without adventure, resting during the day. But the next evening, just as they started, they were surrounded by a band of robbers. The owner of the donkeys laid about him with a club and killed two of the thieves and the rest killed him and one donkey.

"When they saw that the two boys had no money they took their clothes, every stitch, and left some bread and water for them and the two remaining donkeys, which were too slow for the robbers' trade.

"By riding all night in the chill desert the boys reached a settlement of two houses early the next morning. The people said they had no food to give, but they purchased the donkeys from the boys, and let them spend the 5 francs to buy two grain bags from them.

"Lufbery, always quick to put to use what was at hand, cut a hole in the bottom of each bag for their heads and one in either side for the arms, and the two adventurers donned their costumes and set out for a barracks of the French Foreign Legion, which was about an hour away.

"When the soldiers saw the boys approach they screamed and howled. And, though the boys' sense of humor had been dulled by hunger and their own plight, they had only to look at each other to see what the joke was.

STRANGE OBJECTS TAKEN IN AND FED.

"Seeing that the strange objects were well disposed and so merry, also that they knew the French language, the soldiers took them in, fed them, and gave them some clothes.

"And this was the first time the future American ace had worn the military uniform. Of course it possessed great variety, and some of the garments were a trifle large, but one can not be too squeamish in the matter of attire right after coming out of a grain bag.

"Here Raoul and the Canadian parted and Raoul went for a while to Constantinople through Rumania and through Switzerland. After various unrecorded adventures he arrived at Fulda, Germany, where he worked for two years in a brewery. From the eternal dampness of the place he contracted rheumatism, from which he is never entirely free.

"While at Fulda he learned to speak and read German, but he became so ill of rheumatism that he had to be taken to a hospital. For a while after his release he taught gymnastics. With the little money he got from that he went to Hamburg. There he helped load a ship, for which he got the $40 necessary to pay his fare to America.

"The gymnastics set him up wonderfully, and he was skilled in athletics. The neighbors who lived downstairs in the house which his brother occupied in Wallingford could have told that, for he'd make a dumb-bell of a broomstick with two stones tied to the ends, and not infrequently one of these fell off and raised a great row downstairs.

"Some time in 1906 he reached America, where he thought he would find his family again, for though they had been separated there was a strong affection among them all. When he got to Wallingford he found that his father had sailed for France two days before; but Charles and his wife were there to welcome him. Yes, and the half-brother, Rene; and these two boys set up housekeeping on their own account in a concomitant red brick building called the Wallace Block, below the railroad station.

"Later he lived with his brother Charles. He was very eager to learn English, and went to a night school for a while. But he liked to be alone.

RESTLESS IN WALLINGFORD.

"Though he was fond of his sister, he got restless in Wallingford. He went to New Orleans, then to Mexico, and finally to San Francisco. In New Orleans he was in a bakery, but he wrote a gay card in French that he didn't consider this his life's work. From the White Palace Hotel, San Francisco, he wrote that he was a waiter there, and that it was somewhat better than putting raisins in bread, his former job. In the same year, 1908, he wrote from Honolulu, Hawaii. And then the letter from the Philippines, where he served with the American Army for 18 months.

"'And Charley' (his brother), he says in the same letter to Yvonne, 'is he still working in the factory? Has he now a small garden around his new house? I know it was his dream to have something like this when I left over there. He was also crazy for chickens. I hope he has all these things now and is satisfied. I wish so little could satisfy me.

"'Very often, generally in the evening, when I am alone studying or reading in my room, I think of my little sister Yvonne. I have a good idea that we are not separated forever, but that we are able to meet again one of these days.' But Yvonne has not seen him since.

"When I was asking where the Lufberys lived I spoke to a little girl who was coming back from school. No; she hadn't known the flier, but her sister knew his sister, Yvonne. With the true instinct of a gossip she wanted to tell me all she knew. Had I ever heard of a Frenchman named Gûynemer (pronounced as one would pronounce it in Wallingford)?

"Well, he was dead now; but before he died he had killed a thousand Germans, and now the Lufbery girl thinks he was the bravest man in the world. But a while ago she wouldn't read anything about him. She said she couldn't bear him. The reason was this: He had had more glorious victories than her brother had.

JOINED LAFAYETTE ESCADRILLE.

"According to Elliott Cowdin, Lufbery joined the Lafayette Ecsadrille when it was sent to the Verdun sector early in May, 1916. There were no letters to the Wallingford Lufberys about that. Only a postal card from Hongkong in 1911, saying that Raoul had a position in the Imperial Chinese Customs in Canton, 'which I like tolerably well.'

"But on December 27, 1917, now possessing the Croix de Guerre, the British Military Cross, the French Medaille Militaire, and the Legion of Honor, he wrote to his brother:

"'Now I am looking like a Christmas tree, medals all over my chest. The last one I was decorated with is a Montenegrin order with a ribbon, red, blue, and white. Though it has not the value of the French Legion of Honor or the Military Medal, I am awfully proud to wear it.

"'You certainly have heard through the newspapers about my commission in the American Aviation, but the truth is I have been appointed to that rank—major—a month ago, but I can not wear the uniform yet as the French are still holding my discharge.

"'I now have 16 official German machines to my credit, and many others unofficial. On December 2 I brought two of them down.

"'Well, how is everything up at the old Wallingford? I would like very much to see it again. Unfortunately, I must give it up for the present. I should like to organize some sort of a little flying circus for the Germans before I leave here.'

"But here it was 1 o'clock and the whistle had blown; so Charles Lufbery took his sandwiches and started back to the factory.

"'We're very proud of all Raoul's honors,' he said, with a certain wistfulness, 'but the best thing would be if America had a medal for great bravery and Raoul would win it, and he'd come back here and the President would pin the medal on.'"

The Clerk read as follows:

That the authority conferred upon the President by the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," is hereby extended so as to authorize him during each fiscal year to raise by draft as provided in said act and acts amendatory thereof the maximum number of men which may be organized, equipped, trained, and used during such year for the prosecution of the present war until the same shall have been brought to a successful conclusion.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, may I for a moment direct the attention of the House to this last paragraph? There has been a good deal said in the press of the country about the size of the Army that the United States should raise or that it would be necessary for it to raise in order to win this war. This last section, Mr. Chairman, puts forever at rest the question of the number of men to be called for the winning of this war; the number is calculated and limited only by the amount of money appropriated and the number of men within the draft age. There will perhaps be some people who will look with a great deal of amazement upon the immense appropriation carried in this bill. When we stop to figure this we can hardly understand how there can be so much money in the world. Twelve billion dollars—just think of it, one hundred and twenty dollars and over for every man, woman, and child in the United States. When we passed the resolution declaring war against the Imperial German Government we pledged every man and every dollar and every resource of this country to the winning of this war. We are now simply apportioning the money into yearly allotments according to the needs of the Army.

The number of men that will be called will be dependent upon the amount of money that we appropriate here to equip and take care of them. Therefore, to those who may have been lingering under some shadow of doubt and wish to know, and that the enemy may know, we, without hesitation or reservation, say that the position of America to-day is that she proposes to furnish and equip enough soldiers to whip the Kaiser and everybody connected with him to a standstill, be the time long or short. [Applause.] I realize the fact that the House is weary; that we are now at the end of this bill; and that we want to pass it; and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to insert therein some figures and other data.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman resumes his seat will he yield for a suggestion?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In line with what the gentleman is saying, it might be interesting to know that in this bill we are appropriating 50 per cent more than the entire cost of both sides of the Civil War, and we are doing it unanimously.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I want to say, in reply to that, and want to say this on behalf of the chairman of the committee [Mr. DENT] and on behalf of the ranking Republican member [Mr. KAHN], that I have never seen so harmonious action in any committee as there has been during the entire hearings of the Committee on Military Affairs on this bill. There has been no discordant note in the committee during the preparation of this bill that in any way would indicate that there is anything in the bill that ought not to be there, or that there are things left out of it that ought to be in it.

The Republicans and the Democrats have voted side by side, and I want to say for the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, and every Army officer who has come before us, that they have greatly assisted the committee in its labors, and have at all times been willing to show and make clear every item that is called for in this vast appropriation, all of which you will find set out in detail in the hearings, and no one has tried to withhold anything that should not have been withheld, except for military reasons, and I want to congratulate Mr. DENT and Mr. KAHN upon the magnificent manner in which they have handled this appropriation bill through the committee and through the House, and, following the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] a bit further, we can notify the Kaiser to-night that America is, as one man, out to get his scalp. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, on the 6th day of April, at 3 o'clock in the morning, the House of Representatives declared that the Imperial German Government had committed repeated acts of war against the Government and people of the United States; that its conduct toward our country and people had become so unjust, cruel, and barbarous; that it had so utterly disregarded the long-established rights of our people on land and seas, and had been so lacking in honesty and fair dealing as to constitute a violation of the course of conduct which should obtain between friendly nations.

President Wilson came before the Congress and delivered a war message that was heard around the world. In this memorable message he pointed to the many outrages of the Kaiser's Government against our people and country—his utter disregard of treaty obligations—his demand that we abandon our God-given right to traverse the seas or suffer the consequences.

A determination to continue at whatever cost his ruthless murderous submarine warfare—sinking all ships destined to belligerent or friendly ports, regardless of their cargo, whether composed of human beings or inanimate things, that dared violate his imperial order fixing a pathway across the ocean, decreeing that we must travel therein or die.

The President in his message among other things said:

There is one choice we can not make; we are incapable of making; We will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrongs; they cut to the very roots of human life.

In response to this message the Congress on this memorable morning passed the following resolution:

Resolved, etc., That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of this Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

The adoption of this resolution is the answer of America to the Kaiser of Germany, that this country will call to arms its last man and spend its last dollar and fight to the last trench before our people will ever bow down to this most arrogant tyrant and deadly enemy of human progress, happiness, liberty, and civilization.

Mr. Chairman, your Committee on Military Affairs, of which I have the honor to be a member, have found themselves at all times in pleasant accord with President Wilson and Secretary of War Baker. I believe, sir, the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, should have a free hand in the conduct of this war, and I have not hesitated to vote into his hands, without restriction or limitation, all power and money he believed necessary to carry on this world-wide conflict to a successful conclusion.

The bill we are now considering, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, carries the stupendous sum of $9,583,340,808.61, in addition to which $2,458,332,801 is authorized.

I believe it can be safely stated that this is the largest appropriation ever reported by any committee of any legislative body on earth.

In the early months of the war there was some criticism for failure to furnish our soldiers with sufficient clothing. This was almost unavoidable, when you take into consideration the immensity of our new military program.

When war was declared we had a Regular Army of about 127,588 officers and men.

We now have, including the draft calls for April and May, an Army of 2,030,027, and the appropriation provides during the next fiscal year for an Army of practically 3,000,000 men, the pay for an army of this size being based upon an average pay of $2,313 per officer and $373.69 per man.

While in the beginning of such a huge military program some mistakes and delays may have occurred, yet on the whole I think our country is to be congratulated that after a little more than a year from the date of the declaration of war our Nation has constructed a wonderful Military Establishment.

The American people have come to realize as never before that we are living and passing through a crisis in the history of our country and the world which shall leave its everlasting impress upon the lives and character of the people of this Nation and of all other God-fearing, liberty-loving nations, large and small, throughout the world.

When war broke out in Europe our people looked on in sorrow and pity, hoping and praying that the fagots from the awful conflagration then consuming the Old World would not fall upon our shores.

For nearly three years President Wilson tried every diplomatic avenue consistent with the Nation's honor to save our people and country from the awful vortex of war, but to no avail. From the day the Kaiser began his merciless, murderous march through little Belgium he demonstrated to the world that he had begun a war of conquest against the nations of the earth, limited only by his power to take and to hold.

Nation after nation of the Old World has already gone down under the iron hand of this autocratic tyrant, and its helpless people are being made slaves of his cruel will.

Sirs, if there be one among you that doubts for one moment that if the Kaiser should be successful with his army in Europe he would withhold his hand from our land and country, let such, I beg you, now look and listen to the woeful message of the survivors of those vessels that have so recently been sent to the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean just out from our own shores by those midnight assassins of the sea—the German submarine.

Even now, as we sit here in the Capitol of our Nation appropriating money to sustain our soldiers, the information comes that a dozen vessels have gone down just off the Jersey coast. This awful conflict has now come to our very door. It is no longer confined to poor, prostrated Belgium and bleeding France—it is everywhere.

I tell you, sirs, we are at war with a king crazy mad for world power, backed by a deluded and misguided people, whose desire for conquest knows no bounds. But I believe with all the power of my being that the days of this mad king are numbered and he can not pass them.

America has entered this war in defense of her national honor, to maintain her rights long established, and to avenge the deaths of her outraged people—and to make the world safe for free people to live in for all time.

We have joined our allies, Great Britain, France, and Italy, and our soldier boys, fighting side by side with their soldier boys, will bring this unprincipled autocrat to his knees. He will be held to a strict account for the murder of defenseless people, for sending men and women into slavery, for laying waste the land of Belgium and fair fields of France. He will be made to recognize the sovereign rights of the American people on land and sea for all time.

To accomplish all this means much sacrifice on the part of all our people. Will we make such sacrifice? Yes; a thousand times over, if need be.

The history of the American people from the day they took their place among the free nations of earth until now has been written page by page with the indelible pen of human sacrifice and self-denial—and whatever sacrifice may be necessary for those of us who remain at home to make to win this war will be freely made, whether it be in donations to the Red Cross, purchase of liberty bonds, payment of taxes, even to the last dollar, all will be given to sustain our fearless soldiers who are willing to die if need be that the world may be free.

Mr. Chairman, the patriotic people of Texas are willing to do more than give of their substance. They are willing to deny themselves food that our soldiers and allies may have bread.

May I call the attention of the House to the fact that the people of the great State of Texas in early spring of this year fasted for 45 days as to wheat and flour, during which time they consumed no wheat and shipped all their wheat and flour out of the State?

I wish to read at this point a telegram from Mr. E. A. Peden, State food administrator of Texas, to Gen. John J. Pershing:

Gen. JOHN J. PERSHING,
Commanding General American Expeditionary Forces:

Entire State of Texas will consume no wheat until June 1 as a contribution toward winning the war.

E. A. PEDEN,
State Food Administrator.

To which telegram Gen. Pershing wired the following reply:

I assure you American Expeditionary Forces appreciate sacrifice by your great State toward winning the war. United States will win through sacrifices of men, money, and comforts, and troops already here will have opportunity through Army publication, Stars and Stripes, to know part of what largest State in Union is doing.

While we may find some consolation and comfort in the sentiment that runs through the beautiful lines of Gen. Pershing, yet who of us does not feel and know that the sacrifices we make here, whether we deny ourselves food and raiment or lay our last dollar upon the altar of our country, are exceedingly small when compared with those being made by our brave soldiers, sailors, and Red Cross nurses, who have taken their lives in their hands, given up home and loved ones, passing through a sea of death where ten thousand dangers lurk unseen, to meet the army of the world's worst enemy face to face on the field of conflict?

Mr. Chairman, the American soldiers are proving themselves in this war. To-day they are in the thickest of the fight. Company after company, regiment after regiment, brigade after brigade, and division after division are being hurled against the army of the Kaiser like the irresistible waves of a maddened sea. With fixed bayonets, clenched teeth, and a determination born of confidence in the eternal justice of their cause they are defying their enemy to do his worst. They are standing like an impenetrable wall between the enemy and their own country and challenging him to break through.

Yea, sirs, they are doing more than this. Even now they are moving like a mighty phalanx against the Kaiser's army and will drive his men back across the Marne and on and on back to their own soil, where they shall make an unconditional surrender and the Kaiser shall be made to right every wrong he has committed against outraged humanity.

The figures and data referred to are as follows:

Classification of the Reserve Corps line officers has not yet been completed.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, May 16, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 71, after line 18, insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of the appropriations in this act shall be available for salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or any other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop-watch or other time-saving device a time study of any such employee between the starting and completing thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonuses or cash rewards to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the Taylor stop-watch system for speeding up. This amendment is the same that has been in the appropriation bill for the last four years, word for word. I do not know how many members of the Military Affairs Committee were present when it was for some reason or other stricken out of this bill. I was absent at the time. I have talked with a number of them just now and find that they have no objection to its going back, and I would like to suggest——

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LUNN. In just a moment. I would suggest that we request the individual opinion of the majority and minority leaders, because I do not want at this late hour to inject anything that will cause this splendid spirit of unity to be marred. I have reason to believe that neither of the gentlemen will oppose. I am sure that there has been no request on the part of the Secretary of War that this be eliminated. I do not believe there will be anything gained by it; I believe rather that such action might arouse an unfortunate spirit that would not be aroused if the law is made to conform with the regulations heretofore adopted.

The Army bill for the past four years has contained the substance of my amendment, and there is no reason for change at this time. The splendid spirit of loyalty on the part of America's workers should not be impugned by an inference that they need prodding by a stop-watch speeding-up system.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. I will yield now.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman stated that he did not know whether or not the Secretary of War opposes this amendment. Does not the gentleman know that when this same amendment was proposed in 1916 that Secretary of War Baker addressed a letter to the Speaker of the House protesting emphatically against the adoption of an amendment of this kind?

Mr. LUNN. I could not answer that, not being a Member of the House at that time. I will yield to the gentleman from Colorado and request him to answer.

Mr. BLACK. I will read it when I get the opportunity.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, it is true the Secretary of War did write such a letter. It was written before the United States went into war, and after the United States went into war the same Secretary of War, as president of the Council of National Defense, issued an appeal to the legislatures and the business men of this country pleading with them not to remove any of the safeguards which had been thrown around labor. The last declaration from the Secretary of War, which, if I have the opportunity, I will be glad to read, is the one which should carry weight with the House.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman from New York has the time.

Mr. LUNN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BROWNE. I would like to say in connection with what the gentleman from Colorado says that if the bill is left just the way it is now the Secretary of War could prohibit time study and premium system if he so desired, so if the Secretary of War is in sympathy with labor and desires to do so there is nothing in this legislation to prevent him, but by passing this legislation we practically handcuff the Secretary of War and prevent him from doing what he wants to do.

Mr. KEATING. If you do not adopt this limitation you then wipe off the statute books one of the safeguards which have been thrown around labor in this country, and to that extent you violate the appeal made by the Secretary of War and the Council of National Defense.

Mr. BROWNE. I want to ask the gentleman from Colorado if he does not impute to the Secretary of War this fact, that the Secretary of War will do something that organized labor and the labor people will not like?

Mr. KEATING. I have not the slightest idea that the Secretary of War will approve the Taylor system. I have too much respect for his judgment to imagine any such thing as that.

Mr. BROWNE. Then why does not the gentleman leave it within the discretion of the Secretary of War?

Mr. KEATING. My own view of it is that if you knock out this limitation it will be heralded by the forces which have been clamoring for its elimination as a victory for the Taylor system. All the departments of the Government will be besieged to install it. That may lead to great unrest among the workmen of the country.

Mr. LUNN. If there was to be any extended debate, I would not want to yield all of my time. There is no reason why we should stir up agitation on this, and I think it would be far better if the amendment could be accepted by the leader of the minority and the leader of the majority and we could finish up the bill. I would like to ask the chairman——

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, it is true that this proposition was submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. The committee has rejected it on several occasions, but uniformly it has been put in the bill on the floor of the House heretofore. I have forgotten how many times the proposition has been submitted on the floor of the House in connection with the Army appropriation bill. I had hoped that it would not be injected into the bill at this time, but in view of the fact that it has been carried in the Army appropriation bill for a number of years, and in view of the fact that this very House has put the same provision in the naval appropriation bill, and the matter is now pending, as I understand it, with some difference of opinion between the Senate and the House on that subject, I think in order to expedite matters that I will withdraw my reservation of a point of order and ask that the amendment be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield a moment? This provision was in the naval appropriation bill, and it contains two subjects—first, the prohibition against the use of the time watch, and, second, an inhibition against the payment of bonuses and rewards for excess service or greater production. The Senate amended the provision by striking out the last subject and leaving the first one, so that, as the Senate amendment is now, there is a provision against the use of the time watch, and they strike out the inhibition against the payment of bonuses and rewards. Now, that Senate amendment will be brought to the House for a separate vote, and if the House sustains the Senate upon that matter, why the two bills can be adjusted later on.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield before he takes his seat?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As the matter has been amended by the Senate, the whole proposition now stands between heaven and earth, with a fair chance of being defeated, does it not?

Mr. PADGETT. The matter stands that both Houses have agreed to the prohibition against the use of the stop watch, and the Senate has amended the House provision striking out the inhibition against the payment of cash rewards and bonuses, and that will come to the House for a separate vote.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The matter is so compromised and must be so voted on as not to give a fair expression upon the question raised by the gentleman from New York. So, Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania renews the point of order. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] on the point of order.

Mr. LUNN. All I have to say, Mr. Chairman, is that it has been in the appropriation bills for the last four years. It is not new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. That exact language?

Mr. LUNN. The exact language. It went on in the Sixty-third Congress, and also, I believe, in the Sixty-fourth. It is the identical language used in the bills heretofore.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman recollect at what point of the bill it was offered?

Mr. LUNN. I think at the end of the bill, but we can verify that. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My recollection is, confirmed by several gentlemen around me, that it was put on in the ordnance paragraph and not at the end of the bill.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I have the exact place it was put on. It was put on on January 22, 1915. Mr. Deitrick, of Massachusetts, offered the following amendment to the military appropriation bill, on page 52, after line 14, of that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman read the language?

Mr. BROWNE. The language is as follows:

On page 52, after line 14, insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of the appropriation made in this bill shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch or other time-measuring device a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and the completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this bill be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant, and no claim for services performed by any person while violating the proviso shall be allowed."

This memorandum that I have just read says, "On the military and naval appropriation bills, 1916," and "January 22, 1915."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule. The Chair is necessarily bound by precedent, and the precedent just quoted is binding. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLACK rose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BLACK. I rise to oppose the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to state that the ruling which he has just made is made upon precedent and does not represent, as a matter of parliamentary law, the views of the Chair.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment be concluded in 30 minutes; no; say 20 minutes.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Ten minutes!

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have made a motion to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate close in 30 minutes.

Mr. DENT. I make it 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. In 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How is the time to be controlled?

The CHAIRMAN. You can not take a Member off his feet by a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. A Member can not be taken off his feet by a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NOLAN. How is that 20 minutes to be apportioned? I am not trying to take the gentleman off his feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized. Is there a desire to agree upon the control of time?

Mr. DENT. I do not ask for the control of time myself. I thought it would be left in the control of the Chair.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Since the question is left open again, I ask for five minutes of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] for five minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] for five minutes, and the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] for five minutes, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] for five minutes.

Mr. DENT. Does that exclude the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], who wanted time?

Mr. NOLAN. I would be willing to surrender my time to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from Colorado wanted five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that gentlemen agree upon time now.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that of all other times now is the most inopportune to adopt any provision of law which would have a tendency to obstruct and delay the Government of the United States in its efforts to speed up the production of war essentials. I had hoped that no Member would propose an amendment of this kind to the military appropriation bill, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] has come forward with one which, to my way of thinking, can have no other effect than to tie the hands of our Government and prohibit it from using well-known and well-established systems of efficiency in its arsenals and munition plants.

His amendment reads as follows:

> That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch or other time-measuring device, a time study of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant.

This amendment has been properly termed the antiefficiency amendment.

I do not assail the motive and good intention of any member who advocates and supports it, but I do seriously question his judgment.

During the Sixty-fourth Congress this same proposition was championed by Mr. Tavener of Illinois, then a Member of the House, and it was generally referred to as the Tavener amendment.

I voted against it then, as I shall vote against it now. In my opinion it was unwise for Congress to adopt it in time of peace, and it is certainly inexcusable now, when we are calling upon our people everywhere to speed up production in every proper and legitimate way.

In this morning's newspapers is featured an appeal from the President to the people of the United States, and in which appeal, among other things, he says:

> The problem before us is not primarily a financial problem, but rather a problem of increased production of war essentials and the saving of the materials and labor necessary for the support and equipment of our Army and Navy. * * * I therefore urge that our people everywhere pledge themselves to serve the Government to their utmost in increasing production in all fields necessary to the winning of the war.

Is it not a strange bit of irony that on the very day that this appeal is published to the world the House of Representatives is about to adopt an amendment which will say to those officials who are in charge of our Government arsenals and munition factories that they are prohibited from using well-known and tested methods of efficiency in the production of war materials so urgently and sorely needed at the present time?

I have heard it said that America is awake; but surely it is not awake enough, or else an amendment of this kind would not be adopted. I would be ashamed to go back home to my constituents and say to them that we are asking you to overcome your shortage of labor on the farms and in the fields by working longer hours and by calling upon the women and children to help, but that while asking that of you we, the House of Representatives, are willing to adopt an amendment which such men in authority as Secretary of War Baker and Chief of Ordnance Gen. Crozier say will limit and retard the production of war essentials in our own Government factories.

I have no fight to make on union labor. I not only recognize the right of laboring men to organize and bargain collectively but think that it is wise for them to do so.

But that does not prevent me from opposing the demands of some of those who claim to be their leaders and spokesmen when I think they are wrong, as I certainly do think in this particular case. They look just like any other citizens to me—no more, no less. And in a time like this I do not see why they should be accorded consideration over and above that which is accorded the average citizen.

We have said to the wheat farmer, it is true, that in time of peace you would be permitted to sell your product at whatever price it would bring on the open market, but now the exigencies of war make it necessary that you make some sacrifices for the good of the whole Nation, and therefore a price will be fixed on your wheat—which is the fruit of your labor—and you must sell at that price, notwithstanding a much greater one would probably be obtained if the markets were left open and free.

We have said to the sugar growers of the South and the West the same thing, and I have heard no complaint from them.

But when we come to a proposition of this kind, in rush some gentlemen and at once raise the hue and cry that the standards of union labor must not be disturbed; that everything must go on just exactly as in time of peace.

Well, up to the present war we had an established method of recruiting armies, did we not? It was the volunteer system and had been the historic policy of this Nation for a hundred years; in fact, was the deep-rooted system of the Anglo-Saxon race, but we changed it and adopted the selective draft because of the realization of the magnitude of the task which confronted us and the grim determination which we had to meet it adequately.

But when a proposition arises involving some contention of those who claim to speak for union labor, certain gentlemen at once get active and say, "Hands off; hands off."

I think the situation has been admirably expressed recently in the following language:

> I think this question of putting labor continually, in the passage of these bills, between the accomplishment of efficiency and the accomplishment of victory for our country is the greatest libel and the greatest slander that has ever been laid at the door of American labor. There may be some overzealous representative of the interests of labor who thinks that he must stand at the door and ring the bell whenever labor is called on to make a sacrifice, trying to prevent the sacrifice. So far as I am concerned, I believe that the great body of American labor is just as willing to make its sacrifice for the purpose of this war as any other class of citizens in the United States.

WHAT IS THE NEED FOR THIS AMENDMENT ANYHOW?

I think I would be just as willing and just as anxious to prevent any worker for the United States Government from being the victim of injustice and oppression as would the gentleman from New York, who has proposed the amendment, or as would any Member who has advocated it in debate.

The Committee on Military Affairs, after their long consideration and hearings on the bill, have not recognized any necessity for incorporating any such provision as this in the measure. Are we to assume that this great committee has been indifferent to the rights of labor? No. The simple truth is that there is no necessity for this amendment, and not only is it not needed but it will be positively harmful, not only to the Government, but also to those who labor in Government plants. Have the gentlemen who are championing the adoption of this amendment cited us to any evidence where any Government employee has ever been mistreated or wronged or oppressed in any way by the efficiency system which existed in Government plants prior to the adoption of such an amendment?

No such evidence has been cited, and I make bold to challenge the production of it. If gentlemen who are advocating this amendment know of any such facts, it is their duty to acquaint the House with them. They have not produced them because none are available.

The truth of the matter is this efficiency system was working admirably, greatly benefiting the Government and also the employees, when Congress stepped in at a former session, and, over the protest of the Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, adopted the same amendment as the one we are now discussing.

ATTITUDE OF SECRETARY BAKER.

In this connection let me say that at the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress Secretary Baker wrote a letter to Speaker CLARK on this subject, and it was referred by the Speaker to the Committee on Military Affairs. This letter is dated April 20, 1916, and, among other things, says:

> The wages paid to our operatives at the Watertown Arsenal as a flat rate, irrespective of their response to the time system, is the current rate of the community for similar work, and in addition to that premiums are offered, not large but large enough to stimulate continuous and faithful activity. So far as I know, there is not a case on record at Watertown since the introduction of this system of a nervous breakdown or physical exhaustion due to excessive work nor is it claimed that the operatives in that plant, protected as they are against long hours by a wise eight-hour provision, are in any sense driven or hurried beyond a fair and safe limit.

Secretary Baker also states in his letter that each employee of the Watertown Arsenal working on premium jobs receives on an average $10.66 as premiums in addition to his daily wage.

The Secretary of War further states in his letter:

> The legislation which is being urged upon Congress is advocated by organized labor, which is opposed to the system intended to be prohibited, for the essential reason which is embodied in the charge that it is a speeding-up system. I can not understand this charge as having any other meaning than that the work required of the employees by the system is unduly severe. Of the truth of this charge in the practice of the system at the Watertown Arsenal there is no evidence whatever, but there is a great deal of evidence the other way. There is no complaint of overwork at the arsenal and no workman has been discharged because of failure to meet the requirements of the system.

The Secretary further says:

To prohibit the system, of which the record shows undoubted advantages both to the Government and to the employees, because of a charge unsupported by evidence or even by any attempted evidence, for there has been no effort to prove overwork at the Watertown Arsenal, seems to me to be most unwise.

TESTIMONY OF GEN. WILLIAM CROZIER, CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF ORDNANCE, UNITED STATES ARMY.

At the hearings on the Tavener bill, H. R. 8665, a bill with identical purpose as the amendment now under consideration, Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, appeared before the Committee on Labor and testified, and the substance of his testimony is printed in the views of the minority submitted in House Report No. 698, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, from which I take the following:

The testimony of Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, before the Labor Committee demonstrated that premium and bonus systems have been in use in Government arsenals for many years, to the satisfaction of both management and operatives; that time studies in connection with the premium systems have been in operation in the Watertown Arsenal since 1909; that such system has never been used to "speed up" workmen by ascertaining the fastest time in which work could be done, and declaring it a standard of service; that every charge of alleged overwork has been investigated, and that "we have never found a man at the Watertown Arsenal who has said he was overworked." (Hearings, p. 159.) That accidents, instead of increasing under application of the system, have been less among those engaged under premium or bonus payments than among those engaged in day labor; that since the fixing of work under scientific management has reached appreciable proportions there has been annually a steady decrease in the cost of production to the Government, accompanied by a steady increase in the earnings of those working under the system; that effort to stir up opposition to the system has been evidently stimulated from the outside by organizations opposed to the principles of the system itself, but efforts to abolish it have been met with spontaneous expressions from the workmen of desire to continue under the premium and bonus systems, and that their own social welfare had been advanced by their larger earnings. Finally, that the right to pay premiums or bonus to workers in Government arsenals is regarded by the officers in charge as an essential means of stimulating meritorious increase in production if national self-defense at any time demands such increased production.

Patriotism, it is true, may supply a sufficient incentive to many employers and employees, but the right to insure increased reward for better service by premium or bonus is the only certain means of obtaining necessary increased production.

OPINION OF HON. LOUIS D. BRANDEIS ON THIS ANTIEFFICIENCY AMENDMENT.

I assume that no one will dispute that Associate Supreme Court Justice Brandeis has always been recognized as a friend of union labor. Before his appointment to the Supreme Court he expressed his views on this subject in a letter to the Efficiency Society of New York City, dated January 21, 1916, and, among other things, he said:

Referring to the proposed congressional legislation to prohibit the introduction or use of time study and premium payments in Government establishments:

In my opinion any such restriction upon the conduct of Government establishments would be highly inadvisable. The purpose for thus proposing the legislation is doubtless one which all of us would approve. Increased efficiency ought not to be purchased at the expense of health and other qualities essential to good citizenship and the general welfare, but no one can doubt that increased efficiency is essential to the public welfare, that we have not yet learned how best to secure that efficiency, and that the most important element in securing efficiency is the knowledge of facts, to the ascertainment of which time study is a means.

To prohibit time study and premium payment is as crude a method of affording to the workingman proper protection as the proverbial "burning of the house to roast the pig."

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that, if the House of Representatives is determined to "burn the house to roast the pig," the present hour, of all times, is the most inappropriate one in which to do it, because at no time in the history of our Republic has it been more important to speed up the production of war essentials than at the present hour.

THE USE OF TIME STUDY IN MANUFACTURING PLANTS.

A good deal of misinformation exists as to the use of the stop watch in time study of a given piece of work. Some gentlemen seem to think that it is used in the hands of a task master to speed the worker beyond his limit of endurance. The Government of the United States has never so used it, and, what is more than that, there is no danger whatever of its being so used. On this particular phase of the matter the minority report, to which I have heretofore referred, states:

The stop watch is used principally as a laboratory instrument. It is seldom used in the plant by a foreman standing over the workman timing him. It is used by way of experimenting in taking the operation that is to be performed and making a laboratory study of it before setting the time or determining what is a reasonable time in which to do or perform the operation. It is also extremely necessary to use the stop watch in deciding upon which of many methods is the best method to be used. As one mechanic illustrated, he took, for example, "the planing of a surface of iron or steel." There are four ways by which this may be done: It can be done on the planer, on the milling machine, or it can be done on the surface grinder or on the shaper. How is the manufacturer going to know which is the best method to employ without experimenting on it in the laboratory? The method to be used varies with every kind of material and every different shape of article.

All systems of scientific management that I have read anything about require that some time study be made of factory production in order to have efficient management. Therefore this amendment is sufficiently broad to condemn all of them. Likewise all such systems hold that the bonus or premium is essential as a part of the system as a reward for well-directed effort on the part of the employee. The adoption of this amendment prohibits the payment of such bonus or premium. So to sum up the whole matter this amendment can mean nothing else except a direct blow at Government efficiency, and in the light of the showing which has been made for it it has not a single leg to stand upon.

CONCLUSION.

While our allies are fighting with their backs to the wall against the unspeakable "Hun" and our own brave men are filling up the thinning ranks for the purpose of stemming the onrushing tide of Teutonic savagery, many of them at the price of their own lives, it is getting high time that everybody in this country was putting his shoulder to the wheel to speed us on the way to victory.

It is a broad statement, yet a true one, that America's first great victory will be won when the personal advantage and the personal privilege of each of us have been submerged in unselfish devotion to the common cause.

Capital and labor can well afford to defer their quarrels to another day, if, indeed, it is ever necessary to again renew them with the bitterness which has often existed in the past.

Mutual concessions must be made and criminations and recriminations should be abandoned in face of the common danger which threatens us from a common foe. For if Germany should win this war none of the rights of capital would be secure, and the rights which labor now enjoys, the best and most liberal of any nation in the world, would be thrown into the scrap heap and industrial slavery dictated by Prussian masters would rise to take their place.

Whatever class hatred there is—which has grown up in this country, much of it, under the nuturing care of demagogic agitators—should be forgotten, and the man who seeks to revive it should be looked upon as a public nuisance and be condemned by public opinion accordingly. No more democratic army was ever raised by any nation than that which is now battling for the honor and liberty of the Republic.

The son of the millionaire is fighting side by side with the son of the farmer, the miner, the artisan, and the mechanic. There is no distinction of honor and no difference of hardships. There should be none. There must be none.

Shoulder to shoulder and man to man they are fighting the world's greatest battle for democracy.

And, Mr. Chairman, when the storm and quake and withering fire of battle shall have died away, "when the shouting and the tumult dies and the captains and the kings depart," may this democratic Army return in triumph, bearing palms of victory with them, to take up again the happy and contented pursuits of peace.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we ought to face an amendment like this and not run away from it. It is a serious matter to the Government. In times of war I do not believe we should hamper the President of the United States, especially with respect to the largest war appropriation bill ever passed by any parliamentary body. We appropriate about $12,500,000,000 here. The money is given freely in taxes and loans from the people. Both sides of the House are united and harmonious in their desire to pass the bill in order to strengthen the work of the President in prosecuting the war. Yet just as we propose to put the finishing touches upon it we are asked to say, "Provided, Mr. President, you will operate the factories and the workshops just as we tell you to do."

There was a strange performance in the House a few days ago. I believe it was the first time such a scene has been enacted since this war was declared. We were passing an Agricultural appropriation bill, and we came to the largest item in it—an item for $6,000,000. Then came a surprise amendment and the House actually voted that the President might apply the $6,000,000 to the purposes of the war in the encouragement and conservation of the food supply, provided he first enacted prohibition in the United States. We had heard many pledges on the floor from both sides of the House, in which the speakers asserted their absolute and unqualified confidence in the President of the United States. They declared their absolute and unqualified desire to be found "standing by the President of the United States," and one of the boasts made by some of the gentlemen was that they did not propose that it should be said of them back home in their districts that they had cast one vote here that would interfere with the President, he whom we recognize and support as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, in the prosecution of this war.

Why, gentlemen, Samuel Gompers, the head of the American Federation of Labor, who may have his spokesmen here this afternoon, has indicated his desire to work with the President of the United States. He has preached it from the housetops, and so have the other labor leaders of the country. They have expressed their desire to work with the President.

Since this war began wages have gone up, just as the cost of living has gone up. Workmen have contributed generously of their labor to the common cause of prosecuting the war. But now comes the greatest war bill of them all, and strangely enough it comes on the very day that the Director General of Railroads has found it necessary to issue a public statement calling upon striking workmen over yonder in Alexandria to play fair with the Government. Mr. McAdoo, speaking for the Government and the President, has been obliged to say to those who would impede the war's progress that the cause of the Government must be supreme. Take up the morning paper and read the statement of Mr. Director General McAdoo. It is a call to workmen to be loyal to their flag. He tells the strikers that they are obstructing the war, and that the Government must rise superior to their personal wishes. Do we want to take issue with that proposition?

It is most untimely to come into this House when we are passing the greatest war bill of all the war bills and say to the President, as this amendment proposes to do: "Mr. Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, you may have this $12,500,000,000, but you must abide by the rules of the union in the various workshops or the war must stop."

Take the responsibility those of you who desire to vote for this amendment at this particular time. With you I value and appreciate the services of labor, but for one I am not willing to tie the hands of the President in these war times by this hamstringing amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN and Mr. KEATING rose.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I will yield in favor of the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that no Member of this House has the slightest desire to "hamstring" the President of the United States in the prosecution of this war. This amendment will not have that effect. The best evidence that it will not is that it has been on all the appropriation bills for four years. It is on the appropriation bills now. The Government of the United States is now transacting business under this limitation. It is the recognized rule of conduct in the Government workshops of this country, and no responsible official of this Government is asking that it be changed at this time.

The gentleman from Texas read a letter from the Secretary of War written more than a year ago, before we entered the war, written within two or three weeks after he became Secretary of War, and written probably at the suggestion of Gen. Crozier, a gentleman who, when the great test came, did not prove efficient himself. But the gentleman from Texas is not prepared to produce any paper to-day from the Secretary of War showing that he is demanding the repeal of this limitation.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. No; I have not the time. The gentleman had five minutes and did not present to the committee any later word from the Secretary of War. The Secretary of the Navy, in a letter I inserted in the RECORD two or three days ago, declared that the amendment did not prevent the establishment of efficiency in the workshops of the Navy, that as far as he was concerned he had no objection to its retention.

What is the attitude of the Secretary of War and the President of the United States? As I said a few moments ago, when the gentleman from New York was good enough to yield to me, the Secretary of War is president of the Council of National Defense, and one of the first things he did after we declared war was to assemble the members of the Council of National Defense, and they adopted an appeal to the legislatures and business men of this country to "maintain the existing safeguards as to the health and welfare of workers." That appeal went out all over the country and had a splendid effect.

The President of the United States, addressing the governor of the State of Pennsylvania, confirmed the position of the Council of National Defense in the following memorable letter:

I take pleasure in replying to your letter of June 1. I think it would be most unfortunate for any of the States to relax the laws by which safeguards have been thrown about labor. I feel that there is no necessity for such action, and it would be a slackening of the energy of the Nation which will increase all the time, and besides it is unfair to labor itself.

Now, the main object in urging the retention of this limitation is to preserve the existing harmonious relations between labor and the Government. No nation engaged in this war is in such a happy position concerning its labor problems as the Government of the United States. The gentleman from Pennsylvania referred to some little tuppenny strike out in Alexandria affecting two or three hundred men. In some of the belligerent countries thousands and tens of thousands of men have gone out on strikes.

To-day, in the month of May, the month of strikes, you have fewer men affected by industrial troubles in this country than you ever had at a similar period in any year during the last quarter of a century. [Applause.] I appeal to gentlemen in this House not to assist some labor hater to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery. We should retain this provision and thus keep faith with labor.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Assuming that the letter read by the gentleman from Texas from the Secretary of War states his position on this subject before we entered the war, what is there about the entry of the Nation into the war that should affect that?

Mr. KEATING. The Secretary of War has been managing our military affairs for more than a year. Does not the gentleman know that if the Secretary of War had found this limitation restricted output or interfered with the prosecution of the war, we should have the Secretary of War and the President himself here demanding the removal of the limitation?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think so.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman does not, he does not understand our Secretary of War, who would not permit anything to interfere with the prosecution of the war.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I assume that the Secretary of War has not changed his opinion overnight.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope this amendment will be added to the bill, so that the law will be left as it has been. I am opposed to a stop-watch system. I have seen it at work. I do not think it adds to efficiency. I have the honor to represent a district which is heavily engaged in work for the Army, for the aviation service, and for the shipping service. More than 10,000 soldiers are in there working not only in the mills but in the woods. We have put soldiers in with workingmen and have had no trouble. We have solved that problem, and are delivering the goods. I want no stop watch held on either soldiers or workers. I believe each class is equally patriotic. In my district, since the United States entered this war, we have by united effort delivered 22 ships. The neighboring district, represented by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] has delivered another 20 ships, and the district of my neighbor on the south [Mr. HAWLEY] also a large number. We have solved our labor problems and settled our differences. Why open them up? I do not think we will have other labor problems, even if you vote this down; but I believe that it is unwise to do unnecessary damage to labor at a time when it is patriotically performing its duty, working hard, and asking for neither bonus nor premium. Find a way to stop profiteering, great and small, and labor will be fully content with the wage it receives; but now everything goes up in a spiral—wages, fuel, food, rents, and clothing all in an endless chain, and the situation can not be helped by holding a stop watch on one link of that chain. Go down with me to one or two of these departments here in Washington, in overcrowded, overheated, sweltering rooms, and see girls working for the Government under the penalty efficiency system, and you will vote every time against it. It gets nowhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LUNN) there were—ayes 52, noes 53.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. DENT and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12281, and had directed him to report the same back to the House, with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. All those in favor of passing the bill will rise and stand until counted.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that while the House is dividing that motion is not in order. The gentleman can make it right after the Chair has announced the count on the division, but he can not stop the division by a demand of that sort.

The SPEAKER. That is correct, but the Chair fears it is too late now.

Mr. SHERLEY. I insist upon the division.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] One gentleman has arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I simply want the RECORD to show that the vote is unanimous.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. All those in favor of the passage of the bill will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-nine gentlemen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until counted. [After a pause.] No gentleman rises in opposition to it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I am told—and I did not know it until just this moment—that a number of gentleman have gone away, supposing there would be no roll call, and I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws his point of order. The bill is passed unanimously. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on this bill may have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Reserving the right to object, there are quite a number who were not permitted, on account of the rush for time, to speak on the bill, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that every Member of the House be permitted to extend his remarks if limited to this particular bill.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair never did put the original request, and that was that gentlemen who spoke on this bill should have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROMJUE], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR], the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MAYS], and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY] ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think unless these requests are limited to five legislative days I shall object. If these gentlemen all ask to extend their remarks within five legislative days I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not make the request and the Chair can not modify it.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent to modify these various requests by making it within five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts tacks on these requests the proposition that they be limited to five legislative days, and, taking the original requests in conjunction with this amendment, is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the amendment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects without the amendment, and the gentleman from Iowa with it, so you are all objected to.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock Monday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12280. An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3799. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. FISHER, for one week, on account of illness in the family.

To Mr. DRANE, for 10 days on account of official business.

To Mr. MCARTHUR, for to-morrow, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the tacking on I put on these requests in view of the desire of the gentleman from Iowa to get even with me for objecting to his extending a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to these gentlemen who asked to extend their remarks in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned to meet on Monday, June 3, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 3, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our trust is in Thee. We pray Thee to help us appreciate the supreme importance and value of spiritual things. We are in the midst of a world struggle which calls for the delivery of every element of force and power that we have at our command; may we not be tempted to leave the path that leads to God, for our dependence is upon the mighty arm of God. As we turn to Thee this morning at the beginning of this day's work give us, we pray Thee, power to make better distinctions, and to value spiritual things in their place as God would give us the light to see the sources of power for a mighty conflict like this. We pray that Thy spirit may guide us in the duties of this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, May 31, 1918, was read and approved.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION (S. DOC. NO. 229).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting a revised estimate of appropriation for certain employees for the public schools of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1919, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12280) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I send to the desk a telegram from the Texas Equal Suffrage Association in reference to the Federal suffrage amendment, which I ask to have set out in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUSTIN, TEX., May 31, 1918.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Washington, D. C.:

The Texas Equal Suffrage Association, in annual session assembled, directly representing 20,000 members and indirectly 500,000 women voters of Texas, do hereby vigorously protest against the Senate's delay in passing the suffrage amendment denying enfranchisement to 20,000,000 American women. As southern voters we ask Democratic Senators to register their belief in equality, intelligence, and loyalty of American women by passing at once the suffrage amendment. The Nation more than a year ago pledged itself to democracy both at home and abroad, and we respectfully ask Congress to now redeem this pledge. We ask you to present our protest to the Senate and have it read into the RECORD. Please answer.

MINNIE FISHER CUNNINGHAM, President.

Mr. GRONNA presented a petition of the North Dakota Medical Society, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide advanced rank for officers of the Medical Corps of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the fourth district of the North Dakota Federation of Women's Clubs, of Hope, N. Dak., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Woman's Club of New England, N. Dak., pledging support to the increased postal rates legislation recently enacted, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. I present a telegram addressed to the Senate of the United States in my care. It is short, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, June 1, 1918.

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
(Care Senator REED SMOOT), Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: The Young Ladies' National Mutual Improvement Association, numbering 35,000 young women in Utah and surrounding States, urges you to legislate for nation-wide prohibition.

MARTHA H. TINGEY, President.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have received several resolutions to Congress in the form of memorials from the Universal Franchise League of Huron, S. Dak., sent me by Mrs. Arla E. Willard and Verna T. Meyer; also a letter from Mrs. John L. Pyle, State president of the league, inclosing several editorials from South Dakota newspapers, requesting that the memorials and clippings be read into the RECORD. I also have a letter from Mrs. C. N. Herreid, of Aberdeen, S. Dak., inclosing a memorial from the Sunday Musical Club of Aberdeen on the same subject. I would like to have had these memorials printed in the RECORD, but knowing the recent rule adopted by the Senate and being advised that objection would be made, I desire to offer them and have them referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage for serious consideration.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to have read a telegram addressed to the United States Senate in my care from Hon. W. H. Patten, speaking for the Southern Baptist Convention.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

SHUBUTA, MISS., May 31, 1918.

UNITED STATES SENATE
(Care Hon. JAMES K. VARDAMAN),
Washington, D. C.:

Over 2,000 members at the Southern Baptist Convention, Hot Springs, urge the passage of war-time prohibition to hasten and insure victory. The enormous waste of men, money, food, fuel, and other war necessities through the liquor traffic is a crime against the men at the front and our God and puts our victory in jeopardy. Patriotism demands action at once.

W. H. PATTEN.

Mr. CALDER. I present a petition from the Religious Society of Friends in favor of woman suffrage, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS,
New York, Fifth Month, 30th, 1918.

To Hon. WILLIAM M. CALDER, of New York:

The Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, representing Friends in the States of New York and eastern New Jersey, in annual session at Fifteenth Street and Rutherford Place, New York City, is deeply concerned that the United States should recognize the right of women to a voice in her own government, particularly at a time like this, when other nations are enfranchising their women.

And therefore calls upon the President of the United States and the Senators from the States of New York and New Jersey to do all within their power to urge the immediate passage of the Federal suffrage amendment.

And directs that a copy of this minute be sent to President Wilson, Senator JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr., and Senator JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN and Senator DAVID BAIRD, of New Jersey.

ELLWOOD BURDSALL, Clerk.
JOSEPHINE H. TILTEN, Assistant Clerk.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have received two telegrams addressed to the Senate in my care in regard evidently to the amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill with reference to prohibition. I ask that the telegrams be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TUCUMCARI, N. MEX., May 31, 1918.

The CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES
(Care Senator A. A. JONES), Washington, D. C.:

Americans of Tucumcari are praying in great union service that God will give you grace and power from on high to exercise your vast authority in freeing America from the sin of the liquor traffic; that the national iniquity which may prevent Almighty God from hearing our prayers for speedy victory may be removed. Sent by resolution of mass meeting in session Memorial Day.

Harry H. McElroy, V. M. Dyer, H. M. Doughty, Ed Hall, J. Greshem, Thos. Coshow, E. Clark, L. Major, C. Cushack, O. D. Ferguson, Ed Saxon, H. Herndon, P. Headerlitt, Ira Furr, Mark Brown, C. Herndon, J. Ritz, Annie Hicks, F. M. Smith, A. Maddox, Roy Smith, F. Caruthers, O. Hixie, Walter W. Dobson, M. Walter, L. Jackson, L. Z. Payne, C. Hittson, Cora Hittson, President Woman's Christian Temperance Union, N. Reasoner, G. Ellis.

SANTA FE, N. MEX., May 31, 1918.

The UNITED STATES SENATE
(Care Hon. A. A. JONES), Washington, D. C.:

We, the people of Santa Fe, N. Mex., assembled on this national day of prayer, urge the passage of the Randall amendment to the administration food-production bill passed by the House, believing God will hear when the Nation ceases to do evil.

J. A. WOOD,
F. E. LOCKRIDGE,
C. E. LINNY,
Committee.

Mr. KENYON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Eldora, Iowa, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the faculty of the Leland Stanford University, of California, praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Equal Suffrage League, of Newton, Mass., and a petition of the College Equal Suffrage League, of Boston, Mass., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of A. D. Weld Post, No. 148, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Massachusetts, of Winchester, Mass., praying for an increase of pensions for veterans of the Civil War, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hamilton, Mont., praying for the fixing of prices of substitutes for wheat and wheat flour, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 4005) providing for the survey of public lands remaining unsurveyed in any of the surveying districts of Florida, with a view of satisfying the grant in aid of schools made to said State under the act of March 3, 1845, and other acts amendatory thereof, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 478) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2171) to abolish the United States land office at Springfield, Mo. (Rept. No. 477);

A bill (S. 2715) to authorize an exchange of lands with the State of Montana in connection with Muddy Creek Reservoir site, Sun River project, and Nelson Reservoir site, Milk River project, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 476); and

A bill (S. 4221) for the relief of private owners of lands within or near the Bitter Root National Forest, Mont. (Rept. No. 475).

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 4444) to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 479) thereon.

THE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 256, submitted by Mr. OWEN on the 31st ultimo, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized, during the Sixty-fifth Congress, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 4639) granting an increase of pension to John Doughty;

A bill (S. 4640) granting an increase of pension to George W. Martin;

Res. 157) admitting into the United States 1,000 cases of chartreuse ordered by Batjer & Co., of New York, before the passage of the food-control act prohibiting the importation of distilled spirits, the delivery of which was delayed on account of war conditions until after that act went into effect; to the Committee on Finance.

RETIREMENT OF CIVIL-SERVICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. McKELLAR. I introduce a bill for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The bill (S. 4637) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD for the information of Senators, and in connection with the bill I ask also that a summary of its provisions be printed to follow the bill.

There being no objection, the bill and the matter referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, beginning on the 1st day of July next following the passage of this act, all employees in the classified civil service of the United States who have on that date or shall have on any date thereafter reached the age of 68 years shall be eligible for retirement on an annuity as hereinafter provided: Provided, That mechanics, city and rural letter carriers, and railway mail clerks shall be eligible for retirement at 65 years of age: Provided further, That postmasters shall not be included in the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of determining the amount of annuity which retired employees shall receive the following classifications and rates shall be established:

Class A shall include all employees to whom this act applies who shall have served the United States for a total period of 30 years or more.

Class B shall include all employees to whom this act applies who shall have served the United States for a total period of 25 years or more, but less than 30 years.

Class C shall include all employees to whom this act applies who shall have served the United States for a total period of 20 years or more, but less than 25 years.

Class D shall include all employees to whom this act applies who shall have served the United States for a total period of 15 years or more, but less than 20 years.

The annuity to a retired employee in class A shall equal 50 per cent of such employee's average annual basic salary, pay, or compensation from the United States for the 10 years next preceding the date on which he or she retired: Provided, That in no case shall an annuity in this class exceed $600 per annum.

The annuity to a retired employee in class B shall equal 40 per cent of such employee's average annual basic salary, pay, or compensation from the United States for the 10 years next preceding the date on which he or she retired: Provided, That in no case shall an annuity in this class exceed $540 per annum.

The annuity to a retired employee in class C shall equal 30 per cent of such employee's average annual basic salary, pay, or compensation from the United States for the 10 years next preceding the date on which he or she retired: Provided, That in no case shall an annuity in this class exceed $480 per annum.

The annuity to a retired employee in class D shall equal 25 per cent of such employee's average annual basic salary, pay, or compensation from the United States for the 10 years next preceding the date on which he or she retired: Provided, That in no case shall an annuity in this class exceed $420 per annum.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of this act and subject to the provisions of section 10 hereof the period of service of an employee in the classified civil service shall be computed from original employment, whether as a classified or unclassified employee in the civil service of the United States, and shall include periods of service at different times and services in one or more departments, branches, or independent offices of the Government, and shall also include service performed under authority of the United States beyond seas or honorable service in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, either Regular or Volunteer: Provided, That in the case of an employee who is eligible for and elects to receive a pension on account of disability incurred in the line of duty the period of his military or naval service shall not be included for the purpose of assignment to classes defined in section 2 of this act.

It is further provided that in computing length of service for the purposes of this act periods of separation from the service shall be excluded, and that in the case of a substitute city carrier, postal clerk, or railway postal clerk only periods of active occupation in the duties for which he or she was employed shall be included.

SEC. 4. That the provisions of this act shall include employees of the Library of Congress and the Botanic Gardens, excepting such persons as may be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and may be extended by Executive order, upon recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, to include any employee or group of employees in the civil service of the United States not classified at the time of the passage of this act. The President shall have power, in his discretion, to exclude from the operation of this act or include therein any employee or group of employees whose tenure of office is intermittent or of uncertain duration.

SEC. 5. That all employees to whom this act applies shall, on arriving at the age of retirement as defined in section 1, be automatically separated from the service: Provided, That if not less than 90 days before the arrival of an employee at the age of retirement the head of the department, branch, or independent office of the Government in which he or she is employed certifies to the Director of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance that by reason of his or her efficiency and his or her willingness to remain in the civil service of the United States the continuance of such employee therein would be advantageous to the public service, such employee may be retained for a term not exceeding two years upon certification by the Director of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, and at the end of the two years he or she may, by similar certification, be continued for an additional term of two years, and so on: Provided, however, That at the end of 10 years after this act becomes effective no employee shall be continued in the civil service of the United States beyond the age of retirement specified in section 1 hereof for more than four years.

SEC. 6. That each employee who may become eligible for retirement as provided in this act shall, not less than 60 days before reaching the retirement age, file with the Director of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, in such form as he may prescribe, an application for an annuity, and said application shall be supported by a certificate from the head of the department, branch, or independent office of the Government in which the applicant has been employed, stating the age and period or periods of service of the applicant and salary, pay, or compensation received, as shown by the official records: Provided, however, That in the case of an employee who is to be continued in the service of the United States beyond the retirement age as provided in section 5 of this act no application for retirement and annuity as herein prescribed shall be filed with the Director of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance: And provided further, That failure to apply for retirement and annuity within 60 days after reaching the retirement age because of the pendency of an application for retention in the civil service shall not be construed to deprive any person of retirement and annuity.

Upon receipt of satisfactory evidence the Director of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance shall forthwith adjudicate the claim of the applicant, and, if title to an annuity be established, a proper certificate shall be issued to the annuitant under the seal of the Treasury Department, and such certificate shall become evidence of the right of the annuitant to the annuity as therein defined.

SEC. 7. That every employee to whom this act applies who shall continue in the civil service after the passage of this act, as well as every person to whom this act applies who may hereafter be appointed to a position or place, shall be deemed to consent and agree to the deductions made and provided for hereinafter, and payment with such deductions shall be a full and complete discharge and acquittance of all claims and demands whatsoever for all regular services rendered by such person during the period covered by such payment, except his or her claim for the benefits to which he or she may be entitled under the provisions of this act, notwithstanding the provisions of sections 167, 168, and 169 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and of any other law, rule, or regulation affecting the salary, pay, or compensation of any person or persons employed in the civil service to whom this act applies.

SEC. 8. That, beginning on the first day of the second month after the month in which this act is approved, there shall be deducted and withheld from the basic salary, pay, or compensation of each person to whom this act applies a sum equal to 2½ per cent of such person's basic salary, pay, or compensation. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the said deductions to be withheld from all specific appropriations for the particular salaries or compensation from which the deductions are made and from all allotments out of lump-sum appropriations for payments of such salaries or compensation for each fiscal year, and said sums shall be transferred on the books of the Treasury Department to the credit of a special fund to be known as "the civil-service retirement fund," and shall be credited, together with interest thereon at 4 per cent per annum, compounded annually, to the individual account of the employee from whose salary or compensation the deduction was made. Such "civil-service retirement fund" is hereby appropriated for the payment of annuities, refunds, and allowances as provided in this act. There is also appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum which, when added to the deductions herein provided and transferred from other appropriations under the provisions of this act, shall be sufficient to make payments provided by this act: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered to invest, from time to time, in interest-bearing securities of the United States, such portions of the "civil-service retirement fund" hereby created as, in his judgment, may not be immediately required for the payment of annuities, refunds, and allowances as herein provided, and the income derived from such investments shall constitute a part of said fund for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 11 of this act.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered in carrying out the provisions of this act to establish special funds supplementing individual contributions by the employees and to receive, invest, and disburse for such purpose all moneys in the form of donations, gifts, legacies, bequests, or otherwise, which may be contributed by private individuals or corporations or organizations for the benefit of the civil-service employees generally or any special class of employees.

SEC. 9. That annuities as herein provided shall be paid monthly, and checks shall be issued and mailed to the last-known address of the annuitant on the first business day of the month succeeding the month in which the annuity becomes due: Provided, That where an annuitant is laboring under legal disabilities the annuity in such cases may be paid to the duly appointed guardian.

SEC. 10. That upon the transfer of any employee from unclassified to classified status, or upon the reinstatement of a former employee to the service, credit for such past service or for any part thereof shall be granted only upon the payment to the Treasurer of the United States, within 90 days of such transfer or reinstatement, of the amount of such deductions with interest as provided in this act as would have been made for the periods of actual service or part thereof for which credit is to be given. Interest shall not be computed, however, for periods of separation from the service.

SEC. 11. That in the case of an employee in the classified civil service of the United States who shall be transferred to an unclassified position, and in the case of any employee to whom this act applies who shall become absolutely separated from the service before reaching the retirement age the total amount of deductions of salary, pay, or compensation with accrued interest computed at the rate of 4 per cent per annum compounded annually, shall, upon application, be returned to such employee; and in event of the death of an employee before he shall have received in annuities an amount equal to the total amount of the deductions from his salary or compensation together with interest thereon at 4 per cent per annum compounded annually up to the time of his death, the excess of the said accumulated deductions over the said annuity payments shall be paid in one sum to his or her legal representatives upon the establishment of a valid claim therefor.

SEC. 12. That for the purpose of administration, except as otherwise provided herein, the Director of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to perform, or cause to be performed, any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

SEC. 13. That payment of annuities, refunds, and allowances as herein provided shall be made by the disbursing clerk for the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, and with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, checks in payment of annuities may be drawn without separate vouchers or receipts, but in such form as to protect the United States against loss: Provided, That vouchers shall be required in all cases in which payment of annuities, refunds, or allowances are to be made to some person other than the annuitant, and in all other cases in which the Secretary of the Treasury may deem it necessary.

SEC. 14. That it shall be the duty of the head of each executive department and the head of each independent establishment of the executive branch of the Government not within the jurisdiction of any executive department to report to the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in such manner as said bureau may prescribe the name and grade of each employee to whom this act applies in or under said department or establishment who shall be at any time in a nonpay status, and the amount of basic salary, pay, or compensation lost by the employee by reason of such absence. The Bureau of War-Risk Insurance shall keep such record of appointments, transfers, changes in grade, separations from the service, and losses of pay as shall enable it at all times to determine accurately the amount of salary, pay, or compensation deducted and withheld from any individual under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall prepare and keep all needful tables, records, and accounts required for carrying out the provisions of this act, including data showing the mortality experience of the officers and employees in the service and the rate of withdrawal from such service, and any other information that may serve as a guide for future valuations and adjustments of the plan for the retirement of officers and employees. The Secretary of the Treasury shall make a detailed comparative report annually to Congress showing all receipts and disbursements, together with the total number of persons receiving annuities and the amounts paid them.

SEC. 16. That none of the moneys mentioned in this act shall be assignable, either in law or equity, or be subject to execution, levy, or attachment, garnishment, or other legal process.

SEC. 17. That for clerical and other services and all other expenses necessary in carrying out the provisions of this act, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $100,000, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which sum shall be immediately available and continue available until the end of the fiscal year next after the passage of this act; thereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall include in his annual estimate of appropriations a sum sufficient to continue this act in full force and effect.

SEC. 18. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

PROVISIONS OF RETIREMENT BILL.

Section 1: Classified civil employees covered. Postmasters excluded. Eligibility age for retirement, 65 for mechanics, city or rural letter carriers, railway postal clerks; 68 for others.

Section 2: Service required and life pension provided: Thirty years or more defines class A, pension 50 per cent, maximum $600; 25 up to 30 years defines class B, pension 40 per cent, maximum $540; 20 up to 25 years defines class C, pension 30 per cent, maximum $480; 15 up to 20 years defines class D, pension 25 per cent, maximum $420.

Section 3: All United States Government service counted (subject to sec. 10 deduction adjustment if necessary). Military or naval service counted unless receiving military or naval pension. Periods of separation not counted. The substitute postal employees covered credited with only periods of active employment.

Section 4: Library of Congress and Botanic Garden employees included, except presidential. Executive order may cover in employees not now classified. President may exclude or include employees of intermittent or uncertain tenure.

Section 5: Successive two-year continuances. Upon certification by head of department or branch at least 90 days prior, of efficiency. Ten years after passage of act, absolute age limits 69 and 72.

Section 6: Application for annuity, unless continued under section 5. Made to Director Bureau of War-Risk Insurance at least 60 days prior to retirement. Certification by head of department or branch as to age and pay. Treasury Department certificate evidence to right to annuity.

Section 7: Continuance of employment deemed consent to deductions. Return of deductions and payment of pensions shall be full acquittance of claims for service.

Section 8: Deductions 2½ per cent of (basic) pay. Withheld from salary appropriations. Transferred on Treasury books to "civil-service retirement fund." Credited to individual account with 4 per cent compound interest. Secretary of Treasury to invest funds not immediately payable.

Section 9: Annuities payable monthly.

Section 10: Deductions at interest to be made up for credit desired for service for which deductions had not been made.

Section 11: Total return to employee or legal representative in no case less than total deductions accumulated at 4 per cent interest.

Section 12: Administration by Director Bureau of War-Risk Insurance.

Section 13: Payments made by disbursing clerk of Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in such form as to protect United States against loss.

Section 14: Records of appointments, transfers, separations, nonpay periods, and pay thus lost to employee. Head department or branch to report. Director Bureau War Risk to record.

Section 15: Secretary of Treasury to keep all other needful tables and records for future valuations or adjustments. To report annually to the Congress on conditions of the fund.

Section 16: Moneys not assignable or attachable.

Section 17: Appropriation for clerical and other services: One hundred thousand dollars first year, then such sums as necessary.

Section 18: Repeal of inconsistent law.

INCREASE OF NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. FRANCE. I introduce a bill for further increasing the Naval Establishment of the United States, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (S. 4638) making appropriations for the purpose of further increasing the Naval Establishment of the United States was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of further increasing the Naval Establishment of the United States the President of the United States is hereby authorized to undertake, prior to September 1, 1918, the construction of the battle cruisers enumerated below:

Twenty battle cruisers, carrying suitable armor and, when fully completed, as powerful armament as any vessels of their class, to have the highest possible or practicable speed and greatest desirable radius of action, at a cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $22,000,000 each: Provided, That work upon these shall be begun as soon as practicable in order that they may be utilized at the earliest possible date, even before they shall be fully equipped with armament, for the purpose of facilitating or protecting the transport of troops or for other services.

SEC. 2. That the President be further authorized to undertake the construction of 10 scout cruisers, carrying suitable protection and armament suited to their size and type, to have the highest practicable speed and greatest desirable radius of action, at a cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $9,000,000 each, to be begun as soon as practicable but not later than January 1, 1919.

SEC. 3. That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $600,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the carrying out of the provisions of this act.

CONSIDERATION OF TREATIES—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BORAH. I submit a proposed amendment to Senate resolution 235 with reference to amending the rules of the Senate. I ask that the proposed amendment be read and lie on the table, to be offered as an amendment when the matter comes up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add the following as a new section:

That all treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in its open or legislative session unless four-fifths of the Members of the Senate by yea-and-nay vote shall determine to close the doors during the consideration of the particular treaty upon which the vote to close the doors is taken.

That this rule shall not be limited to the period of the war.

AMENDMENTS TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In behalf of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS], who is absent, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which I ask may be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I submit a proposed amendment to the Army appropriation bill. It is very short, and I ask that it may be read by the Secretary.

The amendment was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Add at the end thereof the following:

"That the President is hereby authorized and directed to immediately proceed to increase the National Army to not less than 5,000,000 enlisted men and such additional officers as may be necessary for such force, exclusive of noncombatant forces that may be employed either in the United States or abroad; and the President is further hereby requested to report to Congress what additional legislation and what additional appropriations will be necessary to carry this provision into effect in the shortest possible time; and, as nearly as may be, what time will be required to raise, equip, and put such force in the service in France or elsewhere outside the United States."

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on May 31, 1918, approved and signed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12281. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DATA RELATIVE TO PROFITEERING AND THE REVENUE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has the morning business been disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to call up for consideration Senate resolution 235.

Mr. BORAH. May I make an inquiry before that is done with reference to resolution 253, coming over from a former day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator wishes to call it up, he has a right to do so.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that it may lie over without prejudice, due to the fact that a Senator has suggested that he might desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the Chair has heretofore ruled that there is no rule which requires the Chair to lay before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day; that it is a matter within the control of the Senator who introduced it, and he has a right to call it up just before the close of morning business; that such resolutions do not go to the calendar until after they have been called up and discussed.

Mr. BORAH. I shall defer calling up the resolution until the Senator who spoke to me is ready to proceed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not exactly understand the inquiry of the Senator from Idaho or the ruling of the Chair as to the status of the resolution. Does the Chair hold that Senate resolution 235 is in order at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. BORAH. I was speaking with reference to another resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, with reference to another resolution.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolution No. 235, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the Committee on Rules is to substitute for the resolution the following:

Resolved, That during the period of the present war the rules of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following:

"That no Member shall occupy more than 1 hour in debate, unless by unanimous consent, on any bill or resolution and not over 20 minutes on each amendment proposed thereto."

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I do not propose to make any extended argument upon the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama, which has been reported from the Committee on Rules. I simply desire in a very few words to express my opinion as to the very great importance of the adoption of this rule.

I certainly have no disposition, Mr. President, nor do I believe there is any disposition on either side of the Chamber to curtail legitimate debate on any matter that may come before the Senate, but I do feel that the time has arrived when the Senate ought to assert some authority, some influence on the debates which take place here.

When the Senate was a smaller body and the sense of responsibility of each Senator more direct and more acute the Senate got along practically without any rules, but with the growth in numbers in the Senate and the development of a disposition to debate elaborately most questions that come before the body we have at times found ourselves seriously embarrassed by the lack of some rule to control the debates.

I have been in the Senate, Mr. President, a little more than 23 years. Of course, I may be mistaken, and I do not speak with any dogmatic idea, but on few occasions, if any, since I have been in the Senate during the 23 years has there been a time when a Senator might not have expressed his views fully under the rule now reported from the Committee on Rules—1 hour on the main question and 20 minutes on each amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia his opinion about the construction of the rule. As I heard it read it simply provides that no Senator shall speak longer than one hour. I should like to ask the Senator whether, if the rule were adopted, he thinks a Senator under that rule would have the right, provided, of course, he could get the floor in the regular way, to talk, say, 30 minutes on a bill and at another time, if the bill were still before the body, talk another 30 minutes. In other words, would he have to use his entire hour at once or could he speak as often as he pleased within the limit fixed if he divided up the time?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, my judgment is that under the proposed rule presented a Senator would have a right to speak as many times as he saw fit, so that he did not in the aggregate occupy more than one hour on a bill or more than 20 minutes on an amendment. If there is any doubt on that subject, I should be very glad if the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would so modify his resolution as to remove from the minds of all Senators every doubt on that subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will allow me, I desire to call his attention to the fact that I think there can be no doubt on that question. The rule provides:

That no Member shall occupy more than one hour in debate, unless by unanimous consent, on any bill or resolution.

The limitation is one hour in debate; there is no limitation on the number of speeches a Senator may make.

Mr. NORRIS. I had not read the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So I do not think there would be any question in the world that a Senator might make a speech for 30 minutes, then yield the floor, and then, in the usual procedure, again get the floor and again speak upon the pending measure for 30 minutes; but, except by unanimous consent, of course he would be limited to one hour in the aggregate of speeches made.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think there is any doubt about that construction.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not myself believe there is any doubt about it.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think it would be possible to put any other construction upon it.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume that of course the same construction would apply as to the 20-minute limitation of debate on an amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. I think there is no doubt as to that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Virginia said a moment ago that in his long service in the Senate he could not remember a time when a Senator could not properly express his opinion upon a bill within one hour; but can not the Senator remember that on many occasions it would be absolutely impossible for a Senator to express his opinion or his judgment upon certain amendments in 20 minutes? Sometimes, may I say to the Senator, an amendment offered is infinitely more important than is the bill itself?

Mr. MARTIN. I think a Senator can state in 20 minutes his reasons for supporting or opposing any amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As an example, Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] this morning introduced an amendment to this very resolution, which would revolutionize the methods pursued by the Senate for 120 years in the discussion of treaties; and under this resolution, were it in force, no Senator could speak over 20 minutes on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. MARTIN. That proposition is one that extends to a very limited scope, and I am sure that any Senator can say all that he needs to say on that subject in 20 minutes.

Right here I will say, able as is the Senator from Idaho, and cogently as he presents his reasons from time to time on matters before the Senate, I doubt if he has ever occupied more than an hour on any bill since he has been in the Senate. His speeches are short; he rarely occupies so much as 20 minutes on an amendment, and rarely, if ever, as much as an hour on a bill. Senators who have occupied more than that time have done so by reason of the latitudinous rules of the Senate, not that they could not, if they saw fit to do so, condense their views within the limits fixed by this proposed rule.

As I have said, I do not believe the Senator from Idaho has ever delivered a speech here occupying more than an hour or on an amendment made a speech occupying more than 20 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the fact that the Senator from Virginia favors this resolution proposing a radical amendment of the Rules of the Senate is in itself very significant. I think I am violating no confidence among the Senator's friends when I say that he is rather a new convert to the doctrine of applying a rigid rule in debate.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator will excuse me right there, I will say he was never wider of the mark than that. After I was elected to the Senate, and before I qualified, I made a speech in Virginia at a college commencement in which I urged that the rules of the Senate be modified in order that the Senate should control its business; and I have never departed from that idea one single instant in my twenty-three years of service as a Senator in this body.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I know the Senator from Virginia was committed to that proposition as he entered the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN. And I have adhered to it since I came to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is not a single Senator who is not committed to it before he enters the Senate, and every Member of the other House comes here committed to a more rigid rule in debate. My friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] got his ideas, undoubtedly, from the procedure of the House of Representatives, where real debate is practically unknown and the individual Member, no matter how able, is from every point of view minimized, while over here, where the membership is smaller, he is maximized, and the State he represents can not be imposed upon without his consent. Generally speaking, this latitude in debate is not abused and desirable results can always be obtained.

I had the pleasure of coming to Congress at the same time the Senator from Virginia entered the Senate, and during all that time I have been one of his admirers. I have watched his course with a great deal of interest, and his rise to party leadership has been a matter of profound satisfaction to me. But this is the first time I have ever heard him say anything about the necessity for a drastic cloture in Senate procedure on the floor of the Senate. I have occasionally heard expressions of regret when delays became vexatious, but I want to say to the Senator from Virginia that the rule under which we are now operating has in the main been most wholesome. I hope I am not intruding upon the time of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN. I have yielded, but not for a very long speech.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I am intruding I will gladly wait until the Senator has finished.

Mr. President, such cloture as is now proposed would have minimized the sacred rights of States, and I have seen the rights of States successfully defended by the latitude of debate. The Senator from Virginia will recall, I have no doubt, the fight which I made 10 years ago, standing in my place in this Chamber, against the British-American waterway treaty, which would have deprived my State of valuable water rights along the Canadian border which belonged to the State of Michigan, and which there was no possible way of preserving except by the power to delay a vote and an appeal to the fair-mindedness of Senators upon both sides of the Chamber. Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, then in the minority, came to my relief and saved my State from being grossly imposed upon by a treaty with Great Britain, Senators from other States would have been guided by the Executive, who had no interest in Michigan, but only in the Nation as a whole.

But, sir, as the specially commissioned representative of my State it fell to my lot to protect her interests, and through our unbridled procedure amendments to the treaty were made on the last day of the session, for which service the legislature of Michigan and the people of our State were truly grateful. Surely, Senators, you are not now to forego for all time this powerful weapon against injustice and wrong, reestablishing the party caucus decree as the binding rule in legislation in the Senate.

I think—and I say it with very great respect for the Senator from Virginia—it would be a great mistake now to adopt such a rule, when there is no possible confusion, when his wishes as majority leader in all war measures are our wishes, when the wishes of the leader on the other side of the Chamber and of the dominant party here on the conduct of the war are our wishes upon this side of the Chamber. We have never interposed in any way our right to unlimited discussion and have not thwarted the purposes of the other side at any angle, and if there is a reason now why we should make this radical departure from established custom, surely it should be so cogent and so powerful as to command respect from both sides of the Chamber.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, referring to the personal allusions made by the Senator who has just taken his seat, I want to say that I realize, so far as my official duties here have been concerned, that I have been treated with just as much consideration by the Republican side of the Chamber as I have been by the Democratic side of the Chamber. I appreciate the kindness and the consideration which have been shown to me more than words can express. This, however, is not a matter that is brought forward from one side of the Chamber, but it is brought forward for the consideration of the Senate as a body. It is not a cloture rule; it is not stringent in any of its aspects. It allows a Senator 1 hour on any bill or resolution and 20 minutes on each amendment. A Senator may divide that time up—he need not speak all at once—just so that in the aggregate he consumes no more time than that.

Referring to the matter of such importance to the State of the Senator from Michigan, suppose it had been before the Supreme Court of the United States, how much time would have been allotted to him to argue it there?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator's question is not quite fair. This is the forum of the people in a representative Government. They have commissioned us here to do their bidding. The bar of the Supreme Court have only been commissioned to proceed under the law with briefs and limited latitude, but here we make the law; and there should be no such restrictions and restraints as appertain to court procedure.

Mr. MARTIN. It need take no longer to argue a question here than it takes to argue it before the Supreme Court of the United States, in my humble judgment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator is wrong. The time we spend here is mostly spent in adjusting differences of opinion, exchanging views, and bringing together the divergent views of many States. The Supreme Court sits together in judgment upon our work, and could, if they desired, restrict argument entirely to written briefs; but here we have to get an audience of Senators, and if they are busy in committee a quorum must be obtained and we must prolong our discussion until we can reach their ears. It is an altogether different situation from that suggested by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the object of this rule is to get an audience for Senators. Under it debate is to be limited to an hour on the main question and 20 minutes on each amendment; and, if that is done, Senators will sit in their seats and listen to the arguments of Senators as they are made.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator would explain wherein the present cloture rule will fail to procure the desired results. I wish to agree with the Senator; I want to shorten debate; but we adopted a rule only a very short time ago for cloture, and I wish the Senator, who has given this matter great consideration, would explain to the Senate wherein that rule of cloture is inefficient and will not meet the present requirements.

Mr. MARTIN. The proposed rule is not, strictly speaking, a cloture rule. If it is adopted it will limit the time to be consumed in debate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know that; but the purpose of it, I assume, is to hurry legislation, to advance legislation as rapidly as possible through the two branches of Congress; and, as the purpose of the resolution is exactly the same as the purpose back of the adoption of the cloture rule, I again ask the Senator to explain wherein the cloture rule will fail to secure the rapid enactment of legislation?

Mr. MARTIN. It is an entirely different proposition. As my friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] suggests, the cloture rule was primarily intended to prevent what we call filibusters. The proposed rule now pending is to limit the time consumed in debate; and the limitation is to apply only to the period of the war.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. Right at that point, if, in arguing for the adoption of the amended rule, the Senator from Virginia will tell the Senate why we should adopt a rule for the war time and not continue it in the aftertimes of peace, I will be very much interested. I ask him to do that because, in my judgment, the work of the United States Senate will never be more important than now; and it seems to me that if the rule is a good thing in these most extraordinary times it ought to be the permanent policy of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, experience may lead to that conclusion. Certainly during the war there may be occasions when expedition is vitally important. I think it is vitally important right now. I am drifting into more extended remarks than I contemplated. I did not intend to do more than briefly express my opinion about this resolution; but its importance and the questions that have been propounded have led me into a more protracted discussion of the matter than I had contemplated.

Just at this very moment, Mr. President, we are confronted with a very serious situation. Senators are worn out with their long and arduous work, and it is very important that the necessary legislation shall be expedited as much as possible. I want every Senator to have all the opportunity that is necessary to present his views to the Senate on every question that may be brought before it; but I do want him held to the narrowest limits that are compatible with a fair and reasonable expression of his views and arguments.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator from Virginia, with his consent, that in cases like the one cited by the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] a moment ago, under this rule the Senate could always be relied upon to hear a Senator for an indefinite length of time, because the proposed rule provides that a Senator may speak, with the consent of the Senate, beyond the limit fixed in the resolution; and in a matter affecting a Senator's State, as in the case mentioned by the Senator from Michigan, there would be no trouble, I apprehend, about the Senator being accorded all the time that he might desire.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator from Virginia pardon an interruption?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to say to the Senator from Mississippi that it would have been simply impossible to have gotten unanimous consent in this Chamber in that treaty fight. The session was ending under the Constitution. I was at odds with all the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations upon this side of the Chamber, and I got my strength from the other side of the Chamber; and it would have been impossible for me to have obtained unanimous consent to delay ratification. If the proposed amendment had been the rule of the Senate, it would have passed quickly and unjustly. Such has been the experience of other Senators.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not see how a Senator could get his consent to refuse another Senator the right to debate fully a question of the character mentioned by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, as I have said, at this particular time Senators are weary bodily and mentally; they have been under great pressure for a long time; and, so far as I am personally concerned, I am exceedingly anxious to see the necessary legislation disposed of, and that then the Senate may recess, either for a long time or at intervals, while the Finance Committee, which has the laboring oar on the revenue bill, devotes itself to the formation of that measure.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Since the war began has there been any unusual debate or delay in connection with any war measure?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not recall that there has been.

Mr. HARDWICK. There has been nothing that would have been done more rapidly under the proposed rule than without it?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not recall the history of all these matters; but, as I say, it is not from any spirit of complaint that this proposed rule springs. I have no doubt about the attitude of the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. What I have in mind, if the Senator will pardon me, is that even if there might be a reasonable argument for this rule in that there is necessity of speeding up legislation, our past experience does not prove any necessity for it at all, for we have gotten along all right without it; there has been no unusual debate; and no long arguments have been made.

Mr. MARTIN. Oh, well, Mr. President, we have gotten along in a way, but we have gotten along very badly, not as to war measures, perhaps, because the Senate is ultrapatriotic. I do not question the patriotism of any Senator on this floor; and I believe they are all ready to make sacrifices and to do what is necessary for the conduct of this war; but I believe that this rule will facilitate the dispatch of business, and do no injustice to any Senator or to any State. I think right now there is more than ordinary reason for speeding up legislation in order that Senators may have a much-needed rest. The proposed rule is a very simple one, but it is not a rigorous one; it does not interfere with the reasonable rights of any Senator, and, as I have already stated, there is not likely to be any question about which a Senator can not give his views reasonably and sufficiently in an hour on the main bill and 20 minutes on each amendment. I have never known a case where more than that time was actually needed—I will not say I have never known a case, for there may have been a few—but if more time is really needed than afforded under the proposed rule, there will be no difficulty about getting unanimous consent whenever a Senator has not concluded his remarks and desires additional time in order to give essential views on an important measure. There is no trouble in the Senate about that. If there is one thing that the Senate is more liberal about than any other body in the world, it is in the courtesy of its Members to each other. It would be a very peculiar situation when a Senator could not get unanimous consent for a reasonable extension of his remarks when he asked it. There is no difficulty about that. The rule is a reasonable one and a just one; and under it, with the opportunity for unanimous consent on extraordinary occasions, I say the fullest possible necessary debate can easily be had.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I see no reason why unanimous consent should be required to give an extension of time. If the Senate desires to give an extension of time to any Senator, it ought to be capable of being done by a motion, if the Senate controls itself.

Mr. SMOOT. One vote would stop it under this resolution.

Mr. OWEN. One vote ought not to stop it. That is the point I make.

Mr. MARTIN. When a Senator has had an hour on the main question, and has had 20 minutes on each amendment, I think he might very readily put up with the rule as it is written and not expect to proceed further unless he can get unanimous consent. I think the rule is a reasonable one; I think it will help in the dispatch of business, and I sincerely hope it will be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I share the Senator's opinion that the Senate ought to expedite its business, especially during the war. I have been here only a very short time, but I can remember that on one or two occasions it would have been impossible for the Senators who were chiefly interested in the matters that were pending to present to the Senate in an hour what they ought to have presented. I know that the Senator from Virginia has had occasion oftener than I have to observe matters of that kind. I could call attention to certain resolutions which have been introduced in this body, and which have been acted upon, where it would have been absolutely impossible for any Senator to present his views properly in an hour. Does the Senator think that on any question affecting a Senator's personal liberty, or on a question of personal privilege, there should be such thing as a limitation of time?

Mr. MARTIN. I will say to the Senator that I do not believe there has ever originated in the history of this country a question of personal liberty or of personal privilege when the views of a Senator could not have been presented in one hour.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not care to name the cases, but the Senator knows that there have been cases here where it would have been absolutely impossible for the Senator, I might say, whose position was challenged, to present his views in the time allowed by this proposed rule. We had before us here two or three years ago a case of that kind, and the Senator from Virginia knows that it took several days for the Senator involved to present his case.

Mr. MARTIN. Several days were consumed, but I do not think it should have taken several days.

Mr. GRONNA. If the resolution is adopted, and the rules are changed, I think a Senator should have in his own right the privilege to speak on a question of personal privilege without reference to this limitation. I believe that the proposed rule ought to be amended in that respect.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senate will never deny a Senator the privilege, if there be occasion for him to occupy more than an hour. It is hard to conceive of a case that would require more than an hour. Too much talk is not argument. There is no case, though it involves the rights of a citizen or the rights of a State or the constitutional liberty of the people of this country, in which the Supreme Court of the United States allows more than one hour. It does not take so much time to present the views on these questions. Of course, the time can be consumed, but the time is not necessary. The argument can be condensed. A great deal may be said in one hour. I do not recall a single instance when all that was necessary to be said might not have been said in one hour.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. I offered an amendment to this resolution this morning providing for open sessions of the Senate with reference to treaties coming before the Senate. Has the Senator concluded how he feels about that amendment, whether it would be acceptable to those who are advocating this resolution or not?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I hope that will be eliminated and will be presented as a separate proposition. Personally, I am opposed to open debate on treaties. I think we have gotten along very well during the entire history of the Government under the rule of secret sessions in the consideration of treaties. There are times when they should be considered in open session, and the Senate can so order whenever it sees fit; but speaking personally, and not having exchanged views with a single Senator on the floor, I do not think it desirable to change that rule, and personally I shall vote against an amendment to that effect. I should like to have it go over to some other time, and let this come up as a plain, simple, narrow proposition, and not be embarrassed by bringing in other questions.

Mr. President, I have consumed more time than I intended. I have strong convictions, I have sincere feelings, about this matter. I believe this rule will facilitate the dispatch of business in the Senate and that it will afford every reasonable opportunity for legitimate debate, and I sincerely hope it will be adopted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I am anxious that we may have an opportunity to get a vote on this question and have the Senate decide affirmatively whether it intends to adopt a rule or not to adopt a rule for the limitation of debate during the war period.

Mr. President, the basis of our Government is the rule of the majority. Of necessity, the rule of the majority must be the basis of all government that is organized and not autocratic. Of course, I do not mean by that to say that the minority ought not to be represented, that the minority has not the right to be heard, that the minority has not the right to have its proposals considered; but in the last analysis, if we are to have a government the majority must rule. That is the whole spirit of our Republic.

In my judgment, the reason why a rule establishing limitation on debate in the Senate never has been adopted up to this time is not because the country is in danger if the power of the minority to cause unusual delay is not continued in the Senate. When the present rules of the Senate were adopted and the procedure, so far as debate is concerned, became a part of the rules of this body, there were 26 Senators of the United States; and for many years afterwards, for nearly a half century, the membership of this body was not largely increased. It must be apparent to all that the question of a parliamentary body conducting its business resolves itself entirely into a question of the number of men who must transact business in the body. As the report in this case says, if you had a triumvirate consisting of three men there would be no difficulty in their transacting their business without a chairman, without rules of procedure, and without limitation on the time of debate; but if you had a legislative body composed of a thousand men, of necessity you could not do business without having a presiding officer, without having rules of procedure, and unless the majority of that thousand men were authorized to close debate and proceed to transact business and dispose of it at any hour and any time.

The condition in the United States Senate has materially changed since the adoption by the original Senate of the United States of this rule providing for unlimited debate. Twenty-six men could transact their business, and do it efficiently, without a rule limiting the time of debate. To-day there are 96 Members of this body. It must be apparent to all that a small minority can stop the legislative wheels, slow down the machine, and prevent business being transacted, unless some limitation is placed on debate.

The Rules Committee, instead of proposing to the Senate a resolution authorizing a majority of the Senate by motion to order the previous question and cut off debate, have concluded that the same result may be obtained and that the legitimate transaction of business may be expedited without a gag rule, without placing in the hands of the majority the power to cut off all debate, but by merely limiting to a reasonable time the power of a single Senator to occupy the floor of the Senate.

If this resolution should not be adopted, why not? In the first place, it is not proposed to ask the Senate to adopt it as its final conclusion for all time to come. The terms of the resolution itself limit its operation to the period of the war.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. Just at that point I should like the Senator to explain whether or not this resolution would affect legislation after the active hostilities had ceased, not relating to the prosecution of the war—for I apprehend that to be the main reason for introducing it now—but looking toward the settlement and adjustment of the relations of this country with our allies and with all foreign countries. Very important measures may then come up that ought to be debated very elaborately. And a further question: Would it affect the deliberations of the Senate in considering any treaty of peace that might be negotiated and upon which the Senate would be compelled to pass?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The resolution says "during the period of the present war." I take it that the period of the present war will last until a treaty of peace is signed, and therefore that the resolution would be effective until that day; and I see no reason why it should not be effective until that day. The after-the-war business of the Congress undoubtedly will not present itself until a treaty of peace is signed, because the Congress must know with surety that the war has been concluded and peace has come to the country before it can attempt to adjust its legislation to peace conditions.

As to the question whether there should be a limitation on the power of debate in considering a peace treaty, I see no reason why there should not be a limitation of debate. It may be most important to have a limitation of debate. More than that, I take it that when the hour comes that a final treaty of peace is signed by the President of the United States and submitted to this body for its ratification, when the world is ready to make peace, when the nations of the world through their executive heads have signed a treaty of peace, it would be a very bold man indeed who would stand in the Senate to stop the consummation of such a treaty. The probabilities are, of course, that when that final treaty of peace comes before the Senate, there will be many things in it that will not meet with your approval or my approval. If we waited until we got a treaty of peace on which we could all agree as being exactly what we wanted, we might wait forever.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator think that the cloture rule which is now incorporated in the rules of the Senate would take care of the situation which he is now describing in connection with the discussion of a treaty of peace?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would take care of it in one way; yes. It would take care of it with a gag proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would it not take care of it in all statesmanlike ways?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; not at all. It would not accomplish the purpose of this proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator what would be the purpose of this proposed rule as applied to the debate in the United States Senate on the treaty which shall end this war?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state the question. I think it very pertinent to the whole rule. If we had a rule authorizing the ordering of the previous question that was effective, that could be put in operation so as to limit debate and at the same time have a thorough consideration of the questions before the Senate, it would be far from my purpose to offer an amendment to change it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me to answer the question of the Senator from New York first, then I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the rule that we have now in the Senate, adopted at the beginning of this Congress, is ineffective except for one purpose, and that is that when there is a deliberate, systematic filibuster on, when a small minority is attempting to prevent the majority from doing business, then, in the course of time it can be put into operation and made effective so far as concerns bringing the main question to an issue and voting on it; but it does not bring the main question to an issue with fair and just consideration of the questions involved. In other words, it is not at all probable that you could get the previous question ordered under the present rule of the Senate until there had been unlimited debate for a long time.

As a general rule, that debate would be confined to the main question, it would be confined to the main purpose, and would not come down to a real consideration of the amendments or a proper shaping of the legislation before the Senate.

Then when 16 Members of this body sign the petition and send it to the desk and it is read, the Senate would have to wait over a day before it could consider it, with practically 48 hours intervening between the time when the Senate was prepared to order a cloture and when it could make cloture effective. And when it did order cloture, what would be the effect? It would cut off debate on the original bill, cut off debate on the amendments, prohibit the offering of future amendments, and bring the Senate to a direct vote on the measure as it stands before the Senate, with the amendments that are already proposed, without an opportunity to discuss them. It cuts off any opportunity to further amend or further modify amendments before the Senate. It takes an ax and drives it through the consideration of legislation, without perfecting it, because there is no other way to accomplish the result. Now, that rule may be necessary, it may be effective at times, but it is not the way to perfect legislation and bring about a desirable result. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Speaking of the treaty which shall conclude this conflict, in which the people of the United States would be more directly interested, perhaps, than anything upon which the Congress will have to pass for many years, does the Senator believe that it is more important to limit debate upon the treaty than it is that the treaty shall be heard in open session before the people of the country?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the consideration of the treaty in open session when it comes, as far as I am individually concerned. Of course, the Senator knows what the rules of the Senate are. I do not know whether those rules would provide for that at the time or not.

Mr. BORAH. I have offered an amendment which will put it beyond question that the treaty shall be heard in the open.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not sure that I am not in favor of the consideration of treaties in the open. I am not at all averse to the consideration of the great peace treaty in open session, as far as the lights before me now. I can call to mind some questions that for international reasons it might be wiser for the Senate to consider behind closed doors, but that is not involved in this question. That is an entirely different question.

Mr. BORAH. It is involved in the fact that I have offered an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the Senator will not encumber this resolution in that way.

Mr. BORAH. No; I am trying to add strength to it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. To make clear the situation, may I ask the Senator, Is there anything in the resolution that could not be abrogated by the Senate in the discussion of different matters, so as to leave that open to any future rule?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Nothing at all. When we reach a treaty of peace for consideration, the Senate can adopt a further rule, if the majority wants to do it. There will be no difficulty if this rule is adopted, and the Senate wants to adopt a rule providing that there shall be unlimited debate upon it. As a matter of fact, I have no doubt that in the consideration of a peace treaty the Senate itself, by unanimous consent, will agree to a lengthy and unlimited debate, if the Members of the Senate desire it when that time comes.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that I understood the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. Did I understand the Senator to say that there is nothing in the Senate rules now which would prevent an open session of the Senate upon treaties?

Mr. LEWIS. No; Mr. President, I queried the Senator from Alabama whether there is anything in the present proposition that could not be abrogated when the time came to consider a peace treaty. In other words, I wish to have it manifest that the proposed rule, if passed, would not affect in the way of a barrier or obstruction any rule that we might choose to adopt for the purpose of discussing the peace treaty in open session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I think there is a very good reason why the Senate should adopt this rule. I do not believe that there is any possibility of there being a filibuster in the Senate to prevent legislation that the majority wishes to enact during the period of this war. There has been an undoubted disposition in the membership of both sides of the Chamber to enact the legislation that the executive branch of the Government desires, in order to carry on the war. But we have had very long and almost interminable debate on several questions that have been before the Senate. If there was anything for the good of the country that was accomplished by long debate I do not know it. I do not mean to say there is a condition that is not benefited by the debate, and amendments were not adopted that improved the legislative condition; but in my judgment the length of the debate did not improve the legislative situation.

Before this Congress adjourns, nay more, I will say before this war is over, because that is the length of this resolution, a great many questions of vital importance to the people of this country and to the civilization of the world are coming before the Senate for its consideration. They are questions not only that must be voted upon, but they are questions that should be considered, and I want to say that I am one of those men in the Senate who believe that our unlimited right of debate is the leading cause of the lack of consideration by the United States Senate of most of the bills that come before it for enactment.

It is said sometimes, and said with pride, that the Senate of the United States is a great deliberative body. That may be true, but the further you extend the field of deliberation the narrower you draw the scope of legitimate consideration of general legislation that comes before this body, because it must be apparent to all who consider it that when the Senate of the United States takes months for deliberation and debate on one measure, which it many times has done in the past few years, it cuts off the consideration of other legislation that must be passed by this body.

I can recall an instance that occurred some years before I became a Member of the Senate, when a measure then pending was debated for months in a short session, and in order to prevent an extra session of Congress it was necessary to pass practically all the accumulated legislation of the session—appropriation bills and other bills of vast importance—by unanimous consent without consideration within the last few days of that session. And that will occur continually.

I think in order that we should have wise legislation, safe legislation, there should be a fair and reasonable opportunity for every Member of this body to present his views and the position of his constituency to this legislative body and to propose such amendments as he thinks are in the interest of his constituency and for the benefit of the country; and when he has done that he has no right to further delay legislation. He has no right to stop the legislative machine, and if he does so by additional debate he is merely preventing the consideration of other important business, sometimes during the existence of the Congress.

I see no reason why this rule should not be adopted. It is reasonable in its limitations. There are very few questions that ever come before the Senate of the United States where proper preparation is made that can not be discussed within the period of an hour, and if those questions are of such vast importance that they require more than an hour for legitimate debate I have no doubt that the Senate will agree itself for an extension of the time, as it can under this rule.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator mean that every Member of the Senate present must agree?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It can be done readily by unanimous consent. If any gentleman on the other side, or on either side, desires to offer an amendment which will provide that the time can be extended, either by unanimous consent or a vote of a majority of the Senate, I shall be very glad to agree to it, as far as I am concerned. There would be no objection in the world.

The whole object of this rule is merely for the purpose of allowing the majority of the Senate to transact its business, and if the majority of the Senate are not prepared to bring the Senate to a vote but are willing to extend the time I can see no objection to allowing the majority to control the situation. I do not think it is necessary, but there could be no objection to that proposition if that is all that stands in the way of the adoption of a reasonable rule, but that a reasonable rule is necessary there can be no doubt.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator whether under this proposed rule a condition of debate which I am going to describe could take place? We adopted a unanimous-consent agreement while a bill was pending that debate should be limited to 20 minutes on the bill and 5 minutes on each amendment. The ruling of the Chair was that although the Senator had not spoken upon the bill, yet when he rose an amendment was pending and he had to be limited to five minutes. It seemed to me at the time that that was a great injustice, but nevertheless that was the ruling of the Chair and, if I remember correctly, there has been no overruling of that decision.

I believe in the pending resolution there ought to be a limitation of one hour to debate on the bill; but if a Senator has not exercised his privilege of one hour of debate and an amendment is pending he ought not to be confined to 20 minutes but should be confined to the 1 hour of general debate and the 20 minutes in addition, if he desires. I ask the Senator whether such a privilege would be given under the resolution as reported by the committee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there can be any doubt about that. The proposal merely says that no Member shall occupy more than one hour in debate. That is a negative proposition. It does not say when he shall occupy it or how he shall occupy it; it merely says that he shall occupy no more than one hour. Undoubtedly under that language he could occupy that hour at any time he pleased in any way he pleased, but when he had occupied that hour in general debate his time for general debate would be over and he would be confined to 20 minutes on amendments after that time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. After he had used his one hour?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there can be any question about the way the rule reads and that a Member could occupy one hour in general debate at any time he saw proper.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state whether it is the purpose of his amendment of the rules to have it apply to the consideration of treaties?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator calls my attention to a point that I started to answer a moment ago and I did not fully consider then what occurs to my mind now. I am inclined to think the rule does not apply to treaties. I stated a while ago that I thought it did, but the rule reads this way:

> That no Member shall occupy more than one hour in debate, unless by unanimous consent, on any bill or resolution.

I do not know whether a treaty would be considered a bill or resolution; probably not. I would have no objection to having it apply to a treaty resolution, but I doubt whether the terms of the resolution are broad enough as it is now written to cover a treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My recollection is that the Senate in executive session generally adopts a resolution ratifying a treaty, and that might come within the term of this amendment of the rules for that reason. I suppose the Senator would be willing to except the consideration of resolutions ratifying treaties.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would have no objection to that. When I come to consider it I do not think the resolution is broad enough to cover treaties in executive session. The purpose of the resolution is primarily to give the Senate a chance to give legitimate consideration to all the legislation that comes before the body and not undue deliberation to a part of the legislation that comes before the body. I think it will accomplish the result. I think this is the only way we can accomplish the result. I do not think there is a particle of harm that can come out of this resolution. There is no issue that is coming here during the war period that is going to be decided along partisan lines, that is not going to be passed, if the executive branch of the Government concludes that the legislation is necessary to carry on the war. On the other hand, the question of the Senate considering all the bills and considering them carefully does mean a reasonable limitation on debate. It can not mean anything else.

As a distinguished Senator said awhile ago, many delays in the Senate are caused by the fact that it is necessary to have a quorum present in the Senate. Mr. President, in my judgment the reason for the delays on that score is the fact that we have unlimited debate. Members will listen to a speech for a reasonable length of time, they will listen to speeches when they know there is action going to be taken in a reasonable time and the measure is coming to a vote, but when you have unlimited debate, speeches running four, five, and six hours in length, Members will not stay in the Chamber, and they do not stay in the Chamber except under very exceptional circumstances. If the debate is limited to an hour Senators will wait and listen for the conclusion of the speech.

Mr. President, we are not winning on the western front; our enemy's vessels are at our very doors to-day, destroying our commerce. The American people must awake to the fact that they must win the war and that on them alone depends the result of winning the war. The Senate of the United States may as well realize now that we are just beginning our war legislation. To fight this war out to an ultimate conclusion may mean a period of four or five years to come; it will mean the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of lives; it will mean the levying of billions on billions of taxation. It will mean the appropriation of the vastest sums of money that this country has ever known.

Those great questions coming before the Senate are entitled to its serious consideration, its earnest consideration, and its full consideration. That can not be accomplished by unlimited debate. It may be pleasing on some questions to run the debate to a last analysis, but it will not accomplish results. To fairly consider the questions coming before us and to fairly dispose of them we must have a reasonable limitation of debate on the main question and then reasonable and fair opportunity to consider amendments offered to legislation coming before the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just one moment, and I will yield to the Senator.

I want to challenge Senators here to point me to the time when there has been a great measure before the Senate in recent years open for consideration when it was not necessary, finally, by reason of unlimited debate, either to adopt the cloture rule, that cut off all consideration of amendments, or to agree to a unanimous-consent rule, and practically cut off the consideration of vital and important amendments at the conclusion of a general debate that led nowhere and went nowhere.

Now I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has just adverted to the fact that we would be called upon to make heavy appropriations. The Senator will recall that during the past year large appropriation bills have come before the Senate for consideration, and I recall that in nearly every instance those bills, calling for staggering amounts of seven or eight billion dollars, including the bonding bill, were passed with but very limited debate; there was no opposition. So it has been with practically every measure that has come before the Senate since we embarked upon this war.

Does the Senator from Alabama think, in the light of the experience that we have had during the past year, there is any necessity for this rule? Does not the course of the Senate argue and prophesy that there is no necessity for it; that the patriotism of Senators here is such that they will not indulge in any debate that is unreasonable, that will delay important and imperative legislation; that they are ready to enact such laws as may be required to meet our foe and to meet the great crisis that now confronts us?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I am not impugning the patriotism of the Senate; I do not say that it is unpatriotic for any Senator to speak six hours in debate if he thinks six hours are necessary; but when 10 or a dozen Senators each speak six hours it very materially delays public business. I will say to the Senator from Utah that in the consideration of the appropriation bills immediately after the war broke out, none of us knew much about the contents of those bills, not even the members of the committee, because they were new matters, and we did not know where they led. I will also say that one reason for the lack of consideration of those bills was in the fact that the Senate's time was taken up by other matters, and it did not desire to occupy time on appropriation bills on which, in many instances, time could be wisely and well spent for at least a resonable length of debate and consideration.

But we are approaching a summer, probably the most historic summer in the history of our country; possibly the most critical summer in the life of this Nation; a summer when we must get our men to the firing line; when we must provide the supplies that are going to win this war, and when we are going to levy on the American people a system of taxation that will be right, that will be just, that will be necessary; but that in all probability will hurt. The taxation that has fallen on the American people up to this time has not in the main hurt; it has not been taxation that men had to make sacrifices to bear in the main; but, in my judgment, we are approaching a condition in this country when a tax will be levied heavily enough and drastically enough, and must be levied in that way, when the people of the United States will feel it. To levy that class of taxes and pass those bills in a reasonable time it will be necessary for some proper limitation on debate in the Senate to be adopted, and to be adopted at this time, unless it is proposed and expected that the great revenue bill to support this war and to maintain our armies in the field is to be pending between the two Houses until next fall. That is not necessary; we have got to do the work; we have got to do it well. There is no reason why the revenue bill that is approaching should not be disposed of in the early summer, and yet be ably written and carefully considered, if there are reasonable rules and reasonable opportunities for its consideration presented to the Senate of the United States.

I very much hope, Mr. President, that this resolution will be adopted, and that we may have an early disposition of it by the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Suppose the same thing should happen in reference to the next revenue bill which happened as to the last revenue bill? Of course the Senator from Alabama recollects that the last revenue bill came from the Finance Committee to the Senate, but it did not seem to be approved by a majority of the Members of the Senate. It was therefore sent back to the committee, but it was argued at length before it was so sent back. After its recommittal it was again reported to the Senate, having been very materially changed. Supposing such a thing as that again happens, does the Senator from Alabama believe that an hour's debate by each Senator would be sufficient on the entire bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can say to the Senator from North Dakota that, of course, the question of what each Senator thinks is the time necessary for him in order to present his views to the country on a legislative measure is a question of personal equation. I can, however, say to the Senator that I once reported a great revenue bill to the House of Representatives, which is on the statute books to-day, and I presented the views of the Ways and Means Committee to the House of Representatives within an hour. I did it satisfactorily to myself, and, I think, to the satisfaction of the House, and I have never heard any complaint as to the length of debate on that subject.

Mr. GRONNA. I presume the Senator did so; but I am afraid I have not made myself clear to him. I wanted to know if a Senator would have but one hour on a bill when it was first reported, and then, supposing it was recommitted and that an entirely new bill should be written, would he have but one hour altogether?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not understand the proposed rule in that way.

Mr. GRONNA. But it would be the same bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If there is any question about that, I would be glad to have the resolution modified so as to cover it.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But, of course, if a bill up for consideration before the Senate is recommitted to the committee and subsequently reported back, I would regard it as having a new legislative status, and that each Senator could debate it for an hour. If, however, as I have said, there is any question about that, I should be glad to see the resolution modified.

Mr. GRONNA. I made the inquiry merely for the purpose of understanding the resolution. I think it is very important we should understand it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would have no objection to a modification on that score.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I have no doubt that a Senator reporting a bill, even a great revenue bill, could compress all that is necessary to be said in an hour; but in regard to a great revenue bill, suppose the chairman of the committee reporting the bill makes no speech at all, the man does not live who in carrying a great revenue bill through the Senate can cover as little as an hour merely in answering questions that are asked him. Under this rule he would be deprived of an opportunity to explain his bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I have said, I do not think there is any question that if additional time were needed the Senate, by unanimous consent, would grant it; but when questions are asked the chairman they are asked and answered in the time of some other Senator, and if the chairman responds to questions of other Senators it is not a consumption of the time of the chairman, but a consumption of the time of the Senator who asks the questions.

Mr. LODGE. He may have to take the floor in order to make the explanation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, in the case of an amendment that may be so, but in my judgment—and I think the Senator from Massachusetts will bear me out—a great deal of unnecessary time is taken up in explaining amendments. On the idea that the country may not understand or the Senate may not understand the real objection to an amendment, although it is foreordained to defeat, as everybody knows, even if nothing in the world is said on the subject, I have seen it discussed for hours. Everyone knew when it was offered that it was not going to pass, but, nevertheless, the time of the Senate was occupied in that way.

Mr. President, that is all I desire to say on the question at this time.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I desire to present an amendment at this time so that the matter may be discussed. I ask that the proposed amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a pending amendment.

Mr. FALL. I understand that, and I simply wish to have read for information the amendment I intend to propose, and I will offer it formally at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That this rule limiting debate to one hour upon the main question and 20 minutes upon any amendment shall not apply, except by unanimous consent, to any bill, measure, or question which has been determined upon or agreed to by or in a party caucus or conference of Senators of the majority party.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have, since my entrance into this body been in favor of a reasonable limitation upon debate, and I yet entertain that feeling. I may say, however, that this now being the only body in the United States in which debate can be carried to an informing extent to the people of the United States, I have to some extent modified my views, as we have changed many of our opinions during the course of the war.

From what has been said by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], having in charge the resolution, I have no doubt that he will accept the amendment. He remarked just before taking his seat that as to measures necessary to carry on the war there would be no partisan determination. I think that has been true so far.

Mr. President, I have, as I have said, favored a limitation upon debate, but I have believed that debate to the very limit was perfectly legitimate, and that a filibuster was perfectly legitimate as against a caucus measure. If the caucus simply meant, for instance, at this time that the entire 52 Democrats, composing the majority of the Senate, agreed that they were to put through a measure, that would be, of course, government by the majority party, spoken of by the Senator from Alabama; but the fact remains that, with 52 Members upon the majority side, in a caucus of those Senators 27 Senators can bind, as I have heard Senators upon the other side say, they have been bound against their will to a certain line of conduct, and to a certain vote upon a proposition.

So, Mr. President, not only can 27 Members control the legislation of the 96 Members of this body, but with 27, constituting a majority of the Democratic Senators present, and 14 constituting a majority of the 27, it is perfectly possible, by bringing into operation the party whip and calling a caucus of the majority at this time, for 14 Senators to control the legislation, war or otherwise, to be enacted by 96 Senators. Therefore as against the weapon of a party caucus debate carried to the extent of a filibuster is perfectly legitimate, and, in my judgment, is in the interest of the people whom we are supposed to represent here, not as Democrats or Republicans, but as Senators of the United States Senate. So much for this amendment. I conceive that the Senator from Alabama will see the justice of it, and, in view of the fact that we are not legislating on war measures upon party lines, that there will be no objection to its adoption.

Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], now pending, proposing that debate upon treaties shall be in open session of the Senate, to my mind, is one which should be adopted. If there has been no necessity for it heretofore, there is the utmost necessity for it now. The President of the United States has said in a message to the world that when the different nations shall sit around the peace table the proceedings should be open; that nothing should be secret; that the treaty which he signs, as the Senator from Alabama states, should be considered openly. On the other hand, the treaty which we ratify, under the objection made to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho, must be considered secretly.

Mr. President, in the consideration of treaties presented to this body I can recall at least 25 treaties which, in my judgment as a Senator, would never have been ratified had they been discussed in the open. In my judgment, the people of the United States would never have allowed the ratification of the so-called Bryan peace treaties; and the people of the United States yet do not know what they are, because the people were not furnished with copies of those treaties to carry home and read. I opposed every one of them upon the ground that, instead of being a peace treaty, it was a challenge to war, and that the people of the United States would never allow the question of their national honor or of their national interests to be submitted, not to an arbitration tribunal, but to the other party in interest; that the adoption of the treaties meant that they would be torn up when the first occasion arose; and in my judgment, as I say, they never would have been adopted had they been discussed openly and the people informed as to what those treaties contained, as they have never yet been informed.

In my judgment had the treaty with Nicaragua been considered openly, as it was considered in secret session, while under the same statements made with reference to it, it would have been ratified, in my judgment, I think correctly—I think the Senate in ratifying it acted for the best interests both of Nicaragua and of this country—but had the reasons for its ratification been discussed openly, so that the people of the United States could have understood it, there never would have been the exceedingly great injustice done to Costa Rica and Honduras which has ensued from the ratification of the Nicaragua treaty. There never would have been the consequences of the ratification of that treaty as it was without the carrying out of pledges which some of us had that a similar treaty, or one along the same lines, satisfactory to Costa Rica and Honduras, was in course of preparation and would follow.

Had the policy as announced to some of us then been carried out you would have seen a different result. The world would not have witnessed the dissolution of the Supreme Court of Central America, which was inaugurated at the invitation of the United States, and which, I may say, we forced upon those people. With our delegates present during all their sessions we prevailed upon them to agree that instead of fighting and carrying their continual difficulties to the sword's point with one another they would leave matters in dispute between themselves to a high tribunal to be constituted by each of the States. For years we had no difficulty among the Central American States. This court, the Supreme Court of Central America, was inaugurated. The plan was formed in the State Department at Washington. Those people were summoned here, and the representatives of the State Department attended their conferences and assisted in the formation and working out of the plans forming the Supreme Court of Central America, to which all difficulties should be relegated. We knew here, and we discussed here, the fact that there were serious difficulties between Costa Rica and Honduras upon the one hand and Nicaragua upon the other, and that we were ratifying a treaty with Nicaragua knowing that we were doing an injustice to Costa Rica, particularly; knowing that the President of the United States—President Cleveland—had decided the very point in issue with reference to the Nicaragua route, for which we were paying $2,000,000, in favor of the Costa Rican Republic.

Knowing that Costa Rica had an equal interest in Fonseca Bay, as did Honduras, we purchased from Nicaragua rights upon Fonseca Bay; and so far as I am concerned, sir, I will say frankly that my vote in favor of the ratification of the treaty with Nicaragua was cast because I had personal assurances that treaties with Costa Rica and with Honduras of a satisfactory nature would be carried along with it and presented to us for ratification, settling all the difficulties between this country and Costa Rica, Honduras, and Nicaragua, respectively.

What was the result of that act of injustice, which never would have been perpetrated had this treaty been discussed openly here in the Senate? The result was that Costa Rica and Honduras appealed to the high court which had been established for them at our instigation, and there each of them secured a judgment against Nicaragua, based upon this treaty of ours; and then Nicaragua, hiding behind the provision in the treaty that we would protect her with our armed forces, defied the judgment of the Supreme Court of Central America, refused to abide by it, and no recourse was left or is left to Costa Rica or Honduras; and not one word yet has this Senate had to the effect that the State Department is undertaking to do justice to those two countries, which have been robbed of their territory by the ratification of a treaty by this body.

Mr. President, all the good work done by Elihu Root in Latin America has practically been done away with because we have not discussed Latin-American affairs here openly and knowingly, and have not understood them; and in our consideration here of treaties or propositions concerning Latin-American countries we do not understand Latin America, and never will understand it. Open debate is more necessary upon matters of this kind than upon any other matters pending before this body or which may pend before this body, in my judgment. I know that a majority of the older statesmen upon this side of the Chamber do not agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from New Mexico and others here who have voted upon every occasion for open consideration of treaties; but, Mr. President, I say again, as I have said here before, that the people of the United States are entitled to know all about their foreign affairs. They are entitled to know whom we send to foreign countries now to negotiate for us, and they are entitled to know what character of negotiations are carried out. The people of the United States are entitled to know what agreement has been made with the allied countries and is being carried out through the deliberations of the allied war council, in which Clemenceau represents France, and Lloyd-George represents Great Britain, and the minister of foreign relations represents Italy, and we know not who represents the United States.

In strictly war matters we have a Chief of Staff representing the United States; but in the other matters which are being constantly passed upon we have no one representing us, as I understand, except a Mr. Crosby, whom I have not the pleasure of knowing, officially or otherwise, or knowing of, I may say. We were all acquainted with the name of Col. House, who apparently attended this council at one time, but we are informed that he is now in the United States. We know nothing of the report which he has made. Our foreign affairs are not being carried on through the officials named in the Constitution and in the laws of the United States, but apparently all our foreign relations are in the hands of men unknown to the law and unknown to the Constitution.

"No secret diplomacy," Mr. President? There never has been, at any previous period in the life of this great country of ours, the secrecy that exists now with reference to foreign relations, both with neutral countries and with belligerents and with our allies. I defy any of you, even during executive sessions, to give to the Senate any information of any kind or character with reference to the relations of this Government with foreign countries. In no instance in the history of this country, prior to this administration, has a President, in addressing the Congress of the United States when great foreign affairs were pending, failed or refused to give the Congress all the information which could be made public with reference to the details of the conduct of the foreign relations of this country, and to send in privacy to the respective bodies the data upon which the information was given. I defy you to look through the messages and documents of the Presidents of the United States, from the day of George Washington to that of Woodrow Wilson, and challenge the statement which I have made here. Now, above all times, are we justified in overturning the practice of the Senate for the last hundred years or more, and in demanding, in all foreign relations with which under the Constitution this body has anything to do, that at least through this body shall the people of the United States, whom we represent, be informed as to their affairs.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this morning I offered an amendment to this resolution which reads as follows:

Add the following as a new section:

"That all treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in its open or legislative session, unless four-fifths of the Members of the Senate, by yea-and-nay vote, shall determine to close the doors during the consideration of the particular treaty upon which the vote to close the doors is taken.

"That this rule shall not be limited to the period of the war."

I insert the latter clause by reason of the fact that the main resolution has a clause which limits the other proposed amendment to the period of the war; otherwise, it would have been unnecessary to insert that clause.

Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for me to say that this amendment is offered in good faith, and will be urged to a final conclusion. It is a proposition which some of us have been advocating for the last 10 years, and with which, so far, we have not made very rapid progress. Several months ago I offered a resolution asking the Committee on Rules to report concerning the advisability of discussing treaties in the open—a committee of which the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is a member, and others—and it shows really that the delay in this body is not in the open sessions, but in the committee. That resolution has been with the committee for several months, and so far no report whatever has been made upon it. I assume it is by reason of the fact that they have no limitation upon debate in the committee. So it necessitates offering the amendment upon the floor of the Senate in order that we may have a hearing at all upon the subject.

Mr. President, six minutes is not sufficient time in which to present this amendment and the reasons why it should be adopted; but I want to say to the Members upon the majority side of the Chamber that the Senator from Idaho ought not to be the one called upon to advocate this amendment. It ought to come from the majority side of the Chamber. It ought to be supported upon that side by reason of the fact that it is the carrying out of the repeatedly pronounced policy of the President. We shall not be able to satisfy those with whom we are dealing abroad, nor our own people, that our many asseverations with reference to open policy concerning foreign affairs are in good faith if we defeat this amendment.

I was surprised to hear the leader of the majority say this morning that he was opposed to this amendment; and I trust that upon fuller investigation and fuller consideration of the resolution the leader upon the majority side will conclude that it is in harmony with the program which has been outlined by the President, and not only in harmony with the program which has been outlined by the President, but in this instance thoroughly in harmony with the general trend of affairs with reference to foreign matters.

The President, in his message upon the 8th of January, 1918, among other things, said:

> The program of the world's peace, therefore, is our program; and that program, the only possible program, as we see it, is this:
> I. Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

No other provision or clause among the 14 separate propositions which the President submitted to the country and to the world as prerequisite to a permanent and abiding peace received more consideration and discussion in the literature of the world, particularly abroad, than the one which I have just read. There were many publicists in England who were open advocates of this policy prior to the beginning of this war, and they have repeatedly stated facts which, to my mind, justify their conclusion that if this policy of open diplomacy, of inhibition against secret understandings among different nations, of open consideration of all negotiations between nations had obtained for the last 40 years in Europe this war would have been avoided. It was the secret and sinister combination of those who did not represent those who now must pay the taxes and carry the burdens and fight the battles of this war which finally, in their entangling understandings and agreements, brought on this great conflict. The most marvelous thing, sir, of the twentieth century—a time when the trend is toward open, candid, democratic government—is that a few men have been permitted to sit about secret council tables and barter and trade in the lives, not only of individuals and peoples but of nations, and to enter into treaties, alliances, and engagements which must ultimately result, if their ambitions were to be satisfied, in just such conflicts as the one in which we are now engaged. Anyone who is familiar or who desires to familiarize himself with the history of diplomacy, the secret alliances and combinations and understandings of the supposed leaders or of the real leaders of Europe during the last 40 years, will find therein the secret of this conflict which is now approaching our very doors. And yet, sir, the most pronounced democracy of the world hesitates to close in upon this proposition and to announce, once and for all, that the people who pay the taxes and fight the battles and suffer and die shall know the kind of contract which we make with other peoples during the time that it is being made.

It is a travesty upon common sense, it is a grim piece of humor, to say to the people of the United States: "You shall know the contents of the treaty after it has been made, after it has been ratified. After you are tied and bound, shackled by the agreement, you shall know the contents of it, when you have no power to reject it."

The time in which to turn on the light of public opinion and to put the negotiators who deal in the affairs of nations upon record is when public opinion will be upon those who are closing the negotiation and where public opinion will have the power to stay the combinations which are to gratify the individual ambitions of diplomats and leaders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 9959.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the unfinished business if he will be willing to allow this resolution of the Senate to be considered to a conclusion?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to accommodate the Senator, but I am quite sure the discussion would take the balance of the day. I allowed this bill to go over last week until to-day with a distinct understanding that it should be proceeded with at this time. I desire to proceed with the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to say that I shall endeavor to-morrow to bring up the resolution and secure a vote upon it at some reasonable time.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9959) increasing rates of pensions of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hardwick	McKellar	Shields
Beckham	Henderson	McNary	Simmons
Borah	Hitchcock	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Smith, Md.
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Smoot
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sutherland
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Swanson
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Thompson
Dillingham	Kendrick	Penrose	Townsend
Fall	Kenyon	Phelan	Underwood
Fernald	King	Pittman	Vardaman
France	Kirby	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Gronna	Lenroot	Ransdell	Warren
Guion	Lewis	Saulsbury	Wolcott
Hale	Lodge	Sheppard
Harding	McCumber	Sherman

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on business of the Senate. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

I should like also to announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] is absent on business of the Senate, and I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. May I be permitted also at this time to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], detained on public business? I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

I desire also to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] occasioned by illness in his family, and of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] by personal illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the extreme nature of the substitute reported by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] from the Committee on Pensions. Where an injury takes place in the service I believe in most liberal care for the injured. Where there is simply service without any injury and the party is mustered out sound, I do not believe in giving a pension at all. I have expressed that view quite often, and I had the privilege of urging it against Spanish-American War pensions. Where the widow is the widow of a man who was a soldier, married before he went into the Army, I can see an excellent reason for providing for her, but where he was mustered out and subsequently married I do not understand why, because he has been in the service, it should cause pensions in vast quantities for widows.

The only excuse that I understand there is for a pension to one who leaves the Army sound and without injury grows out of the fact that if a man has rendered gallant service in battle for his country, and misfortune should subsequently overcome him, it makes a strong case of appeal to his country to see that he is guarded against misfortune. But that is not the substitute of the Senator from Utah. That is the bill, in a sense, as passed by the House. The Senator from Utah proposes to pay as much as $480 a year to men who served in the Army, who came out without a scratch, who rendered no special service, who have been prosperous in life, and who perhaps have incomes of $50,000 a year. Without an injury in the service, without any special claim, without actually reaching the front or being in a battle, from the mere fact that they are on the roll, without exception, no matter how rich, the pension may go to $480 a year.

I can not justify, I can not excuse, a charge, especially in the present condition of the Treasury, of between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000 a year for such a purpose.

It has been the custom of the committee where there was a special burden of sickness and want resting upon the soldier to carry the pension up to something like this sum.

Now, let us see the provision in the House bill.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator might state at that point, too, that a large number of those served only about 90 days, or a few days over that—from 90 days to 6 months.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Some of them never got to the front at all. You do not limit it to men who got in reach of bullets. You put it in the same class as the effort which was made to pension the Spanish-American soldiers. Many of them were citizens of my State who never got to Cuba, who never were shot at.

I have seen no excuse for going into the Treasury in behalf of those men, and I have, with a sense of duty performed, sought to check pensions of this character for them.

Now, mark the distinction. I do not wish to be misunderstood. If they were injured, even in camp; if they were wounded in the service; if their services have brought scars or lessened their capacity for future usefulness to themselves and their families, I think it is right that the country should bear the loss and not the injured man. This Smoot amendment, however, is a service pension, without regard to injury.

Mr. SMOOT. So is the bill passed by the House.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know; but the House bill has a limitation on it.

I started to say that I am opposed to all service pensions, but yours is much worse than the House bill, because the latter is put on the theory that where a man has served in the Army and has not any substantial income, the Government will help him, but you do it without regard to his needs. The cry has been always heretofore that you can not afford to let a man who served gallantly in the Army, and who has become needy subsequent to the war, suffer. There is something in that appeal; but this provision of the Senator from Utah gives $480 a year to men who perchance never heard the roar of musketry, who were never within the line of battle, and who may be worth to-day their thousands and thousands.

I can see no excuse for it except that there are a large number of them, and it is mighty hard to stop an appropriation when it reaches a great many people. I have found that a small appropriation touching only a few people is much easier to stop than a large appropriation touching a great many people, an appropriation which will carry from the Treasury money into the pockets of a great many people. Here is the House provision:

SEC. 3. That no pensioner shall be entitled to receive any benefits under the provisions of this act for any period during which he shall be an inmate of any State or National soldiers' home; and the provisions of this act shall not apply to any pensioner whose net annual income from all sources, including his pension, is $1,000 or more.

A man with a thousand dollars a year is certainly protected from want. The chief object of the substitute of the Senator from Utah is to strike out that provision. More people are reached if we strike that out; the distribution is broadened.

The House bill carries a pension, if the party has served 90 days, of $27 per month, six months $29, one year $31, one and a half years $35, two years $39 per month. The proposal of the Senator from Utah as to amount is that anyone on the pension roll who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service $30. The service in the Navy was without the slightest danger. They were just as safe as any man on an ordinary boat before the submarine was known, and yet for 90 days' service on board a vessel, with no opposing ship, with no navy against them with which to contend, the person is to have for the balance of his life $360 a year, no matter how much he is worth, no matter how successful he has been in business, no matter how much his little 90-day trip contributed to his health and strengthened him for future activity. It is an unreasonable proposition.

Then it says six months $32, one year $35, one and a half years $38, two years $40: "Provided, That this amendment shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private." It is vastly more objectionable than the House bill.

I confess that when a man has worn the uniform of his country and stood up for it and fought for it, even if he comes out sound and in his old age is poor and needy, I have not much heart to object to helping take care of him, but why not be satisfied with the provision of the House bill? That carries the income up to a thousand dollars a year. Do not undertake to give this sum to men who left the service without a wound, without a scratch, without an injury, and who were never in reach of a bullet and who have now more than they need.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate. I merely felt that if I did not express my conviction on this subject I would be rather running from a responsibility. If the Senator from Utah had a list of men who had suffered from the service, if he had a list of men who had been wounded, men who had losses from the service, I think the case would be strong to make them sound. I wish it distinctly understood that my objection is to pensioning in this way those who were not hurt at all and who do not need the money.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in the pension legislation of 1907, 1908, and 1912 we eliminated, and it was hoped that we had eliminated for all time, every thought of the pension roll being a roll of poverty-stricken soldiers. It was supposed that at that time we had made the pension roll a roll of honor, that any soldier who had fought for his country, battled for the Union and saved his country, could accept as an expression of gratuity from a grateful Government. I hope to God we will never go back upon the record we made at that time, so that any one of these old men, now from 75 to 90 years of age, can accept that expression of gratefulness on the part of a great rich Government without feeling that by so doing he is placing the stamp of pauperism upon his honorable record.

I hope that we will sustain the record that we made at that time, and I shall suffer the disappointment of my life if the Senate of the United States shall ever go back upon the record that it made then in eliminating this objectionable provision of our pension laws.

We applied that same rule to all soldiers. We applied it the same to the Mexican veterans. We did not ask whether they had a thousand dollars income a year or whether they had any support whatever. We said you served your Government, and now, being from 75 to 90 years of age, you shall receive this gratuity from your Government without feeling a pang of shame for having entered your name upon the pension roll.

Again, Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia says the only reason why we propose or seek to justify this bill is that it affects a large number—that it is so unjust we would only pass it in view of the fact of the great number, intimating probably the voting strength it might carry. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it does not cover anywhere near the number that the Adamson bill covered, which we passed in 1916, and which showed its good effect in the voting strength of those affected in the succeeding fall election. It does not cover anywhere near the number covered by the $300,000,000 which will now be put on top of the benefits derived from the Adamson bill and which we submit to without reference to what effect it may have upon the numbers or upon the voting strength of any particular number of organizations in the United States.

Mr. President, before beginning this war $40,000,000, the equivalent of 40 cents per capita of all the men and women and children in the United States, would have been a very large sum of money. Before our entry into this war no such appropriation would have been made without the greatest and most careful deliberation and forethought. But since our entry into the war we scarcely give any consideration to an appropriation of anything less than a billion dollars. We vote for $640,000,000 for airplanes, and when the year goes by and we have not any planes in sight we vote for another billion dollars, without obtaining the slightest information as to what has become of the $640,000,000 or whether we are to get anything out of that appropriation.

Again, we place $40,000,000 in the hands of a censor, without even an inquiry as to what use he is going to make of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The second sum for aeroplanes has not been before the Senate yet, has it?

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, it has already passed the House of Representatives to the amount of almost $900,000,000, and it will probably go through the Senate without much consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is highly probable that it will, but I hope we shall be able to give the Senator some information about it. The Senator said it passed without information. As I am on the subcommittee which is trying to get the information, I had just wondered if it had slipped through without my knowing it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am afraid that the Senator will not have a great deal of information for us by the time that bill gets here. It will pass with about the same consideration which was given the other appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. At least, however, I should like to know that it was passed. I should be embarrassed if, according to the suggestion of the Senator, it had slipped through and I did not even know that it had passed when I was thinking I was watching it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, the Senator from Georgia probably remembers that $640,000,000 slipped through, and the Senator will probably also remember that we do not know what has become of it at a time when we are asked for nearly $900,000,000 more.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill did not slip through. Both bodies understood that they were appropriating the money and thought we were going to have airplanes. Before we vote upon the additional billion dollars, if we need so much, and can build airplanes and help whip the Germans with them—and I am going to vote for it—I hope I shall know more than I now know about what has been done with the previous appropriation. I think we shall have considerably more information upon that subject, not all of it satisfactory—some of it very unsatisfactory—but still we want the information as to what became of the money, however it went.

Mr. McCUMBER. And may I join the Senator from Georgia in the hope that the Senate will also find out what is going to be done with the other billion dollars, whether we shall get anything out of it, and how it is to be expended? Nothing of that character was attempted in the previous bill. But to proceed:

We placed $40,000,000 in the hands of a censor, the whole equivalent of what is to be voted for the old soldiers, without the slightest inquiry as to what was to be done with it, and if that censor spends $10,000,000 circulating socialistic literature—a literature which is calculated to destroy any government upon the face of the earth, the same as it has already destroyed Russia—we make no inquiry, but we submit to it and sit quietly by, without a murmur, because the censor is a part of the war administration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from North Dakota in the criticism which he is now making refer to Mr. Creel and his committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. I refer to the censor committee; and the Senator from Utah, of course, understands, as every one who listens to me does, who is the head of that committee and who is the real censor.

Mr. KING. If I may be pardoned, I hope the Senator from North Dakota will not impute to me any improper motive in interrogating him, because I am somewhat in sympathy with some of the criticisms he has made at various times, and have sometimes felt that the committee referred to was subject to just criticism, and I rose for information and not for the purpose of provoking any controversy.

The Senator has referred to the fact that certain literature, socialistic in character, has been promulgated by this committee. I should be very glad, as none of it has come to my attention, to be advised of that fact, because if it is true, and I could be convinced that this committee was disseminating literature of the character referred to, I would be one of the first to demand the abolition of the bureau or committee, whatever its title, Mr. Creel and all, because they have no right to take the money of the people of the United States and utilize it to advocate a change in our form of government or to promulgate the un-American and disastrous doctrines that have destroyed Russia.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will call upon that committee for a statement of their expenditures and the number of thousands of tons of literature of a socialistic character which have been sent broadcast over the country, he will perhaps secure the information he now desires.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield for just one further question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KING. Acting upon the suggestion of the Senator, I shall take the first occasion to request of the committee a copy of everything which they have sent out aside from the daily publications.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator would do so, for I know, if I should offer such a proposition on this side, I should never get it through.

Mr. KING. And if it is of the character suggested by the Senator, I shall join him and shall ask his aid in working such reforms as will prevent a repetition of that evil.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, Mr. President, we are considering the awful extravagance of expending $40,000,000 to relieve the sufferings of the few remaining soldiers who made it possible for us to have a Government to-day. When we appropriate $150,000,000 for food control; in other words, when we spend $150,000,000 to drive the price of the farmers' wheat below the market value, we scarcely scan the amount or stop to contemplate that we spend $150 where we save $1 by this Food Commission.

Again, when we vote $150,000,000 to control the price of coal, and then decrease the coal output to such an extent that people freeze, we smile, and we take our medicine, because we say "this is one of the burdens of war." When we take over the railroads of the country and allow the Director General to appropriate $300,000,000 to increase wages—and thereby increase his own popularity, thus killing two birds with one stone—and then charge this same $300,000,000 back to the farmers who must ship over the railroads and compel them to pay 25 per cent more than they have been in the habit of paying for their freight, while you cut down their income 25 per cent, we grin and bear it as a part of the miseries and inequalities of this war.

As I said, Mr. President, when we appropriated $640,000,000 for aircraft—enough to have furnished all the craft we could possibly use in 10 years if it had been expended honestly and efficiently—and when after wasting that we are asked to vote another billion dollars, we are told that we must expect extravagance in war times and that we must expect a great amount of graft!

I drove down Sixth Street the other evening, Mr. President, where employees were constructing Government buildings. I saw two pieces of timber 2 by 8, 14 feet long. They were nailed together by two little slats at the ends. Two men could have taken hold of those two slats and have carried those two pieces of timber anywhere. How many men were handling them? There were 6 men on each side—12 men altogether—carrying those two little pieces of timber, and there were 5 more men standing idly by because there was not any room for any more to get hold of the pieces of timber that they were removing.

A few rods from there a number were unloading a load of lumber composed of boards 1 inch thick by 6 inches wide and about 14 feet long. Any able-bodied man could have taken three of those boards and carried them. It took two men to lift one board of that size off the wagon, and then three men got hold of it, one in the middle and one at each end, and carried it away, while three other individuals stood idly by because there was no work for them to do. That is the way the Government's work is being done here during this war, when we demand more than has ever been demanded before in the history of the country, the physical efficiency of every man who performs labor for the Government.

Mr. CALDER rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. Is that a cost-plus job, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course it is all cost plus; the more men it takes the greater the profit. But you can get at the man who makes the profit, because you can tax him and you can get any per cent of that profit back into the Government coffers, but you never can get the 90 per cent waste of time.

Mr. CALDER. And waste.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; the waste of man power; that is lost forever.

Mr. President, I repeat when we employ five men to do the work of one and pay each of those five men three times his normal wages, we are asked to control our sense of indignation because these are war times and we must expect inefficiency and extravagance.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from North Dakota was speaking a moment ago about the waste in the construction of buildings here in the city of Washington. While the Senator is of the opposite political faith from myself, and I have not always agreed with his utterances, it has been a source of pleasure for me to hear him and to listen to his splendid outspoken Americanism. I want to corroborate what he has been saying as to the inefficiency of the administration that is charged with the building of public structures in this city. Repeatedly I have gone to the places where public buildings are being erected, and I desire to say that the waste there is inexcusable. If Mr. Sterrett, who is in charge of these contracts, as I am told, is responsible for their performance, his record calls for criticism. Whoever is constructing those buildings deserves to be denounced and condemned, not only here but elsewhere, for the waste and extravagance which they permit. I join with the Senator from North Dakota in his condemnation of the methods employed by some of these cost-plus contract men. I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] used the name of Col. Sterrett. In justice to Col. Sterrett, whom I know, I desire to say that he has nothing whatever to do with superintending the construction of buildings. He is a member of the committee that has to do with awarding contracts, but which has nothing whatever to do with managing the work on the jobs.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from North Dakota permit me to make an inquiry of the Senator from New York?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KING. If Col. Sterrett has the letting of these contracts, he must know that some of the men who are performing the work are slackers and profiteers, and why does he not correct the abuse?

Mr. CALDER. I have no knowledge, Mr. President, if the Senator from North Dakota will permit me, of just what method is pursued in handling this work, but I know that vast sums of money are being wasted because of the inefficiency of the management under the contracts. I was at the great quartermaster's base in Brooklyn on Saturday last, and I talked to a carpenter whom I know, and he said he was working 10 hours a day 7 days a week. For the 10 hours a day on week days he was receiving 12 hours' time, and for the 10 hours on Sunday he was receiving 20 hours' time, and was getting 70 cents an hour. He said the actual time that he worked in the 7 days was 70 hours, and he was given 92 hours' time, and received for that time something like $64 a week. Not only is that a waste of money on the part of the Government, but it has the effect of taking from private business the men who are working along those lines, and requiring those who need men in their own business to pay double what ought to be paid. I join the Senator from Utah in condemning that sort of thing, but I hardly think it is fair to condemn Col. Sterrett for it, because I doubt if he is responsible directly for the management of the work of construction.

Mr. McCUMBER. The thing to be condemned is the whole system and the seeming complacency with which the administration views this enormous waste without taking any steps whatever to correct it. It has been stated in the press generally that the great waste in our shipyards is a thing of the past. Only a few days ago an overseer of labor in one of the principal shipyards in the United States saw me at my office and, without giving the name of the shipyard or the name of the individual, he said, "This claim of present efficiency in our shipyards sounds all right in the press, but I want to tell you frankly that we are not getting 50 per cent efficiency in the work of our shipyards." While all this is going on, this enormous extravagance, scandalous beyond anything that has ever happened in the history of the Government, we are sending soldiers over to Europe to fight our battles and we are not able to supply them because we have not the ships, we have not the munitions, we have not the force there that we ought to have been able to put there long before this time.

Mr. President, when we spend $20,000,000,000 to accomplish that which ought to have been accomplished with $5,000,000,000 we are asked to excuse it on the ground that we were unprepared and we must pay 75 per cent of our war taxes for experience. Of course we have got to pay for experience; but when you tell me that we have got to pay 75 per cent for our experience you are telling me of men in charge who are 75 per cent inefficient and unequal to the task imposed upon them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from North Dakota is calling attention to this misuse of the public funds. I have made a good deal of investigation along that line myself, and in every investigation that I have made the same slimy trail of the serpent of greed has been found. The Senator ought to, and I trust he will, pursue the inquiry until the Government official shall be discovered who is condoning or conniving at this species of thievery. The graft and profiteering is in the land and all that is necessary to reveal it in all of its nakedness is to turn on the light. It is all right to condemn the individual contractor who is profiting by this system, but the man primarily responsible to Congress and to the people is the Government official who knows about it and fails to stop it. I hope the Senator will continue his investigation and, if possible, discover the public officer who is betraying the Government and who is a party to this prefidious plundering of the Treasury. We made such a discovery at Hog Island, and ever since we made the discovery certain miserable, lying newspapers have been intimating that those of us who uncovered it were sympathizing with the enemy and that which we did was done for the purpose of delaying the building of ships. A more infamous, unfounded slander was never perpetrated by a hired liar. I think the time has come when the Congress should direct its attention to just such matters as the able Senator is now talking about, and if possible bring to justice the miserable traitors to the Government who are responsible for this robbery of the Public Treasury. The crime of which they are guilty is not less reprehensible because they do it under the guise of patriotism.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, Congress can do really but one thing. Congress appropriates the money, but Congress makes no appointments in the administrative departments of the Government. That is done by the President. We must rely upon him to make appointments of men who are competent to perform their duties. If he fails to secure men of that character Congress is without any redress. All it can do, no matter how great the extravagance may be, is to raise the money by taxation and to vote it by way of appropriations, and do the little kicking on the side, as we are doing in the Senate now, against the extravagance, with the hope that it will at some time have some effect.

The Senator has been down in the departments. Go into any one of them and you will find clerks so closely packed that they are in each others' way, and you will probably find that at least one-fifth of them are idle or semi-idle. We simply have more men at work than we need in all of these places. We have more clerks than we actually need. We could put an army of 10,000,000 men in France to-day, and the remainder of those at home could perform as much physical service for the benefit of the Government as is being performed to-day.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator, of course, recognizes that the Congress can investigate these matters and call them to the attention of the people and the country, just such matters as he is now calling attention to. There ought not to be any trouble to locate the cause of the neglect of duty in the character of work the Senator has just spoken of. The contractor can be found and the man who is supervising the construction can be found. That is a matter that a committee of Congress could look after and discover, and I think it ought to be done. I repeat, I am glad the Senator is calling attention to this matter. He is doing a real service to his country.

Mr. McCUMBER. We tried at one time to create a committee which was to look into the question of war expenditures, but we were unable to put it through. We did not have the votes in the Senate. It would have been the function of that committee to ascertain what was being done with this $640,000,000 that we now find has gone out of existence, and we perhaps could have seen that some of it was efficiently expended at the time.

Mr. VARDAMAN and Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield first to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that Justice Hughes will discover that?

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope he will.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I hope so.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is a very fine thing to discover that your horse is stolen after it is gone, even though you did not take precautionary measures to lock the stable before; but it would have been wiser to guard the animal in the first instance. I now yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I merely wish to correct a statement made by the Senator in reference to the committee to which he has referred. The item providing for that committee, as I recall, passed the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I said we did not get it through. Mr. President, it seems to me, in short, that incompetency and extravagance and graft and slacking, everything abominable and censurable, must be expected in this war, and the only patriotism that we have a right to expect is the patriotism of the soldiers at the front, of the buyers of liberty bonds, and the farmers of the country, who are expected to raise wheat at 40 per cent below its market value. All of the rest can be looked on and excused upon the ground that we were not prepared for this conflict and consequently we expect great extravagance. But, Mr. President, if we can spend and squander billions of dollars more than are necessary in this great conflict, if we can be so wildly extravagant along every line, I confess that we can afford a little $40,000,000 to ease into the grave the old soldiers whose sacrifices gave us this country. I want to give it to them, and I want to give it to them without any strings tied to it, and to say to them, "This is a gift on the part of your Government, the Government which you saved, and this is an expression of gratitude on the part of the Government. It is a gratuity freed from the stigma of pauperism." I hope, Mr. President, that the bill will be passed just as reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GUION in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

Mr. KING. I ask the Secretary to state the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 7——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hardwick	McNary	Shields
Beckham	Henderson	Martin	Simmons
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Smith, Md.
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smoot
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Swanson
Fall	Kellogg	Page	Thompson
Fernald	Kenyon	Phelan	Townsend
France	King	Poindexter	Underwood
Gronna	Lenroot	Pomerene	Vardaman
Gulon	Lewis	Saulsbury	Warren
Hale	Lodge	Shafroth	Wolcott
Harding	McCumber	Sheppard

Mr. KING. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was unexpectedly called from the city. I desire to make that announcement, and will allow it to stand for the day.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. MCKELLAR] on official business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on official business.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] are detained on official business. I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness, and that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained by illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk, in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida, it is proposed to insert at the end of the bill the following:

That no pensioner shall be entitled to receive any benefits under the provisions of this act for any period during which he shall be an inmate of any State or National soldiers' home; and the provisions of this act shall not apply to any pensioner whose net annual income from all sources, including his pension, is $1,000 or more, to be determined by the income-tax reports on file in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who shall annually on the 1st day of July transmit to the Commissioner of Pensions a list of all pensioners having an income, as shown by such reports, in excess of the said sum of $1,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if it will not interfere with the Senator's discussion of his amendment, while I have no authority to do this from the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], I notice that he is absent from the Chamber; and I will ask that that amendment be passed over for the time until the Senator from Florida can be present.

Mr. KING. I shall be very glad if my colleague will accede to that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator in charge of the bill consent that the amendment be passed over temporarily?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] desires to address the Senate, and if that is the case I suggest that he proceed now; and then, if there is time after he has finished, we can take up this matter.

INSTALLMENT PAYMENTS OF INCOME AND EXCESS PROFITS TAXES.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am taking the liberty of addressing the Senate on a subject which is very near to my heart.

On the 26th of February, 1918, I introduced a bill (S. 3963) to permit the payment of income and excess-profits taxes in six monthly installments, beginning July 15, 1918, deferred payments to draw interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum and to be secured. This bill was referred to the Finance Committee, and up to date we have had no report upon it. I understand that two objections are raised to it:

First. The formal objection that legislation of this character should originate in the House if there is to be any legislation upon the subject.

Assuming, without admitting, that this objection is technically well founded, it could be waived, as the provision in the Constitution that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," even if comprehensive enough to cover the change of time of payment of the revenue, is purely directory and not mandatory.

Second. The Treasury Department is opposed to it because, they say, we need the money. In a recent statement authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury he says: "The agitation in favor of legislation to authorize the payment of income and excess-profits taxes in deferred installments is doing much harm." With all due respect and with all kindness, permit me to say that it is not the agitation of this question that is doing harm; but, if harm is resulting, it is because of the unreasonable opposition of the Treasury Department to a very reasonable request. I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I discuss it for a few moments.

Senators will agree with me that the money with which to carry on this war must come from the pockets of our people. We can get it by taxation or by the sale of bonds, or by a combination of the two methods. In any event the people furnish the money. In each of the liberty loan campaigns it was thought wise to have the bonds payable in installments.

FIRST LIBERTY LOAN.

The first liberty loan was offered May 14, 1917. The amount offered was $2,000,000,000. It was closed June 15, 1917. There were nearly 4,000,000 subscribers. The aggregate subscriptions were $3,035,000,000. Two billion dollars were accepted. They were payable as follows:

Two per cent, or $40,000,000, payable on application for loan.
Eighteen per cent, or $360,000,000, payable June 28, 1917.
Twenty per cent, or $400,000,000, payable July 30, 1917.
Thirty per cent, or $600,000,000, payable August 15, 1917.
Thirty per cent, or $600,000,000, payable August 30, 1917.

SECOND LIBERTY LOAN.

Early in October, 1917, the second liberty loan, amounting to $3,000,000,000, was offered. The loan closed October 29, 1917. There were nearly 3,500,000 subscribers. The subscriptions aggregated $4,617,532,200. The Secretary of the Treasury accepted one-half of the amount which was oversubscribed in excess of the $3,000,000,000. In other words, there was allotted to subscribers on account of this loan $3,808,766,150. But these bonds were not required to be paid at one time, but in installments, as follows:

Two per cent, or $76,175,323, payable October 27, 1917.
Eighteen per cent, or $685,577,907, payable November 15, 1917.
Forty per cent, or $1,523,506,460, payable December 15, 1917.
Forty per cent, or $1,523,506,460, payable January 15, 1918.

THIRD LIBERTY LOAN.

When the recent drive for the third liberty loan was begun those in charge appreciated the unwisdom of calling for a loan of $3,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 and require all the money to be paid into the Treasury at one time, and therefore it was provided that these bonds should be paid for in installments. The total subscriptions amounted to $4,170,019,650. This sum, by the terms of the loan, to be paid as follows:

Five per cent, or $208,500,982.50, before May 4, 1918.
Twenty per cent, or $834,003,930, before May 28, 1918.
Thirty-five per cent, or $1,459,506,877.50, before July 18, 1918.
Forty per cent, or $1,668,007,860, before August 15 1918.

This arrangement was made for the convenience of the people who subscribed for the bonds. I think I can safely state that very few subscribed for bonds unless they either had the money in hand with which to pay or had a reasonable prospect of securing it. Suffice it to say, no one, whether he had money or not, was compelled to subscribe for bonds, except out of a pure spirit of patriotism, and we are delighted to record that more than 17,000,000 of our people were ready and willing to come, and did come, to the aid of the Government in the third liberty loan.

In view of this and the earlier prompt responses by the people to the calls of the Government for war funds, does not prudence suggest that whatever may be our plan or plans for raising money, they should be so framed as to reduce to a minimum the burdens upon business.

PAYMENT OF TAXES.

When it comes to the payment of taxes, what do we require? I am glad to testify to the fine spirit which has been shown by the business men of the country. Rarely has anyone heard complaint about the amount of tax. The only favor the taxpayers ask is a little indulgence as to the time when the taxes shall be paid and they have strong reasons for asking this favor at the hands of both the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

While many of us felt for many long months that the war clouds were lowering, it was not until April 6, 1917, that the Congress passed the resolution declaring a state of war with the Imperial Government of Germany.

The revenue law providing for the taxes upon incomes and war profits was not passed until October 3, 1917. The taxes on incomes and excess earnings for the calendar year expiring December 31, 1917, were made payable on or before June 15, 1918. In other words, these taxes for 10 months and 3 days were retroactive in character and the business world had no notice thereof until the revenue bill became a law on October 3, 1917.

Most of the manufacturing, mining, and commercial enterprises of the country during the calendar year of 1917 made great profits, but the demands of the Government as well as of private enterprise were of such a character that in order to meet them business men were required to reinvest their net earnings as they accrued either in increased capacity of their plants or in new stocks of raw material at highly advanced prices. Their greatest task was to get money with which to carry on their business and what would have been the state of our preparations, either from a military or industrial viewpoint, if they had not thus reinvested their profits as earned in their business?

But this is not all. As autumn approached and during the months of winter the great transportation system of this country broke down under the strain and stress of increased traffic and most of our manufacturers and other producers were unable to market their products. Their business enterprises were handicapped. Their warehouses were filled to the bursting point. They could not convert their goods into cash with which to meet their maturing obligations, much less pay their revenue taxes either in advance or as they became due.

It is urged by the Treasury Department that the Congress did afford relief by providing that these taxes could be paid in whole or in part in advance of their maturity. But these taxes were not made payable in advance for the benefit of the taxpayer. It was for the benefit of the Government. I only need to suggest in answer to this argument if men do not have the money to meet their obligations when they mature they probably do not have the money with which to cancel these obligations before maturity. In my judgment it would have been much better not to attempt to assign a reason for opposition to this bill than to assign such a reason. I am not pleading for extension of time for men who have the cash with which to pay. I am pleading for those who do not have it.

Again, it is suggested by the Treasury Department that short-time certificates to the amount of $1,500,000,000 have been issued, which will mature between June 1 and 15, and these must be paid. It is said that the taxpayers had the right to buy these short-time certificates from time to time and turn them into the Treasury in payment of their taxes.

Of course, they had this right of purchase, and they can use these certificates for that purpose if they have them. But I doubt if many business men bought short-time certificates unless they had the cash with which to pay for them; and if, because of industrial and transportation conditions, the producers could not market their wares they probably did not have the money with which to buy them. I think I can safely assert that the Treasury Department went into the markets where money was to be found and sold these short-time certificates to those who had the money, not to the producers who may have had property but did not have money. And, again, I must add that an argument to the effect that men who have no money with which to pay their taxes could go into the market and, out of their lack of money, buy short-time certificates with which to pay their obligations is not very convincing.

Surely, if taxpayers had the money with which to buy short-time certificates, would not business prudence suggest that instead of thus investing their money they would take advantage of the discount of 3 per cent provided in the revenue law and pay their taxes before maturity or discharge other obligations? Careful business men always discount their bills when they can. Would they not by the same token discount their taxes when permitted, if they had the money with which to do it?

It is no doubt true that the class of taxpayers who had money to invest in short-time certificates will use them in the payment of their axes pro tanto, and to that extent it will relieve the strain on the cash of the country and thereby indirectly help those who have taxes to pay by increasing the amount of available cash which may be loaned by the banks of the country to those who are required to borrow.

But we must not forget that at least 90 per cent of the business men of the country are borrowers. Other things being equal, the larger the volume of business conducted the greater the amount of borrowed capital required. National banks and most State banks can not loan to an individual borrower in excess of 10 per cent of their capital and surplus. Many business men have been compelled to borrow, and have borrowed from their banks to this limit. This is not a special condition which applies to scattered communities; it applies to nearly all of the industrial cities and towns of the country. No matter what collateral borrowers may have to present to the banks, many of them do not have the funds to loan. The banks of the country have been acting very patriotically in accommodating their clients wherever and whenever they could, but they have been taxed to the limit in caring for the current necessities of their respective communities, and it is going to be a serious proposition, not only with the business men but with the banks themselves, to arrange to accommodate the taxpayers of the country and advance $2,775,185,000, the estimated income and excess-profits taxes to be paid on June 15, in addition to the normal demands made upon banks by the commerce of the country. The communication of the Secretary of the Treasury to the President of the Senate indicates that this amount will be largely increased, and I feel justified in expressing the opinion that when the Treasury Department receives full returns the total income and excess-profits taxes will amount to not less than $3,000,000,000.

PER CAPITA CIRCULATION.

Let me present another phase of this question. May 1, 1918, the total circulating medium of the country was $5,318,546,717. Estimating the population of continental United States at 105,581,000—and these are the figures given by the Secretary of the Treasury—the circulation per capita was, on that date, $50.37. The total income and excess-profits taxes to be paid on June 15, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, amount to $2,755,185,000. In other words, if these taxes are to be paid in cash or its equivalent, and presumably they must be, it will require 52.17 per cent of the circulating medium of the country to make the payment. If these taxes amount to $3,000,000,000, as I verily believe they will, it will require 56.40 per cent of the circulating medium to pay them—and this to be raised in one day. I do not believe it will be said the circulating medium of the country is very much in excess of our commercial requirements under normal conditions.

I have just presented this subject as if all the circulating medium was available. Let me present the same thought in another way. The cash in all of the banks on June 20, 1917, was $1,502,502,000. I have not been able to get figures for a later date. The estimated population May 1, 1917, was 103,859,000, making the per capita in bank $14.46. Dividing the total estimated income and excess-profits taxes to be paid June 15, 1918, $2,775,185,000, by the estimated population, 105,581,000—and these are the figures of the Treasury Department—the per capita income and excess-profits taxes to be paid on June 15, 1918, will amount to $26.28, or, in other words, they will be $11.82 in excess of the per capita cash in the banks of the country. Assuming the revenue from this source will reach $3,000,000,000, the per capita taxes to be paid will be $28.14, or $13.95 in excess of the per capita cash in the banks.

Should not these facts give us pause for thought? Even if it were not going to prove a serious inconvenience to the bankers and business men of the country, ought not the Government to hesitate before it throws this burden upon the circulating medium of the country in one day's time?

The Treasury Department realizes the force of this argument, and they hope to relieve against it to some degree by permitting, and I quote the words of the Secretary, "qualified depositories, banks, and trust companies to make payment of taxes for themselves and their customers by credit, in the same way as subscriptions for bonds and Treasury certificates are paid."

This method will help banks and trust companies, but it will not help the taxpayers generally, except by indirection. It does not increase their line of credit at their banks; it will not authorize the banks to loan in excess of 10 per cent of their capital and surplus, and it is going to seriously embarrass the industrial communities for the ready cash with which to conduct current business.

I have been referring to the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury that some of these taxes might be paid "by credit," but since that suggestion was made there has been issued, under date of May 29, 1918, a supplement to Department Circular No. 92, in which it is expressly provided that "payment of income and excess-profit taxes can not be made by credit."

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KELLOGG. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him one question.

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am in sympathy with the views of the Senator on this question, and it is not from a want of sympathy that I ask the question. The last Treasury statement which I saw, however—that of May 17, 1918—showed to the credit of the disbursing officers of the Government only $932,000,000, in round figures. I will not read the fractions.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the date of that statement?

Mr. KELLOGG. May 17, 1918. That was the amount which the disbursing officers of the Government could draw upon to pay the obligations of the Government. Now, as I am informed, the expenditures of the Government to-day amount to a billion and a half a month, and are increasing at the rate of $100,000,000 a month; and if that is true, by the 1st of January, 1919, those expenditures will equal $2,000,000,000 a month, or $24,000,000,000 a year. Is it not quite probable that the Treasury must have the money with which to meet those expenditures?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the question of the Senator from Minnesota anticipates my argument.

Mr. KELLOGG. I beg the Senator's pardon, then, for interrupting him.

Mr. POMERENE. I think I shall explain that matter to the entire satisfaction of the Senator or anybody else who has studied this question, except the Treasury Department.

My belief is that this is a method of financing which under ordinary circumstances would not be approved. It may be added further that the mere fact that the Treasury Department suggests this plan is a sufficient demonstration that it does not need the cash on that particular date.

CAN THE BANKS MEET THESE DEMANDS ON JUNE 15?

That the payment of these taxes on one date will be a serious drain on the banks is quite evident.

Under date April 1, 1918, I was advised that the cash in the banks of Cleveland, exclusive of the Federal reserve bank, amounted to $17,500,000. The cash in the Federal reserve bank and other depositories amounted to $75,000,000, a total of $92,500,000. The aggregate income and excess-profits taxes to be paid in that city was estimated at from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000. In other words, the taxes to be paid by the business people of Cleveland were approximately equal to, if not in excess of, the cash in the Cleveland banks, their depositories, and the reserve bank. All the figures given as to taxes are estimated, but I may say that later information indicates that they are not very far from right.

The Treasury Department, as I am informed, does not keep separate accounts for each city and town or locality, but for the several districts, and it is therefore not possible to find the exact amount of taxes payable in each city without a vast deal of clerical labor. I believe these figures, however, to be substantially correct.

On March 28, 1918, in the city of Columbus the total cash in the banks of that city amounted to $3,320,000; the total due from banks amounted to $11,100,000, or a total of $14,420,000. At the same time they owed for bills payable and bills discounted $2,450,000, leaving a balance of cash in the vaults and amounts due from banks of $11,970,000. The income and excess-profits taxes to be paid by the people of that city were variously estimated at from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000. Or, in other words, the taxes to be paid are more than the available cash in the banks.

In the little, but thriving, city of Ironton there are four banks with a total capital of $575,000. The income and excess-profits taxes to be paid by her industries reach the astounding figure of $1,500,000, or nearly three times the total bank capital of that little city.

In the State of Ohio there are one or more important industrial cities, towns, or communities in nearly every one of her 88 counties.

I could, if time permitted, give similar data with respect to many other localities, but I do not conceive this to be necessary. The conditions prevailing in Cleveland, Columbus, and Ironton are not exceptions. They are typical of conditions throughout the State.

I hope the Senate will indulge me while I read brief extracts from some letters received by me from chambers of commerce, clearing house associations, commercial and financial organizations, as well as from bankers, merchants, and manufacturers.

CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States, at its annual meeting held in Chicago, April 10, 11, and 12, 1918, adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the United States again recommends and urges the passage by Congress of a law providing for the payment of income, excess profits, and other special war taxes in installments so arranged as to give adequate protection to the commercial, industrial, and financial interests of the country.

Under date of February 28, 1918, the chamber of commerce of the city of Columbus writes, in part, as follows:

Should the Government fail to permit a distribution of these payments over a period of time * * * the result might be very disastrous. In Columbus alone it would be necessary for very many prosperous businesses either to withdraw money from working capital and reduce operations or to borrow large amounts from the banks. It is estimated that the total payments of Columbus taxes would aggregate more than one-half of the total deposits of Columbus banks.

CLEARING HOUSE ASSOCIATIONS.

Under date February 21, 1918, the Cleveland Clearing House Association passed the following resolution:

Whereas it is conservatively estimated that the income and excess-profits taxes due from individuals and corporations of this city will amount to $150,000,000; and

Whereas the time of payment of income taxes will be coincident with the payments on the next issue of liberty bonds; and

Whereas the payment of this large amount will seriously affect the resources of the banks of Cleveland: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we urge upon the honorable Secretary of the Treasury that action be taken to distribute the payment of income and excess-profits taxes over the balance of the calendar year.

In a letter to me, under date February 23, 1918, Mr. C. A. Paine, president of the Cleveland Clearing House Association, writes:

As you know, we are a large manufacturing city, and all of our banks have been called upon to extend larger loans to our customers than usual, on account of the large business which they are doing, the increased cost of material, labor, and the delay on account of the railroad congestion. This has necessitated our rediscounting at the Federal reserve bank to a considerable extent.

We all feel that unless this situation is relieved by the time the income and excess-profits taxes are due, the strain on the banks will be almost more than they are able to meet.

The President of the Akron Clearing House Association on April 17, 1918, stated that a careful survey showed that the income and excess-profits tax due from individuals and corporations of that city will amount to somewhere between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000, and expressed the opinion that in order to relieve the strain on the banks it is absolutely necessary that these payments be distributed over the balance of the year.

ASSOCIATIONS OF CREDIT MEN.

On March 19, 1918, "the Ohio conference of the National Association of Credit Men, representing 2,000 Ohio manufacturers, wholesalers, and jobbers in convention assembled at Cleveland, unanimously indorsed a plan for the extension of time of payment of Federal income tax and recommend that such payment be made in installments over a period of months."

The Cincinnati Association of Credit Men, under date April 11, 1918, writes:

As an organization of Cincinnati business men, representing 500 manufacturers and wholesalers, we are firmly of the opinion that it is vital in maintaining stable conditions in credits throughout the country, that some legislation be passed permitting the payment of war income and excess-profits taxes in installments over a period of months.

Such legislation meets with the approval of not only the local organization but the State organization, as evidenced by the resolution to this effect adopted at Cleveland, March 19, 1918.

ASSOCIATIONS.

The officers of the Bankers' Association in the following States—Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, North Dakota, Nebraska, Ohio, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin—in a conference passed certain resolutions in which they used in part the following language:

In our opinion the payment of the entire amount at any fixed date may cause an unnecessary and undesirable contraction of credit.

The Ohio Manufacturers' Association, Columbus, in a statement issued to the manufacturers of that State, several weeks ago, said:

The banking deposits of Columbus on January 1, 1918, were $50,000,000. The reserves on the same date were $12,000,000. From careful estimates made by bankers and others the total tax, individual and corporate, which the city will have to pay to the Government on or before June 15, 1918, will be from $18,000,000 to $20,000,000.

This is a burden which the banks of the city can not assume without great difficulty, and which will necessarily result in the calling of loans and in the curtailing of necessary business. Of course, eventually much of the money will return to the city through the ordinary channels of trade, but it will be a long time before this happens and the immediate strain will be very great.

The Industrial Association of Cincinnati recently passed resolutions declaring that—

In our opinion the payment of the entire amount at any fixed date may cause an unnecessary and undesirable contraction of credit.

RETAIL ASSOCIATIONS.

The Ohio Retail Dry Goods Association, after urging legislation permitting the payment of these taxes in installments, say:

In the opinion of this association, unless such extension is granted, it will necessarily curtail business operations and cripple business enterprises and banking facilities to such an extent that it will be almost impossible for the banks to finance the tax, if the whole tax is to be paid on or before June 15.

In a note accompanying this resolution the secretary of the association says:

The first installment can be in circulation by the time the other installments fall due, thereby maintaining an equilibrium.
This is a patriotic move, as stability of business is essential to the successful prosecution of the war.

The Retail Merchants' Association of Columbus, under date March 27, sent me copy of resolution adopted by them, in which they express the opinion that—

Unless such extension is granted it will necessarily curtail business operations and cripple business enterprises and banking facilities to such an extent that it will be almost impossible for the banks to finance the tax, if the whole is to be paid on or before June 15.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to an interruption?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator, in view of the very seriousness of the situation which he describes, which all communities will suffer equally with his own, whether he has ever taken this matter up with the Secretary of the Treasury and has used the data which he has collected, evidently with some care, and which is so full of meaning, and whether there is any prospect of getting the cooperation of the executive department of the Government in the very praiseworthy attempt which the Senator is making to get relief from this situation?

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator's question is very pertinent and very proper. I did take it up with him some weeks ago, prior to his starting on the third liberty-loan campaign, and since that time I have taken it up probably three or four times with one of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, who has had the matter in charge. Without going into the details of these conferences, I think I may say that their contention has been that they need the money. But I think, if the Senator will do me the honor to listen until I have completed my statement, I shall be able to show that they do not need all this money at one time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will pardon me, are we going now to fail to act because of the lack of sympathy of the Treasury Department with our plan, or are we failing to act because of the legislative situation in which we find ourselves?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I introduced this bill February 26. I have had several conferences with individual members of the Finance Committee. I have taken it up and discussed it with Senators and with certain Representatives in Congress, and I find that practically everybody agrees with me save and except the Secretary of the Treasury and his assistants; that is, everyone with whom I have come in contact. I may say that in my humble judgment the business men of the country, who are to finance this war, have some knowledge of public finances.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And some rights.

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite sure that the business men of the country are going to yield to additional taxes and they are going to subscribe for additional bonds, and they will do it with a patriotic purpose. Knowing their disposition in that behalf, we ought to make these burdens as light as possible.

BUSINESS MEN'S CLUB.

The Business Men's Club of Cincinnati, under date of March 1, 1918, wires:

The extension of time beyond June 15 for paying part of the excess-profits tax we believe is absolutely essential to the business interests and welfare of the country, and we heartily indorse the above-suggested extension and respectfully recommend same be given most earnest and careful consideration.

MANUFACTURERS.

On March 2 a prominent firm in Akron wrote concerning the payment of these taxes in a lump sum on or before June 15, 1918, as follows:

Unless modified, I think this requirement is going to bring on the most serious financial disturbance the country has experienced since the panic of 1903.
Without upsetting our entire scheme of financing, it is impossible to withdraw from our banking institutions at one time the amount of money required to pay the income and excess-profits tax.

Another manufacturing concern of the same city, under date of March 28, writes concerning the payment of these taxes at one time as follows:

The financial shock will be tremendous if the entire income tax must be paid on one day, and I sincerely trust that your bill may pass Congress and thereby prevent an injury to the Nation that can easily be avoided without interfering with the needs of the Government.

One of the leading manufacturing concerns of my home city, Canton, writes under date of March 18, 1918:

If all corporations and all individuals are called upon to pay this huge sum of money by June 15, I can't for the life of me see where the cash will come from.

Another firm from the same city writes:

From inquiries made at the banks and financial institutions with which we have come in contact, as well as manufacturers and other business interests, we have had our opinion confirmed, that due to the expansion in business it has been necessary to transfer a large portion of our working capital into equipment and buildings in order to meet the demand for increased output, which we have been called upon to produce for the past two years.
The present conditions make it necessary for us to secure additional funds from banks in order to meet the demands for increased price of material and labor, and is taking a large amount of additional capital. These conditions have led to the inquiry of a number of our friends as to how the current business is to be taken care of when we are compelled to pay over to the Government in one sum the amount of income which will be called in this vicinity.
We certainly feel that it will work as a hardship upon all of us if there is no change in the date of payment.

Another large firm writes:

It will undoubtedly work a great hardship on a great many concerns to pay the entire amount in one payment, and the total amount to be made by all the payees, if taken at one time, can not help, as I see it, being a disturbing factor in the financial and industrial world. Just how this should be done, I am, of course, not prepared to say; but that it should be done, I am quite thoroughly convinced.

A prominent firm of Toledo, Ohio, writes in part as follows:

The payment of the excess-profits taxes on last year's business, which will be due on June 15, as well as the necessary payment of the income tax for the same period, together with State, county, and city taxes, all of which are due about the same time of the year, is, in our judgment, going to create a crisis in the affairs of many businesses, that will not have been able by that time to adjust themselves to this extra and unusual expenditure.

And after urging the payment of these taxes in monthly installments, this firm adds:

This extension would act as a cushion, to let many concerns down a little easier, and by another year, perhaps, everybody will be more used to these extraordinary payments and will have arranged their affairs to take care of them.

Another Toledo firm, on March 28, 1918, writes:

Something should be done by Congress to enable corporations to pay the income and excess-profits tax in three or four installments.
Speaking of my own companies, most of which have made money and all of whom are carrying greatly increased inventories (due entirely to the high level of values) and too many liberty bonds, I want you to know that we can not pay all of our tax in June without selling the bonds and declining to subscribe to the next issue, neither of which we wish to do.
The 4 per cents net us exactly 1.6 per cent after paying the excess tax on same. Of course, we did not purchase them as money makers, but when Mr. McAdoo thinks we are getting 4 per cent, less income tax, he is very much mistaken, for after paying 6 per cent for the money to buy them we are out just 3.40 per cent upon the transaction.

In closing his letter, this writer, whom I know personally and very favorably, says:

Do not, I beg of you, think for a moment that we are wanting in patriotism; the Government can have our shops, talents, and money, but they can not have more money than we possess.

One of the large firms of Cincinnati writes:

We subscribed for $200,000 of the second liberty loan and borrowed the money to do so, as we needed the capital we have in the business to take care of our regular business. We were able to carry these bonds for three months on a basis of 4 per cent. We asked for a renewal of one-half of them and are paying 4½ per cent interest on those. We do not object to this, because it is for the Government, and we want to do our "bit."
On account of the railroad situation and delay in delivery of material, a great many of our customers are asking for extra time, saying they have not been able to ship their material and get their money and they can not pay us the amounts due and want to give us notes.
The furnaces have been hard hit by the lack of coke and an exceptional winter, and they are asking us to advance them against their shipments.
We shall have to pay a pretty large excess-profits tax, and the members of our firm will also pay a larger amount of income tax, and it looks now like they would have to borrow the money to do it, and this is brought about through no fault of theirs, but on account of the railroad troubles. We feel there is nothing else to be done except to hope for Congress to help the business interests by extension of payment of income tax. If this is not done, the Government will find a great many manufacturers and business men who will be unwilling to take any more bonds except those they can absolutely pay for.

A large manufacturing concern of Cincinnati, under date March 12, writes, in part, as follows:

We feel the interests of the country at large would be far better served if the payment of this tax could be distributed over a period of 90 days or 4 months. If we are forced to make payment of this tax in one lump sum, it undoubtedly will result in a very serious situation, causing a decided slump in business.

Another prominent business man of Cincinnati writes with regard to the payment of income and excess-profits taxes:

It is really necessary for credit and safety of many individuals and firms that payment of such taxes be permitted to extend over a few months rather than on one day, June 15.

Another large concern, under date March 1, 1918, writes:

The present law will at one time take from the channels of trade such a huge sum of money that commercial institutions are likely to be seriously handicapped; particularly manufacturing enterprises, which require, under present conditions, a much larger percentage of operating capital to output than ever before. In many cases the severity of the burden may interfere with the output of manufactured products which directly or indirectly contribute to the winning of the war.

These taxes, which have been loyally accepted by the business interests of the country as a necessary war sacrifice, would be much less burdensome if paid in installments, and this would, in our opinion, avoid the curtailing of production likely to result under the present plan.

Another large firm writes, under date March 2, in reference to the payment of war excess-profits taxes under the law of October 3, 1917, as follows:

It will impose a burden on our corporation to pay our taxes in a single payment so shortly after they are assessed. It will mean a hardship to us, for the reason that we will have to withdraw, if we are obliged to pay these taxes in one payment according to the law, a large amount of capital which we could employ to good advantage in our business, and can hardly withdraw the amount in so short a space of time.

We believe other corporations, merchants, and manufacturers in general are all meeting the same conditions, and wish to have this tax collected through installment payments, say, two or three payments to be spread out over a period of three to six months, first installment to start as specified by the law, and the others to be extended as seem best for the interests of both the Government and taxpayers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have listened to the Senator with a great deal of interest, yet I have not heard him say what I think should be said with reference to the excess-profits tax. The excess-profits tax is the amount in excess of the preceding period which these business concerns earned. If they have invested that money in new machinery and extension of plant, if they have invested it in brick and mortar and labor for the extension of their plant, they are assessed exactly as though it were cash in their vaults, and they can not realize on this machinery nor brick nor mortar nor labor expended.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator's question suggests this further fact: It is true that these profits have been invested in additions to their plants, and it happens that these manufacturers, from whose letters I am now reading, are many of them engaged in the manufacture of machine tools, and they were urged to make these additions to their plants through the press by the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am glad that I called the Senator's attention to that aspect of the situation. I gathered as much from what I have seen myself in the State of Ohio, where in steel and in iron so much of their money is invested. It seems to me that the Secretary of the Treasury, who has in many respects shown a very broad and commendable view of the business necessities of the country, should give heed to this desire upon the part of business men not to be penalized all at one moment for what is really a semigovernmental function which they are following.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have very great admiration for the very great ability and patriotism of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I commend nearly everything that he has done, but I think that he has made a mistake in this matter, and I am calling this to the attention of the Senate because I believe it to be my duty to my constituents and the people at large to do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not think that much of the hardship which he has enumerated will be relieved if the Secretary of the Treasury follows out the plan which he suggested to the Finance Committee, of a redeposit of all sums in the particular district from which collected in the banks of that district to be drawn by the Government only as needed, so that the same sum can be loaned and reloaned to those who pay out the taxes?

Mr. POMERENE. Of course, that is going to aid the communities very materially, but I want Senators to bear this fact in mind. I said before in my argument, in the early part of it, that 90 per cent of the manufacturers of this country are borrowers, and it requires more capital to do a given quantum of business now than it did two or three years ago. Many of these manufacturers have borrowed up to the very limit, not so much the limit of their borrowing capacity, if they had a place to which they could go; but under the restrictions which are wisely placed around the national-bank system and the State-bank system, limiting the amount of money which can be loaned to an individual borrower to 10 per cent of the paid in capital and surplus, they are not able to get this money.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Secretary intimated in his testimony before the committee that a considerable proportion of that which would be paid, if paid in full, would be needed very shortly after the date set for payment by the law itself, and of course the Senator will agree that the Government must have the funds in some way as rapidly as the Government needs to expend it. If all the balance except that which the Government needs to pay out is left in the banks in the vicinity from which it was collected, why have we not secured about the same results that we would secure if these parties were allowed to pay interest to the Government for the difference, because they would be paying the same interest if they borrowed the same amount of money from the bank?

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator's question and statement in part anticipates my argument, and with his permission I will postpone my reply to it until a little later.

Of course, the depositing of these funds in certain localities will to a certain extent relieve the financial situation; yet it is not going to relieve the inability of many men to borrow, since they have already borrowed up to their limit.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to mention one fact which I think the Senator has overlooked in his argument. As I understood the Senator from Ohio, he was comparing for some purpose the cash on hand in various banking centers. In Ohio—and the same condition exists elsewhere—with the amount of the excess-profits and income tax to be paid, as a matter of fact, as those taxes will be paid in credits——

Mr. POMERENE. No; Mr. President, they will not be paid in credits.

Mr. KELLOGG. But checks will be accepted on a man's bank account.

Mr. POMERENE. But those checks must be drawn against cash.

Mr. KELLOGG. They will be drawn against credit in the bank which a man has on deposit.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me call the Senator's attention to this: Under date of May 29, 1918, the Treasury Department issued a statement supplemental to Department Circular No. 92, dated October 6, 1917, and the supplement thereto, dated April 10, 1918, in which they say:

Payment of income and excess-profits taxes can not be made by credit.

Mr. KELLOGG. They may be paid with checks.

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. And checks are drawn on bank deposits. The comparison which, it seems to me, should be made is between the total excess-profits and income taxes and the amount of bank deposits in the country. The amount of deposits in the country in national banks on March 4 was $14,438,000,000, and on the last report of all other banks they were $17,671,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, of course we all understand this to be the fact——

Mr. KELLOGG. Well——

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me a minute.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me complete the question.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

Mr. KELLOGG. As those are the deposits which must be drawn on by checks to pay the taxes, it is equivalent to paying them by the credits of the country, is it not?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the resources of the banks are in part credits, but I have called attention to the strain it is going to be upon the circulating medium, and it was for that reason I made the comparison between the taxes to be paid and the cash in the country or in the banks; and I think I will demonstrate before I get through with the argument that the Government does not need all this money at one time.

Another large concern in Cincinnati writes:

As a manufacturer I can freely state that although we have made a reasonable amount of money in the past four or five years, the great bulk of it has been put back into our business in order to increase our output, and this is especially true in the last year since our own Government has been at war. This is done at the request of the Government, as they have repeatedly requested through the public press that all manufacturers engaged in work for the Government should use their utmost effort to increase their production. Production can only be increased by increased investments. Our stock of raw and finished material to-day is many times larger than ever before in the history of our company, and I think the same is true of most manufacturing concerns—I know it is true as to the metal industries.

If the manufacturers are forced to pay this money between now and June, they will either have to curtail their buying or dispose of their holdings in bonds and stock, which, under present market conditions, will mean a terrible loss.

Another large concern, under date of February 26, writes, after suggesting that the taxes be paid in installments "every three or every four months from June 15 to the end of the year":

If you could get along with payments made in that way it would be, in our opinion, a wonderful relief to the country, and we know it would be to ourselves. In our little business, if the banks refuse to accommodate us we do not see how in the world the money could be raised. Whether the banks will do this or not we do not know, but in large concerns it must be still worse.

* * * In talking to many others, they feel the same way that we do, that this amount of money demanded on one day is going to make a terrible hardship on the majority of the manufacturers throughout the country.

Another large concern writes:

We fear that not sufficient thought has been given to the fact that it will probably mean disaster and great hardship to have all the money raised under this law taken from the ordinary channels of trade in one day, when it is remembered that the collection of this tax will be preceded or followed very shortly by the collection of the ordinary taxes—Federal, State, county, and municipal—and that another issue of liberty bonds is proposed, while the extraordinary demands for contributions to the Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, and other patriotic and worthy causes, which are very worthy, must be met.

Another large manufacturing concern writes:

During 1916 the profits from our business were mostly divided between subscriptions to the first and second liberty loans and for payments for raw material and stock which we are compelled to carry and for which we pay now almost treble the old prices. Therefore our surplus money has been invested and a lump payment of our tax in June will be a big problem for us and necessitates great hardship in curtailing our business and in borrowing additional funds.

Freight conditions cause us to carry a larger stock than usual, both on account of our fear of not receiving raw materials and also on account of not being able at times to ship finished goods, and with the fact mentioned above that this stock is worth much more to-day than in normal times, and we see no relief from this condition during the coming months, our money will remain tied up in our business. * * *

We therefore respectfully suggest that you consider the change in date set for payment of the tax, either postponing same or allowing it to be paid in installments throughout the balance of the year.

Another large manufacturing concern writes:

The manufacturers and business men in general feel the effects of the war, even at this time, very keenly. They have gone through an unusually hard winter and through the railroad embargoes, which shut off shipping; their funds are tied up. It surely will border on the impossible for many of them to raise this money in one sum by June 15.

It must be remembered in the meantime that the business men are also called upon for the very many other war activities, such as the Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association, not to mention the many demands from cantonments for community houses, smileage books, and all manner of things of a similar nature. Finally, it must be remembered that the business men will surely be expected to again subscribe liberally for the third issue of the liberty bonds, and the majority of them, we believe, and we are among the number, have not yet been able to in full take care of our 4 per cent liberty bonds, to which we subscribed very heavily, indeed.

Another large concern writes:

In the case of our own company, as well as individuals connected therewith, we have bought very heavily of Government bonds and would like to continue to take our share of forthcoming issues. We still have heavy payments to make on our commitments for bonds.

In ordinary times we could go to our banks for large loans. Financial conditions, however, are such to-day—and there is no relief promised for the immediate future—that we can not count on our usual accommodations from the banks.

Although we have been very conservative in the management of our business, the needs of the Government have forced us to make considerable extensions.

We think our concern is typical of many others who will encounter serious difficulty if the taxes for the year must be paid not later than June 15.

Another firm writes:

We affirm that our business was very profitable in the years 1915, 1916, and 1917, after some seven years of practically no profits. Desirous of expanding our business we contracted for a new building and other improvements some nine months before the passage of the excess-profits tax law, which has more than taken our available cash and profits of 1917 and previous years, and making us a borrower. The tightening of the money market prevents our borrowing a single dollar on our real estate by mortgage or otherwise (which under normal conditions we could easily do), and as our line of open credit at the bank has already been exhausted we are facing the serious problem of how we are to raise additional funds to meet these June taxes. Understand, we made no new contracts after the passage of the law; in fact, for some three months before the act, but contracts let months previous we had to carry out.

I could spend hours reading letters to the same effect, and with them fill many pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I do not care to consume the time of the Senate. I have had similar communications from more than 21 States in the Union. On the other hand, I have received but one letter in the last six months suggesting that efforts to extend the time of payment perhaps should be stopped, in view of the opposition of the Secretary of the Treasury to them.

These letters from which I have read to the Senate, as well as others which I have in my possession, are but the outpouring of the convictions of intelligent, broad-gauged, patriotic business men who not only understand financing their own business propositions but have a comprehension of national finances as well. Whatever the Congress may see fit to do toward granting them relief I know they will submit to and do the best they can. But if some relief is not granted them they will never cease to feel that when the Government had its opportunity to help them it failed to do so.

But I have been asked several questions touching the financial condition of the Treasury, and I wish to dwell upon that for a few minutes.

FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE TREASURY.

I am advised that it will require on an average about $1,000,000,000 per month to finance our own obligations and to meet the promises which we have made to our allies. In other words, at the present rate of current expenditures, the war will require $12,000,000,000 per year. I am not taking into consideration increased expenditures, which are to be expected.

Of course, they are going to increase, but they are not going to be met by this tax, which is to be paid by June 15.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I may be wrongly advised, but I have been informed that the expenditures now are a billion and a half dollars a month.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I will refer to that in a moment. It is true that our expenses during the month of May were a billion and a half dollars, but I am speaking of the average during the current year. They will probably be larger later on.

Mr. KELLOGG. But I am advised that they are increasing at the rate of a hundred million dollars a month.

Mr. POMERENE. Be that as it may, that does not meet the situation.

On May 14, 1918, according to the daily statement issued by the United States Treasury Department, there was a balance in the Treasury of $1,647,962,823.94.

On the same day, according to the estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a resolution of the Senate, we were advised that the aggregate collections from all sources for the fiscal year of 1918 would amount to $4,095,699,000.

The total subscriptions for the third liberty-loan sale amounted to $4,170,019,650.

Making a total revenue from these three sources of $9,913,681,473.94.

In addition to this amount there are several thousands outstanding returns of income and excess profits, and my belief is that they will be sufficient to increase the revenue from this source from $2,775,185,000, reported by the Secretary of the Treasury, to $3,000,000,000, and adding this estimated increase to the total as above stated will bring the amount of the funds to $10,138,496,473.92.

With this amount added, estimating that the expense will not be in excess of $1,000,000,000 per month, the revenue from these three sources would be sufficient to pay the expenses of the Government from May 14, 1918, until after March 1, 1919.

It develops, however, that the Treasury Department issued short-time certificates, in anticipation of the third liberty loan, to the amount of $3,012,085,500.

Of this amount there has already been paid $900,000,000; certificates turned in as payment on the above subscriptions maturing May 28, $120,474,500; maturing June 18, $123,311,000; maturing July 9, $144,741,000; maturing July 18, $103,023,000; making a total of $1,391,549,500; leaving balance unpaid, which will mature May 28, June 18, July 9, and July 18, $1,620,536,000.

The Treasury Department has also issued short-time certificates maturing July 25 amounting to $1,500,604,000.

This leaves a total of outstanding unpaid certificates amounting to $3,121,140,000.

I am unable to state what proportion of the certificates already redeemed have been paid out of the revenue for the current calendar year, but if the total issue, aggregating $4,512,689,500, has been or is to be paid out of the funds in the Treasury, or to be derived from the taxes to be paid June 15, 1918, or the third liberty loan, there would still remain a balance of $5,625,806,973.94. If the expenses of the Government amount to $1,000,000,000 per month, there will be sufficient funds to carry the Government through until after November 1, 1918, even if there were no revenues derivable from any other source whatsoever.

But we have revenues coming in from the customs, from the post office, and from many other sources of internal revenue which are not taken into consideration in this calculation I have made, and which will substantially add to the Government's revenues.

One of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury advises me the disbursements for the months of May and June may aggregate $3,000,000,000, or for these two months $1,000,000,000 in excess of the rate of expenditures above stated. Assuming this to be true, under the calculations just made all of the short-time certificates will be paid and the funds arranged for will meet the demands of the Government until October 1. All of this money is furnished by the public. Under the plan of the Treasury Department, if no extension of the time of payment is granted, much of this money will be in the Treasury months before it is needed. As bearing upon the ability of the Government to grant an extension of the time of the payment for a part of these taxes it will be interesting for Senators to remember that the third liberty loan is being paid much more rapidly than is required by the terms of sale. The New York Times on May 19, 1918, informed us that out of a total subscription in the Federal reserve bank district of New York, amounting to $1,114,930,700, it has received payment to the amount of $812,489,904, or nearly 73 per cent of its entire subscription.

On May 20, 1918, I was advised by the Treasury Department that out of the total subscription of the third liberty loan $2,500,000,000 had already been paid. Or, in other words, there had already been paid on May 20, 1918, an amount equal to the payments becoming due May 4, May 28, and July 18. How much has been paid since May 20 I do not know. The fact that these payments have thus been made in advance is all the more reason why it is not necessary to be so insistent upon the payment of all of these taxes upon June 15.

It is expected that a new loan will be called in October or November.

If the Government was able during the past few months to arrange for a loan in the form of short-time certificates aggregating $4,512,689,500 in anticipation of the collection of the taxes, the payment of which was not secured, and of the third liberty loan, at a time when the loan was not yet arranged for, can it not issue short-time certificates, if necessary, in anticipation of the collection of a part of the taxes if their payment is secured and deferred as the proposed legislation contemplates?

Ought we not to do this little bit for the business public? If the Government in the past few months has issued this large number of short-time certificates and has paid all or the most of them off, can it not issue other short-time certificates if necessary? Surely the Government can not take the position that it has exhausted its ability to make loans on short-time certificates. Surely those who have money and have accommodated the Government in the past by buying these certificates will continue to accommodate the Government by buying short-time certificates in the future.

I am making this appeal for those who have their all invested in their business and who do not have the ready cash. I beg of the Congress to pause and think what will be the effect of compelling the business men to pay into the Treasury $3,000,000,000 in one day.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. The issuance of the certificates of which the Senator speaks would not increase the circulating medium; they would not increase the amount of cash.

Mr. POMERENE. No; that is true.

Mr. GRONNA. Those who would buy these certificates would have to utilize whatever cash they might have in the bank; so that it really would not make any difference whether they pay their money for certificates or whether they pay it for taxes.

Mr. POMERENE. That is true, so far as they are concerned; but it is interesting to note that only those people invest in short-time certificates who have the money. The taxpayer who has no money does not invest in them.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator is making a very logical argument. Of course, I admit that if we have the necessary cash in the Treasury there is no reason why we should not permit these people to meet their taxes on the partial-payment plan; but, as I understand, the Secretary of the Treasury has said that the Treasury does need the money.

The Senator, I think, has painted a very gloomy picture. He has compared the tremendous amount of taxes with the cash of the country. I think that the comparison should be made, as suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, with deposits.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, I recognize the fact, of course, that deposits are made in the banks, and that there are more deposits there than there is cash on hand. I understand that thoroughly.

Mr. GRONNA. I know the Senator does.

Mr. POMERENE. And I am not disputing the Senator's position, but I am comparing the amount of this tax with the amount of the cash, in order to show the additional drain upon this cash and the strain upon it. That is all I am seeking to do by the argument.

Mr. GRONNA. I am listening to the Senator with a great deal of interest, and I realize fully that the payment of the tax is going to be a serious drain upon the banks of the country and upon the business people.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this subject is not a new one to me. Out in my State, for instance, we require all taxes—State, municipal, county, township, and school—to be paid in June and December; but up to 15 years ago all of that money was locked up in the county treasury. It could not be placed upon deposit, and for several weeks before the tax-paying period began and for a number of weeks after the tax-paying period had ended the tax money was in the vaults of the county; the public could not have it, and business was being constantly crippled.

Mr. GRONNA. But the point I wish to make, if it does not disturb the Senator, is this: If the Secretary of the Treasury does insist upon the payment of these taxes at one time, it will not seriously disturb the condition of the banks, because, after all, it will only be a transfer of credits.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that may be the Senator's view, and I recognize his experience and have great respect for his opinion, but the fact of the matter is that the bankers of my own State think that it is going very seriously to curtail their ability to meet the situation. It must be borne in mind that I am not concerning myself so much for those men who have the money; it is that class of men who have property and business but do not have the money and perhaps have borrowed up to their limit that concern me, and I do not want to see the business of the country unnecessarily embarrassed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I approve entirely what the Senator has said. The Senator has dealt with this question in a broad, patriotic, and thorough manner, and here is a case where Senators on both sides of the Chamber are agreed that relief ought to be afforded, and yet we can not get it. Cloture would not help us to get it. The Senator has spoken now for about an hour and 40 minutes, and he has not told all he knows, by any manner of means, upon this question, and yet we can not get action.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, my colleagues have been contributing very much to the interest of this subject, and perhaps if I had not permitted interruptions I would have been through and could have told what I knew.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I am sure the Senator could not possibly have gotten through in an hour and said all the wise things he has said.

Mr. POMERENE. I have such profound respect for my distinguished friend from Michigan that I do not care to get into a controversy with him on the subject of cloture.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I hope that when the new rule proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] comes up for consideration the Senator from Ohio will remember the splendid speech he is making and the length of time which he has necessarily consumed and vote against the proposed rule.

Mr. POMERENE. My good friend from Utah can not embarrass me by that question, because whether that cloture hits me or anybody else, I am for it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, my!

Mr. POMERENE. Nothing could be more gratifying to our people than to pass a joint resolution which will permit the payment of a portion of their taxes on June 15, 1918, and give them a little time within which to get the necessary funds for the balance.

In view of present conditions, I believe the plan I proposed of making these payments in monthly installments should be changed. Permit me to suggest that one-half of the taxes be paid on June 15 and the balance in two and three or two and four months from June 15. In this way the money that is first paid will find its way back into the commerce of the country, help to relieve the tightness of the money market, enable the business men to finance their enterprises, and prepare themselves to pay the balance of their taxes and provide for the fourth liberty loan which will come. It will do neither the Government nor the business public any good to have idle money in the Treasury for a period of time when there are constant demands for all of our circulating medium. If by chance the needs of the Government during the next four or five months shall prove greater than we anticipate, they no doubt will be met by issuing other short-time certificates or by making the fourth liberty loan at an earlier date than now contemplated. Although the Government had outstanding these short-time certificates to the amount of $4,513,689,500, it only called for from $3,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 in the third liberty loan, and it divided this loan into four payments. The largest payment to be made at one time was only 40 per cent, or $1,668,700,860. As stated before, this loan to the Government was made by men who either had the money or had prospects of getting it, and the largest amount required to be paid by them in one day was $1,668,700,860. And notwithstanding the care which was taken to distribute these payments upon liberty loans in such a way as at the same time to both serve the Government and interfere as little as possible with the current business of the country, it is proposed under the present law to require all taxpayers of the country to pay $3,000,000,000 in one day, or nearly twice the amount of any one payment upon the liberty loans, whether they have the money or not.

I am not an alarmist. I think I have clearly shown that the business public is very much disturbed because of the insistence of the Treasury Department that this money shall all be paid on one day. They feel that it is not necessary. I believe I have shown that it is not necessary. I think those Members of the Congress who have kept in touch with their constituents back home know that the country wants to pay their taxes in installments, not because they do not have the property out of which the taxes can be collected, but because they are now having serious trouble to finance their business, and they are not able to borrow the necessary funds at their banks. Bankers in many localities have loaned to their clients to the very limit. They are not disturbed because of the quality of the securities offered for new loans, but because under the law they can not extend the amount of their loans, or because they do not have the money in bank to take care of them. Let me give you a concrete case, which is typical:

A contractor of my acquaintance who had to meet a small pay roll of $1,900, who is a man of some property and in good credit, went to every bank in the city where he was putting up a public building, with his note indorsed by several responsible sureties. He was denied the loan because they were not making any new loans in anticipation of the expected drain upon the banks by the payment of these taxes on June 15, at the same time assuring him that under normal conditions they would have been glad to have loaned $100,000 to him with the same sureties.

Within three weeks a prominent citizen of Ohio, who is in a position to be familiar with the financial conditions of the State, told me that several of the largest taxpayers in his section of the State had said that if the Government did not grant an extension of time for the payment of a portion of these taxes they knew they could not get the money to pay them all, and if an attempt was made to distrain their property for the payment of the taxes they would make application to the courts for the appointment of a receiver in order to prevent unnecessary sacrifice of their property and get a little time in which to convert it into cash.

I recognize the fact that I shall be criticized in certain quarters for making these observations, but I have been in touch with this subject for more than six months. I know that the views I have expressed meet the approval of nearly all the responsible chambers of commerce, clearing-house associations, organizations of bankers, merchants, manufacturers, mine operators, as well as most of the business men, firms, and corporations of the country.

Congress will be asked to provide for increased taxation. Business will respond with the same patriotism to these increased taxes and future loans that it has in the past, but let us not add to its burdens unnecessarily. I hope, though the day is late, that Congress and the Treasury Department will see their way clear to grant a reasonable extension for the payment of a portion of these taxes. Any extension will be better than none at all.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9959) increasing rates of pensions of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is quite evident that it will be impossible to secure a vote upon this bill to-night. As I understand, there are one or two other Senators who desire to speak. I therefore send to the desk a request for unanimous consent for a vote upon the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah submits a request for unanimous consent, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, June 4, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 9959, a bill to increase pensions of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the roll is called I desire to say that it is understood that the Senate will recess to-day if this unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. The Senator, in his request for unanimous consent, limits the speeches to 10 minutes upon the bill and 5 minutes upon amendments. Is not the bill now, as it has been reported from the committee, in the nature of an amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it is in the nature of a substitute, which is always treated as a bill.

Mr. GRONNA. On a former occasion that question came up, and I think those of us who anticipated that we would be given 10 minutes were disappointed, and found that we had only 5 minutes.

Mr. SMOOT. We have from 12 o'clock to 2 for general discussion, and that is not limited. After 2 o'clock the discussion upon the bill itself can be either on the House bill or on the Senate bill, and five-minute speeches can be made on amendments.

Mr. GRONNA. I am not criticizing the request at all from a personal standpoint, because I think I consume less time in debate than any other Member of this body, but I think we might just as well have it understood that only 5 minutes will be given to anyone under the unanimous-consent agreement asked for by the Senator from Utah. There is no need of putting in a provision for 10-minute speeches, because no Senator will be given 10 minutes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think under the unanimous-consent agreement the bill itself could be discussed for 10 minutes by any Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. Then why not provide that only five minutes shall be given? I think every Senator here understands that this is a substitute reported by the committee, which is the same as an amendment, and no Senator will be given more than five minutes' time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that my idea is that any Senator who desired to speak on the bill after 2 o'clock could speak upon the bill itself, and refer to either the House provision or the Senate provision; but when it came to a specific amendment to the Senate provision or the House provision, of course he could only speak for 5 minutes. He could talk upon the bill, however, for 10 minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Utah that when a Senator does not exercise his privilege of discussing the bill, and the consideration of amendments begins, he gets no opportunity whatever of discussing the bill except upon an amendment, and that discussion is limited to 5 minutes. That is the difficulty we have encountered several times. It seems to me that in order to obviate that objection the Senator might provide for 10-minute speeches on amendments, and then it would be satisfactory all around, I think.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to modify the proposal so as to provide for speeches of 10 minutes upon the bill and 10 minutes upon amendments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think there are only two amendments that will be offered, so far as I am advised. Those two amendments are provisions that were a part of the House bill, and they will be offered to perfect the Senate substitute.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Probably the complication will not arise, but a number of complications have arisen in the past by reason of having the distinction between 10-minute and 5-minute speeches. As soon as amendments are offered and the consideration of one has begun, it seems that the Chair has ruled that you can not go back and discuss the bill at large. I think that difficulty would be obviated by the proposition I have made.

Mr. SMOOT. I will modify the proposed agreement, then, by making the time allowed on amendments 10 minutes instead of 5.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to hear the proposed agreement read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, June 4, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 9959, a bill to increase pensions of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I note that after 4 o'clock there is to be no debate on the bill or on any amendment. If this were any other bill than a pension bill I would not consent to a proposal of that kind, but while I have an amendment that I hope to have an opportunity of offering to this bill, I think I shall not object to the proposal in this case. As I have said before, however, upon legislative matters of a general character I will not consent to fixing a definite time to vote after which amendments that are proposed must be voted upon without any discussion whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	Martin	Shields
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Simmons
Cummins	Kellogg	Nugent	Smith, Mich.
Curtis	Kenyon	Owen	Smoot
France	King	Page	Sutherland
Gronna	Lenroot	Penrose	Swanson
Gulon	Lewis	Pomerene	Vardaman
Harding	McCumber	Saulsbury	Warren
Hardwick	McKellar	Shafroth	Wolcott
Henderson	McNary	Sheppard

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber on public business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] is detained on official business.

Mr. MCNARY. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. KIRBY, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. UNDERWOOD answered to their names when called.

Mr. HALE, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] offers a proposed unanimous-consent agreement, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary again read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KING. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 3799. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 12280. An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 230).

Mr. RANSDELL. I submit the conference report on House bill 10069, known as the river and harbor appropriation bill, which I ask to lie on the table and be printed. I ask also that the report be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, and 11, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the language in the proposed amendment; also strike out the period at the end of line 20, page 18, insert in lieu thereof a colon, and add the following words: "Provided, That in estimating the cost of doing the work by Government plant, including the cost of labor and materials, there shall also be taken into account proper charges for depreciation of plant and all supervising and overhead expenses and interest on the capital invested in the Government plant, but the rate of interest shall not exceed the maximum prevailing rate being paid by the United States on current issues of bonds or other evidences of indebtedness"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War shall cause an investigation to be made regarding the discharge or deposit into any of the navigable waterways of the United States of free acid or acid waste in any form, or any other deleterious substances, and the extent to which the same exists and the sources thereof, together with any injurious results therefrom affecting the navigability of such waters or any works of improvement made thereon by the United States or any other uses of said navigable waters, and submit a report to Congress which shall include a summary of the evidence obtained and any recommendations regarding same which may be deemed appropriate, and any necessary expenses connected therewith shall be paid out of the available funds herein or hereafter appropriated for examinations, surveys, and contingencies. If in the course of such investigation it should be considered desirable to obtain any existing data or expert evidence or service from any of the other departments of the Government, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to make application therefor, and such departments are hereby directed to furnish such data or evidence or service as may be so required and which may be considered pertinent or appropriate."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment strike out the word "be," at the beginning of the twentieth line, and insert in lieu thereof the word "being"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2.

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
JOS. E. RANSDELL,
KNUTE NELSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JNO. H. SMALL,
CHAS. F. BOOHER,
C. A. KENNEDY,
Managers on the part of the House.

RECESS.

Mr. KING. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 4, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 3, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, help us to concentrate all our energy and strength, physically, mentally, morally, upon the prosecution of the damnable war which has been forced upon us with a faith that makes for patience, a hope that makes for confidence, a patriotism that makes for sacrifice, a courage that makes for endurance, that we may do and dare, fight and pray.

For right is right, since God is God;
And right the day must win;
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin.

In the name of right we pray. In the name of humanity we pray. In the name of Christ we pray. In the name of God we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, May 31, 1918, was read and approved.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES LIABLE TO MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. MADDEN and Mr. KING rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] rise?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of privileged resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk. There are a number of them, perfected in accordance with the understanding of a day or two ago.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first one.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 372.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Navy Department between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been made and allowed by such department, the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department, and the length of time he has been in such service.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MADDEN. We had those things up on Friday, and it was understood——

Mr. RAYBURN. It seems to me from the reading of the resolution that the gentleman is asking for something the department can not give. He asks for the number of exemptions asked and the number allowed by that department. That department or any other department has no right to allow exemptions.

Mr. MADDEN. They asked somebody else to allow them.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be again reported.

Mr. MADDEN. This resolution has been reported in accordance with the understanding of the House on Friday.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the resolution.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. MADDEN. That is, "asked by the department and allowed."

Mr. RAYBURN. It says "asked and allowed" by the department. The department has no power whatever to allow an exemption.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have it corrected.
The SPEAKER. How does the gentleman wish it corrected?
Mr. MADDEN. To have it read "asked by the department and allowed." Have each one of them read in that way.
Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker——
The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?
Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes.
Mr. DOWELL. Is there any deferred classification?
Mr. MADDEN. This asks for deferred classification.
Mr. DOWELL. Asks for deferred classification also?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes.
Mr. DOWELL. I did not understand that.
The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.
Mr. STAFFORD. May we have it reported as it would read as amended?
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it again. This makes the third time.
Mr. STAFFORD. It has not been reported as amended by the gentleman from Illinois.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution as proposed to be amended.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Navy Department between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed, the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department and the length of time he has been in such service.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.
Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——
The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?
Mr. WALSH. That does not convey the impression the gentleman seeks by his amendment.
Mr. MADDEN. It says "asked by the department and allowed." I suggested it be changed.
Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Speaker, asked to strike out the words "by such department," as I understand it.
Mr. MADDEN. Everybody here asked to have it changed Friday, and it was changed to meet everybody's views.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2374. An act to relieve the estate of Thomas H. Hall, deceased, late postmaster at Panacea, Fla., and the bondsmen of said Thomas H. Hall of the payment of money alleged to have been misappropriated by a clerk in said office.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 9864) to amend section 111 of the Judicial Code, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 10852) to provide for the appointment of a commission to standardize screw threads, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives, and had appointed Mr. KENYON, Mr. HARDING, and Mr. SHIELDS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That Mr. NUGENT be appointed an additional conferee on the part of the Senate on the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

On May 31, 1918:

S. J. Res. 152. Joint resolution to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia.

On June 1, 1918:

H. R. 8764. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2374. An act to relieve the estate of Thomas H. Hall, deceased, late postmaster at Panacea, Fla., and the bondsmen of said Thomas H. Hall, of the payment of money alleged to have been misappropriated by a clerk in said office; to the Committee on Claims.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker——
The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?
Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of agricultural or farm-risk insurance.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of agricultural and farm-risk insurance. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES LIABLE TO MILITARY SERVICE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report this resolution as modified:
The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 372.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Navy Department between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed, the name and home address of each such person and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department and the length of time he has been in such service.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.
Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: After the word "years" insert "July 1, 1917."
Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no. Well, all right. The gentleman can offer it.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
Mr. RAKER. After the word "years" insert the words "July 1, 1917."
Mr. MADDEN. Between 21 and 31 on July 1?
Mr. RAKER. Yes.
Mr. MADDEN. I accept the amendment.
The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.
There was no objection.
The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.
The resolution as amended was agreed to.
Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the other resolutions in the hands of the Clerk be amended in accordance with the amendment of this one.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the other 10 resolutions be amended in the same way that that one was.
Mr. FOSTER. They are going to be read?
The SPEAKER. Yes. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?
There was no objection.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one with that language in.
The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 377.

Resolved, That the Attorney General be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Department of Justice between the ages of 21 and 31 years July 1, 1917, for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed, the name and home address of each such person and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department and the length of time he has been in such service.

Mr. WALSH rose.
The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?
Mr. WALSH. I want to direct the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that I think that the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] nullifies the effect of the resolution. It simply calls for the names of those who were in the service of the department on July 1, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31.
Mr. MADDEN. That is not what we want.
Mr. WALSH. If you will read the resolution, you will find that that is what you will get.
Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the amendment is to get those who are in the service 21 years of age.

Mr. WALSH. Putting the language in where he does, he confines the information to the number of men who were of that age in the service July 1, 1917.

Mr. RAKER. I think not.

Mr. MADDEN. We do not want to do that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Department of Justice between the ages of 21 and 31 years July 1, 1917, for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed, the name and home address of each such person and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department and the length of time he has been in such service.

Mr. MADDEN. I am afraid that that does exactly what the gentleman from Massachusetts says it does, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I move to strike it out of the other resolution now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves——

Mr. MADDEN. I move to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to reconsider the action of the House in passing the resolution about the Navy Department. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to strike the amendment out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. DOWELL. No; Mr. Speaker, that is not in order.

Mr. MADDEN. It is in order. We are reconsidering it.

Mr. DOWELL. The proper way is to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER. That is what we have done.

Mr. DOWELL. He is making a motion to strike out.

The SPEAKER. He is making the motion to strike out now.

Mr. DOWELL. The proper motion is to reconsider the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the motion to reconsider has already passed.

Mr. DOWELL. I understand; but the motion should be to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was adopted, and not by striking it out. We have reconsidered the vote, but we ought now to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was adopted and refuse to adopt the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the question reverts on the motion of the gentleman from California without any motion to reconsider or anything else. We have reconsidered the vote whereby we passed the resolution, and now the question reverts to the motion of the gentleman from California.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New Jersey rise?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. My proposition is that if you put in the words "who were between the ages of 21 and 31" on that day you will have no trouble about the resolution. I move to insert "who were."

Mr. DOWELL. There was a motion made to reconsider the vote which adopted the resolution. That was carried.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Now, when we had the resolution here the amendment of the gentleman from California was adopted. That now stands as adopted by the House. The question now should be to reconsider the vote whereby that amendment was adopted. Then we have brought it back to the question of voting on the amendment, but until the vote by which the amendment was adopted is reconsidered you can not consider any other question with reference to that amendment. The vote should now be to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment to the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment of the gentleman from California was adopted. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. RAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. To get unanimous consent to speak for a minute or two minutes before the next resolution is taken up.

Mr. MADDEN. We have a lot of them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois controls the time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DOWELL. The question now recurs on the adoption of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that just as well as the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman was moving the adoption of the resolution when I raised the question.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman allow me a minute?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, we shall not get anywhere with this matter if you do that.

Mr. RAKER. There is a resolution here to try to get information. But you will not get the names of all of these men who are over 30 years of age under this resolution. Since the date the law went into effect there have been hundreds who have passed the age of 30 years, and you ought to get all of those who are in that service that are over 30 years of age. That is what we want in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. DOWELL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Would it not cover this case to provide for the names of those within the draft age, as provided by law?

Mr. MADDEN. A point of order was made and sustained against that language on Friday last.

Mr. DOWELL. It would seem to me that by unanimous consent that ought to be inserted.

Mr. WALSH. The draft age is specified here by giving the ages.

Mr. DOWELL. There could be no question about it if the resolution said "of draft age," and that would include those that have gone beyond 31 years of age.

Mr. MADDEN. The use of that language on last Friday was objected to on a point of order, and the point of order was sustained.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NEGRO SOLDIERS.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a booklet entitled "A Tribute for the Negro Soldier," by John E. Bruce, a distinguished author and the American representative of the African Times and Oriental Review, London, England.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an article on the colored soldier. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES LIABLE TO MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, there is another resolution, which I call up.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 371.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Department of War between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been made and allowed by such department; the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department, and the length of time he has been in such service.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know that it is important, but I venture to direct the gentleman's attention to the amendment offered by our friend from California [Mr. RAKER], and suggest that such an amendment, not in the language offered, but somewhat modified, ought to be adopted, so as to include those who on June 5, the day of registration, are of that age, and I suggest that for this reason: There might be someone in the service who would not come within the terms of the resolution as the gentleman now provides. I do not like to take up the time of the House, but I can see where this situation might arise. When the Secretary of War sends down that information, if he sends it literally, according to the terms of the resolution, he would probably exclude from it——

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have not the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee believe that a Cabinet officer would interpret this language according to its intent, to ascertain the number of men subject to draft who have been excused on account of service in the Government. If I thought that a member of the Cabinet would construe it any other way, I would certainly insist that it be drawn with more accuracy, but I can not conceive that a member of the Cabinet would undertake to excuse himself from not sending the information that evidently this resolution is intended to bring forth.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Here is the point, let me say in answer to the gentleman from Texas. We know what we have in our minds, but if we do not say what we have in our minds in the resolution as we pass it, how is the Secretary of War to construe the resolution other than by its terms? So far as its terms are concerned, it says those who are in the service who are between the ages of 21 and 31 years at this time, and it does not say between the ages of 21 and 31 on the 5th of June last. That is the way I would put it, in order to avoid any possibility of misunderstanding between the department and the Congress, and in order to avoid any criticism that might arise in the future. I venture to bring that to the attention of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I suggest to the gentleman that he offer such an amendment, and I would yield for that purpose.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I suggest an amendment to insert the words "on the 5th of June, 1917, or who became 21 years of age thereafter," and that would include all of them.

Mr. RAKER. I want to make this suggestion to the gentleman, that if, after the word "war" you would insert the words "who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31," it would answer the purpose.

Mr. DOWELL. And who became 21 years of age.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am not yielding the floor for this purpose.

Mr. RAKER. I know what the gentleman wants to get at, and that is all of the men who are liable to service, but you leave out of the resolution all of the men who went into the service between June 5 and the present date, and there will be no record of that, and we ought to have a record of all of those men.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he temporarily withdraw his resolution until he can get time to put it in shape.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee to offer an amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee: After the word "war," insert the words "who were on June 5, 1917," so that the resolution will read:

"House resolution 371.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Department of War who were, on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years, for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed; the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department, and the length of time he has been in such service."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I accept that amendment. It is perfectly agreeable to me and is exactly what I want to reach.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the amendment and the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to insert those words in each of the other resolutions, including the one that has been passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert the words of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] in all of these resolutions that are to be offered and also in those that have already been passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 383.

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of that board who were, on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years, for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such board and allowed: the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department and the length of time he has been in such service.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 377.

Resolved, That the Attorney General be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Department of Justice who were, on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years, for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed; the name and home address of each such person and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department and the length of time he has been in such service.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes when these resolutions have been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes when these resolutions are disposed of. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. I ask unanimous consent, following the gentleman from Michigan——

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, let us get through with these resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but the gentleman from Missouri has a right to submit a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. GARNER. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] is asking unanimous consent.

Mr. MEEKER. I ask unanimous consent that following the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] I be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes on the result of the correspondence with the several nations of the world as to the status of alien soldiers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for 10 minutes following the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to talk about alien soldiers. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 378.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Department of Labor who were, on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years, for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed, the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department and the length of time he has been in such service.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 379.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Department of Agriculture who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years, for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed, the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department, and the length of time he has been in such service.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 380.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Department of Commerce who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed, the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department, and the length of time he has been in such service.

Mr. McKENZIE. I should like to ask my colleague one question. If I understand the reading of these resolutions, this will only give us a line on the men who have been excused and who are now employed in the particular departments to which this inquiry is directed.

Mr. MADDEN. And in all the bureaus of each department.

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, if my colleague will permit one other question, will these resolutions reach a case where the head of a department has asked that the man be deferred on account of the necessity of having his services in the department, and after that has been done the man has been given a commission in either the Army or the Navy?

Mr. MADDEN. Then, if it does not do that, we will try and reach it.

Mr. McKENZIE. It ought to be reached.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 381.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Treasury Department who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military service or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed, the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department, and the length of time he has been in such service.

The resolution was agreed to.

House resolution 382.

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Interstate Commerce Commission who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such commission and allowed, the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the commission, and the length of time he has been in such service.

The resolution was agreed to.

House resolution 376.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Department of the Interior who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed, the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department, and the length of time he has been in such service.

The resolution was agreed to.

House resolution 375.

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Post Office Department who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed, the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department and the length of time he has been in such service.

The resolution was agreed to.

House resolution 374.

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of that commission who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years, for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such commission and allowed, the name and home address of each such person, and the character of work he is performing in the service of the commission, and the length of time he has been in such service.

The resolution was agreed to.

House resolution 373.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Department of State who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such department and allowed, the name and home address of each such person and the character of work he is performing in the service of the department and the length of time he has been in such service.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WELTY, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for two weeks, on account of official business.

THE RED CROSS AND THE Y. M. C. A.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have a letter here which I am going to ask the Clerk to read, received by me on Saturday last from a young man, a lieutenant in the Engineer Corps, now in France. It is so interesting and complimentary to the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. that I thought the House would like to hear it.

The Clerk read as follows:

WITH THE COLORS,
France, May 4, 1918.

Hon. J. W. FORDNEY,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Your most welcome letter came to me to-day, and I sure was glad to hear from you. Letters are letters in this country, and to get news from home certainly makes one feel fine.

I can not say much about what we are doing, but will tell you that we are doing some interesting work and are very busy all the time; and when I return to the States I will be able to tell you some interesting things that will interest you, too.

I am having a great time getting my tongue twisted into shape, but an Irishman was not made in a day, and you can not change him in a day, either.

I have seen some of the finest roads that are in existence anywhere; really they surpass most country roads in the States by 100 per cent; fine grades and permanent construction everywhere, but I guess that labor has been plentiful and cheap, so they could well afford it. Drainage is the solution of all road construction, either railroad or highway, and they have well taken care of that. The railroads are rock ballasted because they have nothing else, but we have it over them on transportation and equipment, surpassing in every detail.

The country is not as level as it might be, and all the time that I spent studying about these great plateaus is thrown away, because the ground is like some of the ranches in the Palouse country in eastern Washington, where a rancher buys a ranch, stands it on edge, and farms both sides.

They talk in the States about this country being very immoral, but it is a mistake, because I believe they are better as a whole than the States along that line. They seem to be a clean, industrious people as far as they are personally concerned, but they have some peculiar ideas about taking care of their stock, that they all enter the same door and sleep under the same roof.

They can say what they want to about the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A., but I will say that they are the "daddies" to us all over here, and a person that dares say a word against them should be shot at sunrise, and if cloudy should be shot in bed.

I am getting along dandy, feel fine, and am doing my bit every day and late at night, and any time that you can spare a moment to drop a line to an appreciative friend, then that's me; because I will be back some day, and I will go back in the old field again, and I do not want to forget or be forgotten in the lumber field at home.

Kindest regards to Mrs. Egerer and to your good family, and allow me to remain,

A sincere friend, DAN MCGILLICUDDY.

Mr. FORDNEY. The boy goes further and gives a description of the forests and tells the kind of timber and flowers, and says it is a very beautiful country, quite like Paradise Valley in the Cascade Mountains. Paradise Valley is a valley at the foot of the great Rainier Mountain, in the State of Washington, with most magnificent scenery. I thought it would be of interest especially to those who have an interest in the Young Men's Christian Association and the Red Cross, because he states that they are doing such good work.

THE PROPOSED NEW REVENUE BILL.

Mr. FORDNEY. Gentlemen, the object of my few remarks this morning is in reference to the proposed new revenue bill. It is one of great importance to the people of the country, and I feel it timely for me to make a few remarks in reference to that bill, which it is proposed will raise $3,000,000,000 in addition to existing laws.

I have and will continue, as every loyal citizen will, to vote for the necessary money for the Government to carry on this great war. I do not agree with some of my colleagues as to the proportion of our expenditures that we must raise by taxes. It has been repeatedly stated by the administration and by the Secretary of the Treasury, to me only a few days ago, that we are not raising by taxes in proportion to our expenditures the amount of money raised by Great Britain. In that the Secretary is in error. I am in receipt of a letter addressed to me by our American ambassador at London, England, dated April 25, which I have here in my possession. He gives the amount of money spent in Great Britain since the beginning of that war. He gives the amount raised by direct taxation, and gives it in great detail, and the amount of borrowed money. In order to be brief, let me say that up to the end of this fiscal year, March 31, 1918, that date being the end of Great Britain's fiscal year, Great Britain since the beginning of the war has raised £6,454,034,000, or $31,408,585,660. Of that sum there has been raised in Great Britain by taxes $7,871,000,000, or 25.06 per cent. That is, in round numbers 25 per cent of all expenditures in Great Britain from the beginning of the war until March 31, 1918, has been by taxation.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Does that include the money loaned to the allies?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not certain.

Mr. GARNER. I think that is the entire expenditure and includes the money loaned to the allies.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, if it is true, so much the better for my side of the argument. Twenty-five per cent is all the money they are raising in Great Britain by taxes for their expenditures in this war. I have also obtained from our American consul at Ottawa, Canada, the amount of money that Canada is raising by taxes in proportion to her expenditures in this great war, and Canada has raised 18½ per cent by taxes. France has raised 11 per cent by taxes and borrowed 89 per cent. Italy has raised 9 per cent and borrowed 91 per cent.

Now, taking it for granted that our expenditures this year are far above the estimates made last year, which was $12,067,000,000, the amount of money raised under existing revenue laws is going to exceed $4,000,000,000, far exceeding the per cent raised by Great Britain in proportion to our expenditures. It is conceded by the Treasury Department that we will raise $4,000,000,000, but I believe I am within bounds of correctness when I say that we will raise this year under existing laws in round numbers four and a half billion dollars from taxes. The Secretary of the Treasury stated to me one week ago that he expected our expenditures this year, including our loans to the allies, would reach $24,000,000,000; in round numbers that we would loan to our allies $6,000,000,000. My good friend, Mr. KITCHIN, stated to me since that time that he understands that our loans will reach $8,000,000,000 of this $24,000,000,000 of our expenditures and our loans to our allies. I do not believe it is claimed by anybody that we should tax the people now for the money that we are loaning to the allies. We are selling bonds on which we are obtaining money to loan to the allies, and we expect our allies to pay the interest and the principal of those bonds when they come due, because their obligations to the Government of the United States fall due when our bonds come due on which we are borrowing this money. Therefore, my friends, I believe that the money we exact from the people at this time should be the proportion necessary for our own expenses of this war, not including our loans to the allies. I believe the President in his speech the other day, although I was not present, but I read it in the paper, fixed the total sum of our expenditures, including our loans, for the fiscal year of 1918–19, the next fiscal year, at $20,000,000,000, $4,000,000,000 below the sum stated to me by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit, the President did not submit figures in his statement.

Mr. FORDNEY. I saw that in the papers, and if it is not correct of course I stand corrected.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. PADGETT. I simply want to make a statement that perhaps the Members would be interested in as rumors are going around. I have just talked with the Secretary of the Navy, and he said that to-day some German submarines appeared off the Jersey coast about 40 miles southeast of Barnegat and had sunk three schooners. We have not heard of others. He said they had gotten information that they had sunk three schooners about 40 miles southeast of Barnegat Light.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The latest Associated Press report said that 14 vessels in all had been sunk, including one rather large vessel but quite a number of small vessels.

Mr. PADGETT. The Secretary stated the only definite information they had was that they had sunk three.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank the gentleman; that is very interesting and startling information that makes the situation far more serious than up to date. Now, Great Britain's expenditures for the coming fiscal year, which this letter states had been sanctioned and agreed upon on the night before this letter was written, are a great increase over the three or four previous years. The amount of money to be raised by taxes this coming fiscal year, beginning the 1st of April in Great Britain, is $4,097,000,000, a total budget of $14,467,000,000 for the coming fiscal year. The amount of money to be raised by direct taxes of that total expenditure for this next fiscal year is 28.33 per cent. Now, my friends, it is claimed by the Secretary of the Treasury that we should raise at least 40 per cent of our expenditures this year, not including our loans to the allies.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. If I can get a moment or so longer I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like the attention of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. The gentleman from Michigan has just stated that the Secretary of the Treasury has requested the raising of 40 per cent of our expenses by taxation, including loans to the allies——

Mr. FORDNEY. Not including loans to the allies.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Excluding loans to the allies.

Mr. FORDNEY. Exclusive of our loans to the allies.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That would bring the total amount of the proportion of taxes down to about 25 per cent, would it not?

Mr. FORDNEY. If we are expected by this new revenue measure which is contemplated to raise $3,000,000,000 in addition to the amount to be raised under existing law we will raise some $7,500,000,000 next year by taxes. Now, if that is but 40 per cent of our expenditures during the next year, then our expenditures, not including our loans to the allies, will be from $18,000,000,000 to $20,000,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not according to the understanding that we had in the committee. I want to say, because I think this is an important matter, my understanding was that there was estimated about $24,000,000,000, and that included about $8,000,000,000 of loans to the allies.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it included $6,000,000,000, and I stated in my opinion it would be at least $8,000,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood that $8,000,000,000 was the amount estimated—$6,000,000,000 already loaned and two more to come.

Mr. GARNER. It never has been more than $500,000,000 a month.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then the total amount, exclusive of the loans to the allies, was $18,000,000,000?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am going to ask for two or three minutes more, and I will yield now.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has read, or he himself has stated, that our ambassador in England put the amount which England has raised by taxation to meet her war expenditures 25 per cent, approximately, of the total.

Mr. FORDNEY. Up to the end of this fiscal year, and 28 per cent for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is what I wanted to ask specifically. You made that 25 per cent. Does that mean the aggregate from the time the war began up to this time?

Mr. FORDNEY. The twenty-five per cent, my friend, that I mentioned includes the fiscal years of 1915–16, 1916–17, and 1917–18.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes longer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Following that question, the gentleman says that includes the end of the fiscal year 1917–18. Now, has England levied any higher taxes for the fiscal year which is to end in 1918–1919?

Mr. FORDNEY. England for the fiscal year 1918–19 has added increases all along the line—and if I had time I would read the amounts—additional taxes from the various kinds of revenue she is raising, and there are many of them.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman answer one more question? What tax now does England levy on excess profits and also on war profits?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know the exact percentage that she is taxing upon war profits and excess profits; but the amount is given here as excess taxes, $2,588,978,000, not in detail; neither is the percentage of her total tax given. I have not the latest addition to the laws of Great Britain that give the amount of excess-profit taxes which they are levying by percentages, but I do not believe that is in the possession of our State Department, because I made inquiry for it and could not obtain it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The excess profits, and especially war profits, in this country, were the profits to which President Wilson specifically attracted attention the other day in his message.

Mr. REAVIS. Under the present revenue law in England, do they not raise 25 per cent of the cost of the war?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; 28 per cent for the next fiscal year; 25 per cent up to the end of this fiscal year is the average amount of taxes raised by Great Britain.

Mr. REAVIS. For the next fiscal year the gentleman states it will be 28 per cent?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] I do not understand what distinction he makes between war profits and excess profits. England has no such taxes as we have. The only tax is war-profit tax, the difference between the profits before and during the war.

Mr. FORDNEY. Under the existing law England permits all her industries to make 10 per cent on the capital invested before imposing these taxes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is a marked distinction between excess profits and war profits. A man in business may be making profits now very largely in excess of his antewar profits, and yet those may not come from anything in the way of manufacturing munitions and, therefore, are not war profits.

Mr. FORDNEY. It will be hard, my friend, for you and me to determine what is a war profit right now from the industries in this country. A farmer may be making large sums of money out of the products of his farm, we may say. Is it war profit or is it not? Take any industry, every industry, and what is the difference between an ordinary increase in profit and war profit? Now, let me go just a little further.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. KITCHIN. How much are the estimated expenditures of Great Britain for what we call her fiscal year, now?

Mr. FORDNEY. They are $14,462,000,000 for the fiscal year of 1918–19, which has just begun, April 1. England's fiscal year ends March 31.

Now, gentlemen, I believe it is a common rule and a common practice of every country in the world during the time of war that some of the money raised to carry on a great war has been raised from increased import duties. I want to call your attention to our situation here.

The Wilson bill, about which the Republicans of this country made so much fuss during the 1896 campaign, carried an average ad valorem rate of 21½ per cent on imports. Of course, the matter of imposing a tax under that law as compared with the tax imposed upon imports in the Dingley law and in the Payne law were entirely different. Some articles were placed upon the free list that were later changed back to the protective list. But mark what I say: Twenty-one and one-half per cent was the ad valorem rate under the Wilson law. Twenty-five and one-half per cent was the ad valorem rate under the Dingley law. Eighteen and one-half per cent was the ad valorem rate under the Payne law.

Although the demagogues of the country said there were no reductions in the Payne tariff law, it was 3 per cent below the rates in the Wilson bill, about which the Republicans made so much fuss. But under existing law last year our ad valorem rates were 6 per cent, gentlemen—getting mighty closs to free trade. The last year of the Payne tariff law yielded to our Treasury $333,000,000 in revenue on imports of $1,812,000,000. Taking an average of the first nine months of this fiscal year and for the months of April, May, and June this year, which would complete this fiscal year, the average rate is 6.06 per cent under the Underwood tariff law, which will yield for the 12 months $168,000,000 on imports in round numbers in values of $2,800,000,000. Or $165,000,000 less will be collected on imports this year under the Underwood tariff law than was collected under the Payne tariff law, with an increase of $1,000,000,000 of imports this year.

I say to you the time has come, if we must raise more revenue to help carry on this war, when we should raise a greater portion of it from our import taxes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman will recall when the last bill was made up the House carried a provision for an ad valorem increase, which was struck out in the Senate.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Under the present conditions, with an embargo where you would have to have a license to import and export, does not the gentleman think it would be far-fetched to talk about levying any kind of duty at the customhouse?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not, because it is the easiest tax in the world for the people to pay, because when they pay it they do not know it. There is where the Republicans have the advantage over you Democrats in imposing taxes upon the people. [Laughter.] Under existing law, if we had the Payne rates of duty in effect to-day, our imports would yield $518,000,000 of revenue instead of $168,000,000.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I thought the attitude of the gentleman always had been that the consumers do not pay the tax. The gentleman's attitude now is that they pay it, but do not know it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I say that the consumer does pay it when the taxes are internal, and I will call your attention to why.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, the difference between an internal tax and an import tax is this: Suppose you and I are engaged in the same line of business in this country, anything that we may be producing, no matter what it is. We add to our cost of production our taxes and insurance and all overhead expenses. Your tax is the same as mine on the internal tax, or war-profits tax, or the consumption tax, or any other kind of internal tax that is imposed upon the article that you and I are producing. We must add it to our cost, and your cost is the same as mine, and consequently we both add it to the cost, and the consumer must and does pay that added cost. There is no argument against that. Now, then, suppose you are engaged in producing an article abroad similar to an article that I am producing here in the United States, and your raw material and labor cost is below my cost. My good friend, we must impose an import tax on your product; otherwise you will undersell me and put me out of business; and the minute you put me out of business, up goes the price, and you control the market; and under such circumstances the consumer then pays the tax, and none other. There is no comparison between an import tax and an internal-revenue tax. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I wish here to insert the letter and statistics received from our foreign embassy:

LONDON, April 25, 1918.

DEAR SIR: I am directed by the ambassador to acknowledge your letter of the 6th of April, asking him if he can advise you what portion of the cost of the war in England is raised by direct taxation and what portion is obtained from loans.

I find upon examination that in 1913–14 the revenue of the United Kingdom for the financial year was £198,243,000 and the expenditure £197,492,700. This will give you a rough idea of prewar revenue and expenditure.

For the financial year 1915–16 the revenue was £336,767,000; expenditure, £1,559,706,000; 1916–17 the revenue was £573,428,000; expenditure, £2,198,113,000; 1917–18 the revenue was £707,235,000; expenditure, £2,696,221,000.

The estimated revenue for 1918–19 is £842,050,000, of which £782,200,000 is to be obtained from taxes, and the estimated expenditure, £2,972,197,000; deficit, £2,130,147,000, as will be seen from the attached extract, to be obtained from loans.

I am, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BOYLSTON BEAL,
Special Attaché of Embassy.

The Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit for printing under the rule the conference report on the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The conference report will be printed under the rule.

Following are the conference report and accompanying statement:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 615).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, and 11, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the language in the proposed amendment; also strike out the period at the end of line 20, page 18, insert in lieu thereof a colon, and add the following words: "Provided, That in estimating the cost of doing the work by Government plant, including the cost of labor and materials, there shall also be taken into account proper charges for depreciation of plant and all supervising and overhead expenses and interest on the capital invested in the Government plant, but the rate of interest shall not exceed the maximum prevailing rate being paid by the United States on current issues of bonds or other evidences of indebtedness"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War shall cause an investigation to be made regarding the discharge or deposit into any of the navigable waterways of the United States of free acid or acid waste in any form or any other deleterious substances, and the extent to which the same exists and the sources thereof, together with any injurious results therefrom affecting the navigability of such waters or any works of improvement made thereon by the United States or any other uses of said navigable waters, and submit a report to Congress which shall include a summary of the evidence obtained and any recommendations regarding same which may be deemed appropriate, and any necessary expenses connected therewith shall be paid out of the available funds herein or hereafter appropriated for examinations, surveys, and contingencies. If in the course of such investigation it should be considered desirable to obtain any existing data or expert evidence or service from any of the other departments of the Government, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to make application therefor, and such departments are hereby directed to furnish such data or evidence or service as may be so required and which may be considered pertinent or appropriate."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment strike out the word "be" at the beginning of the twentieth line, and insert in lieu thereof the word "being"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed upon:

The rivers and harbors bill as it passed the House carried cash appropriations in the sum of $21,427,900 and one continuing contract authorization in the sum of $82,700. The amount added by amendment in the Senate was $2,344,000 in cash appropriations, making the total of the bill as it passed the Senate $23,771,900 in cash appropriations and a continuing contract authorization for $82,700. As a result of the conference the amount involved in the Senate amendments has not been changed. One amendment, however (No. 1), involving an increase of $140,000, has not as yet been agreed to.

The following statement shows the action taken by the conference on each of the Senate amendments:

ACTION OF CONFERENCE.

On amendments Nos. 1 and 2, page 8: Mobile Harbor and Bar, Ala. Items increase amount appropriated in House bill for improvement work from $200,000 to $340,000. The committee of conference have been unable to agree.

On amendment No. 3, page 13: Fox River, Wis. Item eliminates language in House bill appropriating $22,500 for maintenance and improvement work, and provides that the funds shall be applied to maintenance work only. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 4, page 14: Los Angeles Harbor, Cal. Item adopts new project for the construction of a channel through the west basin into the southwestwardly arm to the site of a proposed large floating dry dock and appropriates the full estimated cost of said channel. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 5, page 18: Section 4, providing that no contracts for river and harbor work shall be entered into hereafter if the contract price is more than 25 per cent in excess of the estimated cost of doing the work by Government plant. Item provides that overhead expenses, depreciation, and interest on capital invested, properly chargeable to such work, shall be taken into consideration in estimating the cost of executing the work by Government plant. House conferees recede with an amendment changing the phraseology, and specifically setting forth that the rate of interest charged on the cost of Government plant shall not exceed the maximum prevailing rate being paid by the United States on current issues of bonds or other evidences of indebtedness.

On amendment No. 6, page 18: Pollution of navigable waters of the United States. Item adds new section making it unlawful to discharge or deposit from any source whatever any free acid or acid waste in any form into any navigable water of the United States or into any tributary of any navigable water above tidewater, and provides penalties to be applied on conviction for violation of the provisions of this section. House conferees recede with an amendment striking out the proposed language and inserting in lieu thereof a section providing for an investigation by the War Department regarding the discharge or deposit into navigable streams of free acid, acid waste, or other deleterious matter, and to report to Congress the extent to which the same exists and the sources thereof together with any injurious results therefrom affecting the navigability of such waters or any works of improvement made thereon by the United States or any other uses of said navigable waters, such report to contain recommendations regarding same which may be deemed appropriate.

On amendments Nos. 7, 8, and 9, pages 19, 20, and 21: Items renumbering sections of House bill. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 10, page 22: Modification and readjustment of terms of uncompleted contracts for work of river and harbor improvement. Item adds new section providing that if the Secretary of War shall determine that contracts for work of river and harbor improvement entered into prior to April 6, 1917, and uncompleted, have become inequitable and unjust on account of inceased costs of material and labor and other unforeseen conditions arising out of the war, he is authorized to modify and readjust the terms of said contracts in a just and equitable manner, such modifications and readjustments to apply only to work under said contracts remaining to be done hereafter, and any such sum as may be necessary to provide for the increased cost of the contracts due to said modifications and readjustments, not exceeding the sum of $2,000,000, is appropriated by the new section. It is also provided that as a condition of any such contract being so modified that the Secretary of War shall have the right, at the end of any fiscal year, until the contract is completed, to make such further modifications as in his judgment shall be advantageous to the United States and just to the contractor. House conferees recede with verbal amendment, substituting the word "being" for the word "be," in line 10, page 23.

On amendment No. 11, page 23: Item adopts the following section:

"SEC. 10. That hereafter when the expenses of persons engaged in field work or traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated posts of duty are chargeable to appropriations of the Engineer Department, a per diem of not exceeding $4 may be allowed in lieu of subsistence when not otherwise fixed by law."

House conferees recede.

JNO. H. SMALL,
CHAS. F. BOOHER,
C. A. KENNEDY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if this is a complete agreement?

Mr. SMALL. It is complete except as to one Senate amendment, for Mobile Harbor.

Mr. WALSH. And the gentleman expects to ask the House to insist upon its disagreement to that?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; I expect to ask the House to insist upon its disagreement upon that Senate amendment.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes next after the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HOLLAND].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has no privilege to proceed as yet.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I understood that the gentleman from Virginia would be recognized after the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize him to make a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House after the gentleman from Missouri concludes, for not exceeding 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding 10 minutes after the gentleman from Missouri concludes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes following the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes following the gentleman from Virginia. Is there objection to that request?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

STATUS OF ALIEN SOLDIERS IN THE ARMIES OF THE WORLD.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I wish to assure the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that I will not put any applause in the extended remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, about a year ago, after we had entered the war, we discovered that some 40,000 or 50,000 American citizens had entered the armies of England, France, and Canada. We learned at that time that the men who had taken the oath of allegiance to the British Crown had decitizenized themselves. Steps were taken to repatriate those men. That legislation has already been enacted. However, at the time that bill was under discussion in the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization the question came up as to the status of alien soldiers in the different nations throughout the world. I took up the question with the representatives of the several countries throughout the world, requesting that they provide me with the oath which an alien desiring to enter the military or naval service must take. I also requested that they supply me with information on the following subjects:

First, as to how the taking of this oath affects the citizenship in the nation whose army the alien enters.

Second, does the taking of the oath make him a citizen in whole or in part in that country?

Third, how does it affect him as regards the right of franchise, devolution of property, marriage and divorce, and receiving a pension from the Government?

Fourth, should an alien who has taken the oath of allegiance and served in the military or naval forces and for that service has been granted a pension become a citizen of another nation, would he thereby forfeit his pension?

There is one thing about which we need to be thinking: Under our present laws if an alien who, leaving his family in the United States, has joined the forces of one of our cobelligerents, is wounded there and comes back, under our present law, he can not be admitted to the United States, because he might become a public charge.

One of the questions which we are going to have to think about and to discuss also with our cobelligerents is this: Will these cobelligerents of ours permit the pensions to follow these wounded aliens who desire to return to the United States? If they do, then there is no danger whatever of their becoming public charges in the United States. The more you think on the status of soldiers in alien armies the more difficult and delicate you will see the situation will become as time goes on after the war.

The data which I have here this morning and which I am submitting is not complete. It is such a long task to get all the information on the subject that I felt it might be better to put in now the data which we have and add to it as we may be able to get further light on the subject. I do not have here a report from China or from Russia, and, of course, not from Germany. A few of the smaller nations are yet to be heard from. I have not yet been able to obtain copies of the oaths taken by aliens entering the service of some of these nations, but the data which has been collected thus far is sufficient to show that practically no two nations in the world have the same system of taking aliens into their service or the same rules for providing for the men after they have finished their military service. This correspondence has convinced me that the United States has gone far ahead of any other nation in providing and caring for the aliens who enter her military service. There is much work yet to be done looking toward the final adjustment of the relations that should be maintained between our Government and the aliens who have served under the colors of our cobelligerents who are returning to this country in the hope of once more being with their families.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman state the result of his investigation as to ascertaining what France has done and will do for those Americans who have been members of the Foreign Legion?

Mr. MEEKER. I can not offer any data on that subject. Of course, as I said, I think it will be absolutely necessary for us in a council of nations, which must inevitably come in the not far-distant future, to work out an entirely new system of caring for the alien soldiers who may pass from one country to another. At present we have not the data on the point the gentleman has raised.

The following information is compiled from reports received:

ARGENTINA.

Argentine military and naval forces are organized under the compulsory military law; therefore foreigners have nothing to do with that service and in peace times can not enter it.

There have been in other times what they called "foreign legions" fighting in time of war under the flag, but generally men serving in those legions have finished their services with the war without becoming citizens. If they have continued in the service, as has been the case several times, they have not been able to belong to the army or navy without being naturalized Argentinians in accordance with the laws of Argentina.

A naturalized citizen who enjoys a pension from the Argentine Government loses his pension if he resigns his citizenship.

BOLIVIA.

The fact of an alien taking military service in Bolivia does not make him a citizen and does not in any way affect his rights concerning property or his marriage obligations.

If pension is granted an alien, the right is not lost unless he should go to a country actually at war with Bolivia.

BRAZIL.

In both corps of the navy—national marines and naval battalions—foreigners are not admitted. Foreigners may only be accepted in the corps as extra firemen; are under contract for a fixed period, subject to military law, not required to give allegiance. In other words, they are civilians under military status while in the service of the navy.

Enlisted men do not lose original nationality, as the enlistment is not equivalent to naturalization.

Foreigners are placed in same class as natives in all that concerns acquisition and enjoyment of rights. It is understood that foreigners serving as soldiers have, with slight restrictions peculiar to their occupations, all civil rights which they enjoyed before enlisting, as follows: Contractual rights, marriage, raising family, divorce, property, disposal of property inter vivos or extestamento, enjoyment of prizes, pensions, life insurance. Foreigners once admitted to the ranks as sailors shall not be entitled to political or electoral rights.

A pensioner of the State loses his pension if he goes to any foreign country without permission of the Government, but pensioner does not suffer any restriction if, before he leaves for foreign country, he obtains an official permit, even though he is a naturalized citizen.

BULGARIA.

No aliens can enter the military or naval service of Bulgaria unless he first becomes naturalized as a Bulgarian citizen, thereby acquiring all the rights and privileges of citizenship.

Alien civilians may be employed in offices which have no connection with active military service, such as clerks in the ministry of war, leaders of military bands, etc.

Should an alien who has taken the oath of allegiance and served in the military or naval forces, and for that service been granted a pension from the Bulgarian Government, become a citizen of another nation, he thereby forfeits his pension, and should he return to Bulgaria he would be liable in case of a general mobilization to be drafted into service.

CHILE.

Foreigners are admitted to the Chilean Army only under contracts when their services are indispensable or as attachés at the request of some friendly government; this also applies to the navy.

COLOMBIA.

No one can be admitted to the army without taking an oath to support and defend the constitution and to comply with all the obligations it imposes. This oath of itself does not make him a citizen of Colombia, and does not modify the statutes as to personal and real property of foreigners in Colombia, or to exercise the rights, natural and civil, that the laws of Colombia establish.

DENMARK.

Every man who is in possession of Danish citizenship is liable to military service, but only those aliens who have acquired a fixed residence in Denmark, and then only in so far as no treaty with a foreign State or the alien's duty toward such foreign State as a subject thereof would prevent the drafting of the alien into Danish military service. Neither the taking of the oath nor the military service would make an alien a Danish citizen or affect his status in civil life.

All officials and officers appointed by the King are entitled to a pension under certain conditions, but otherwise pension must be granted by special act. As a rule a pension can not, without special permission, be paid to a pensioner living outside of Denmark, but a mere change of citizenship would not affect the title to a pension.

ENGLAND.

The law forbids the giving of a commission to an alien, and an enlisted alien is not capable of being promoted to a commission. As regards other aliens, if a soldier is a negro or a person of color, by enlisting in His Majesty's regular forces he becomes entitled to all the privileges of a natural-born British subject. This will not give him any right of franchise unless he has a franchise qualification in some other way; and as regards devolution of property, marriage, and divorce, these depend generally on domicile and not on nationality. As regards other aliens enlisting, they do not by so doing get any civil rights of British subjects. They, therefore, get no right of franchise, and as regards devolution of property, marriage, and divorce, that depends generally on domicile and not on nationality; but so far as it may in any case depend on nationality, they would not be treated as British subjects.

As regards the right to receive a pension, an enlisted alien is in exactly the same position as any other soldier. In case of war between his country and Great Britain, his pension would not be paid to him during the war, and his pension ceases to be payable, except in special cases, if he ceases to reside in British dominions. If an alien or any other soldier becomes the subject of another nation, there is no provision to deprive him of his pension. Pension rights are not the creation of statutes but of royal warrants or orders in councils, as the case may be, which provide for payment of pensions, if the money be provided by Parliament. There is no legal obligation on the State to pay any pension, but only an obligation of honor based on the fact that the State had pledged its credit. The above remarks apply generally to naval pensions.

The following oath is taken at the time of enlistment:

I, ———, do make oath that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty King George the Fifth, his heirs and successors, and that I will, as in duty bound, honestly and faithfully defend His Majesty, his heirs and successors, in person, crown, and dignity against all enemies, and will observe and obey all orders of His Majesty, his heirs and successors, and of all the generals and officers set over me. So help me God.

FRANCE.

An alien who desires to enter the military or naval service of France is not asked to take on oath. He has only, under the present circumstances, to sign a paper pledging himself to serve while the present war lasts.

GREECE.

As a rule, no one but a Greek subject is admitted to the military or naval service in Greece. Exception is made in special cases when foreigners are accepted as special instructors, in which case their status is determined in details by a special law. In such cases the foreigners do not acquire the Greek citizenship.

GUATEMALA.

The Government has, on occasions, employed aliens as instructors and professors for the artillery and military academy, and they have been employed under a contract, but at present there are no aliens in the army. These aliens have been obliged, of course, to take the oath to observe the laws of the country during their stay. All aliens take the oath on the Constitution of the Republic. An alien who serves either in the army or any other position in the Government has to become a citizen, thereby losing any other citizenship.

HAITI.

No foreigner can be admitted to the Haitian Army or marine before declaring his intention to settle in Haiti and swearing that he renounces all other countries. This rule admits of exceptions and does not apply to American citizens who, conformable to the convention between the Republic of Haiti and the United States of America, are named by the President of Haiti, of the proposal of the United States to organize and command the new organization of gendarmes of Haiti.

A naturalized foreigner who has obtained a military pension from the Government of Haiti can not be denationalized.

HONDURAS.

During the stay of an alien in military or naval service he must obey the laws and ordinances as well as any Honduran citizen. The taking of the oath does not make him a citizen.

If he has served in military or naval forces, and for that service is granted a pension from the Government, becomes a citizen of another nation, he thereby forfeits his pension.

HOLLAND.

No aliens are taken into the Dutch Home Army at any time, with the possible exception of surgeon officers. Aliens may enter the Dutch Colonial Army in peace times.

An enlisted man signs a promise that he will serve six years, or whatever the term may happen to be. An officer swears loyalty to the sovereign, obedience to the laws, and submission to military discipline. These obligations are not considered as expressing or implying renunciation of citizenship in any other be naturalization before either obligation can be taken. Neither country. To enter the Dutch home military service there must obligation affects devolution of property, marriage, or divorce.

A Dutch soldier receiving a pension will forfeit it if he becomes a citizen of another country.

A foreigner can enlist only in the colonial army of the Dutch East Indies; they can not enlist in the home army. By such enlistment and by the oath required therefor, he does not acquire the Dutch citizenship, but he is entitled to a pension according to the rules and regulations of the service.

ITALY.

Only Italian citizens have the privilege of serving in the Italian Army and Navy, and are therefore requested to take the oath.

Aliens may volunteer for service, and take the oath only if they were born in the Italian Kingdom, or if they were born from parents having resided there at least 10 years at the time of their birth. By so doing they acquire Italian citizenship. Italians who have lost their citizenship are admitted to serve and take the oath and thus resume the citizenship they had lost.

JAPAN.

There is no legal impediment against the entry of an alien into the service, provided the Government so desires or orders, but his foreign nationality will preclude him from enjoying or exercising rights and duties exclusively pertaining to a Japanese subject. However, were he so admitted, his citizenship would not be affected even partially, nor would he change his status at all in respect to the right of franchise, devolution of property, marriage, and divorce. The minister of home affairs may, with the sanction of the Emperor, permit the naturalization of an alien who has done specially meritorious service to Japan, without regard to ordinary requirements.

There is no statute covering the case of an alien in general in regard to pensions. It may be paid on the basis of the contract entered into between the Government and the party concerned, or, lacking that, by the special grant of the Government. The Japanese Government is actually paying pensions to a few German professors who used to be in its civil service.

NICARAGUA.

An alien may obtain employment in the militia, but he must previously resign the protection of his own Government. The taking of the oath does not affect the citizenship of an alien at all; either it affects him as regards the right of franchise, devolution of property, marriage and divorce, and receiving pension from the Government. In order that an alien may become a citizen of Nicaragua it is necessary that he reside in the country for at least two consecutive years, and after that that he make a declaration to the bureau of naturalization, or that he obtain the charta of naturalization in conformity with the law. Foreigners in Nicaragua enjoy the same civil rights as those conferred by the constitution to the Nicaraguans. In very few cases the law establishes differences between a Nicaraguan and an alien.

An alien who has served in the army or navy of Nicaragua will enjoy the same privileges and pensions that a Nicaraguan would enjoy, and by the fact that he became a citizen of another nation he would not forfeit these privileges and pensions.

NORWAY.

With the exception of salaried officers, no soldier takes an oath. The conscription oath was abolished in 1891. Military duty has no effect upon citizenship in Norway. Persons other than native-born Norwegians may be taken for duty when they are domiciled in the land. The fact that a foreigner resides in Norway, however, does not mean that he must serve; neither does the law state that he shall have resided in Norway for a certain length of time, but his relations to Norway must be so firm that he must really be domiciled there. A foreigner who does military duty in Norway does not for that reason become a Norwegian subject.

Military duty has no influence upon the right to vote, nor upon the transfer of property, marriage, or divorce. Only subjects of Norway can vote, and foreigners may not acquire property lawfully except by permission of the King.

At present there are no fixed rules for pensions other than for salaried officers. A pensioner who resides out of Norway will not be paid his pension except by permission of the King, when drawing kroner 200 or over, and when drawing less permission must be obtained from the department. These rules apply to both civil and military pensioners.

PANAMA.

Panama has no army or navy, the national police corps being the only corporation in charge of the custody of public order. There is no objection to foreigners joining the police corps, and the oath consists in swearing to defend the constitution and laws of the country.

An alien joining the police corps does not lose his citizenship according to the Panama laws, and this loss depends only upon the laws of the country of which the alien is a citizen.

PERU.

No aliens are permitted to serve in the Peruvian Army. A few aliens are serving in the Peruvian Army as engineers and mechanics. Their condition is similar to that of individuals engaged by contract for a given period of time, and they do not thereby become Peruvian citizens. Citizenship is acquired after a residence in Peru of two years, without requiring an oath. Aliens in Peru possess the same rights affecting property and marriage as Peruvians. As regards divorce, their rights are governed by the laws of their country.

No pension has ever been granted by the Peruvian Government to any alien, and should a naturalized Peruvian citizen become a citizen of another country he would thereby forfeit his pension.

PORTUGAL.

There is no provision of law authorizing the enlistment of aliens in the Portuguese Army or Navy.

Naturalized citizens are subject to compulsory service.

SALVADOR.

The foreigner in Salvador who desires to enter the national army must swear loyalty to the country and absolute submission to the authorities.

When a foreigner joins the army simply as an instructor, he does not lose by that fact his citizenship, nor acquire that of Salvador.

The soldier, as well as the civilian, who adopts another nationality, naturally loses rights that belonged to his former citizenship.

SERBIA.

An alien desiring to enter the Serbian Army must take an oath of fidelity to his superiors and of submission to the military laws. Service in the army does not affect his citizenship without his express wish to that effect. The taking of the oath does not make him a citizen of Serbia if he does not wish so. The Serbian citizenship is obtained only by the written request of the alien.

Aliens serving in the Serbian Army do not change their civil status in respect to the rights of franchise, property, marriage, or divorce. They are considered as volunteers.

SIAM.

Aliens entering the Siamese Army do not take an oath, but sign a contract which varies according to the nature of the employment.

The only way in which Siamese citizenship may be acquired by an alien is through his naturalization by law or by special decree of the King.

SPAIN.

To enter the army of Spain one must be a Spanish subject or a naturalized Spaniard. The oath to the flag is sworn after having entered the army and after having received elementary instruction.

Spanish citizenship is obtained by acquiring a letter of naturalization or by acquiring residence in any municipality of the monarchy, the rights of Spanish citizens being acquired thereby.

If a person deriving a pension on account of services in the Spanish Army acquires foreign citizenship he loses his pension.

The same laws apply to the navy.

SWEDEN.

No alien is admitted to the army or navy of Sweden.

An alien must have resided in the country for at least three years previous to his admission as a citizen, and before entering either army or navy must have been naturalized and been admitted to Swedish citizenship.

SWITZERLAND.

The Swiss constitution provides for a universal military service.

Subject to all such service are all male citizens from 20 to 44 years of age.

Aliens are exempt from service and can under no circumstances serve in the Swiss armed forces.

No pensions are paid by the Swiss Government.

TURKEY.

No oath is required from Turkish subjects nor aliens who desire to enter the military or naval forces of Turkey.

The enlistment in the Turkish Army or Navy does not make an alien a subject of the Ottoman Empire either in whole or in part.

It does not affect him as regards the right of franchise, devolution of property, marriage, or divorce.

The soldier and his family are entitled to receive a pension from the Government.

If an alien takes the oath of allegiance to the Turkish Empire and serves in the military and naval forces, and for that service is granted a pension, becomes a citizen of another nation, he forfeits his pension.

UNITED STATES.

The oath, when taken by an alien, does not affect his citizenship in the United States. It does not make him a citizen in whole or in part. It does not affect franchise, devolution of property, marriage and divorce, or a pension—except as to Indian wars.

In time of peace no person who is not a citizen of the United States or who has not made legal declaration of his intention to become a citizen, and so forth, shall be enlisted for the first enlistment in the Army.

Judge Advocate General E. H. Crowder says: "The statutes appear to contain no provision that a pension shall be forfeited by reason of becoming a citizen of another country. It seems improbable that an executive department would conceive itself to have the power to depart from the general theory of the pension laws, which is to the effect that when a person has become entitled to a pension he has become so by reason of service and not by reason of citizenship—whence it seems necessary to conclude that change of citizenship can not affect the pension."

At the time of his enlistment every soldier shall take the following oath or affirmation: "I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America; that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies whomsoever; and that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States and the orders of the officers appointed over me according to the Rules and Articles of War."

VENEZUELA.

According to the Military Code of Venezuela only Venezuelans are permitted to serve in the army. Under the provisions of the Federal Constitution it is an attribute of Congress to permit or not the admission of foreigners to the service of the Republic.

The constitutional provision referred to indicates that a foreigner admitted to the service of the Republic does not lose his status as such, and that his services are considered as rendered under a mere contract.

The Venezuelan pension laws refer solely to Venezuelan citizens.

By unanimous consent, Mr. FORDNEY was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

NAVAL BASE AT HAMPTON ROADS.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House last Friday when the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] made certain statements which, if true, would reflect on me, on the people of the district I have the honor to represent, on the Secretary of the Navy and several of his trusted advisers, and especially on the owners of the property recently acquired by the Government for a naval operating base on Hampton Roads. Usually I pay no attention to remarks based on mere idle gossip, but as this speech has been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and might accidentally be read by those who do not know the facts, I shall depart from my usual rule and ask that I may be given time to make a short reply.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give the page of the RECORD where the remarks of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] are printed?

The gentleman repeats certain slanderous statements which he claims were made to him by certain citizens of Newport News and Norfolk in reference to the value of the naval-base property and the manner in which it was acquired, accuses the people of my district of indefensible profiteering, and then boastfully declares that his own people were good enough to buy and give to the Government for war purposes a great tract of land of 80,000 acres. "The two transactions," said he, "stand out in vivid contrast."

I shall not believe that such slanderous statements were made by reputable citizens until the gentleman has furnished me their names and I have had an opportunity to investigate their standing at home. Reputable citizens do not so willfully slander the people among whom they live. I know there are a number of sensational gossipers in every community, whose chief delight consists in running around and telling idle tales, and the men who expressed the opinions claimed were evidently men of this kind and not worthy and patriotic citizens. The very statements furnish the best evidence that they were not, and belie the good sense, the good judgment, and the patriotism of the men who made them. Men who stand idly by and silently and knowingly permit a fraud to be perpetrated on their Government which by their own statements they might have prevented are almost as criminal as the men who actually perpetrate it. I have no patience with men who have evidence of wrongdoing and then deliberately fail or refuse to disclose it. I would never make the statements of such men the basis of slanderous speech in this House. I would never offer their utterances as proof of the accuracy of my own statements. But some people love to repeat gossip and without investigating its truth or falsity.

I advocated the purchase of this property at the price at which it was offered by the owners, and to that extent I am responsible for its acquisition by the Government. Before advocating its purchase I ascertained that Secretary Daniels, following the example of Secretaries Meyer and Bonaparte and the advice of every expert in his department, had recommended its purchase or condemnation. It was declared by them to be the only available, satisfactory site on Hampton Roads that could be developed and equipped as a fleet-operating base and that its acquisition was essential for war purposes. If the Secretary of the Navy and his advisers, the men responsible, especially in time of war, for keeping the Navy in a proper and efficient condition, can not be safely trusted to determine what property is urgently needed for "war purposes," then, in God's name, who can be trusted? I reached no hurried or biased conclusion as to its value. I read the statements of the Secretary of the Navy and his expert advisers, who recommended its purchase at the price named by the owners, and I then advised with hundreds of the most representative business men of Norfolk, men fully acquainted with real-estate values in that section and having no interest in the property, before I reached the conclusion that the price was fair and just. I had absolutely no interest in the property. My constituents were able to hold it and had no need or inclination to resort to improper methods to dispose of it. And I brand as slanderous and as absolutely untrue even an indirect intimation that I would aid or abet one or a number of my constituents in any scheme to impose upon the Government. I would brand it in still stronger language if the rules of this House would permit. When I can not render the Government, as well as my constituents, honest and patriotic service, I shall then become unworthy to be a Member of this great body. But why did not these patriots at least furnish me the information which it is claimed was given to the gentleman from Washington?

Nor do the facts justify the statements said to have been made by these gentlemen that the owners of this property are unpatriotic and have imposed on the Government. Such statements are also slanderous and untrue. The owners offered to sell the property to the Government for the sum of $1,400,000, and we have the statement of the Secretary of the Navy that this was a just and fair price. We have also the statements of Capt. McKean and other naval experts who were appointed to make a special investigation of the subject matter to the same effect. Do you question their honesty or their judgment? Do you not at least believe that they had sense enough to discover an attempt to impose on the Government, if any such attempt had been made? When this proposition was under discussion in the House and some question was raised as to the value of the property, I made the offer, on the part of the owners, to have its value determined by condemnation or by any other fair method. I was willing to trust the courts to determine its value. But subsequently the House, upon the recommendation of the Committee on Naval Affairs, authorized its condemnation and directed that its value should be determined by a board or commission appointed for that purpose. This board was appointed by order of July 21, 1917, and after a careful and painstaking investigation, made on the premises, with opportunity to every one who desired it to be heard, submitted its award on the 5th day of December, 1917. It awarded the owners the sum of $1,422,935. This award was subsequently approved by the Secretary of the Navy and by the President. The gentleman from Washington evidently was not familiar with these facts. They refute, and beyond question, his indefensible statement, based on the weakest kind of evidence, that the owners "worked" the Government for a fancy price for their property. Did the Secretary of the Navy and his expert advisers and also the special board to determine its value corruptly collude with the owners in the perpetration of a fraud upon the Government? No one would believe this. And yet the owners, if they "worked" the Government, must have done so through these officials. But where were these patriots all this time? Why did not they appear before this board, which for four long months, and on the premises, was making diligent effort to ascertain the real value of this property, and testify that the Government was about to be "worked" for a fancy price? This would have been far more patriotic than to indulge now in unwarranted criticism.

The people of the district I have the honor to represent are with few exceptions native-born Americans. They are as loyal, as patriotic, as honest, and as severely condemn profiteering as the citizens of any other State. They have shown their courage and their patriotism in every crisis that has confronted this Government; and history will prove that this has been done by their deeds, not by their professions. I have no indictment to bring against the people of the great State of Washington. I would not bring an indictment against them upon the testimony of mere gossipers. The very name "Washington" is sacred to all Virginians. But I do most strongly resent the insinuations of its Representative in this body and his boastful intimation that his people are more honest, more loyal, or more patriotic than are the people of old Virginia. I recall the old story of the man who stood up in the temple and boastfully thanked God that he was better than other men and especially better than the poor man who at the same time was beseeching his Father to be merciful to him a sinner. That story has always impressed me, and I have made it a rule never to boast of my own good deeds and never to impugn the motives of men who may be just as honest and just as patriotic as I profess to be. I commend this story to the gentleman from Washington, and if he will read it I do not believe he will again wrongfully and unjustly condemn the people of an entire community. People are frequently better than we think they are. This is no time for crimination or recrimination. The boys from Washington and from Virginia are doubtless now standing side by side on the battle front, each vying with the other in a supreme effort to win this war. Why can not we, as the Representatives of the same great States, stop indulging in such unjust criticisms and stand side by side in united effort to accomplish the same great purpose? Such a course would furnish the best evidence of a more genuine patriotism.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for not to exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in the few remarks made by me on Friday afternoon during the discussion of the Army appropriation bill I discussed the price paid by the Government for the site of the old Jamestown Exposition property in Virginia. I beg to assure the House that I had no thought in mind of reflecting upon the activities of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HOLLAND], who represents that district. The gentleman has just stated that he wonders why people who said to me that the price was too high did not say so when certain men in that neighborhood were selling this site. Because I presume they knew that the price carried a large part of the losses of the Jamestown Exposition, and would have been criticised by many of their own fellow citizens if they had so stated. I presume, too, that in many congressional districts the Members, while elected to come here and serve the Nation, are expected, each and every one, to bring home some bacon for his district. That has been the rule. Constituents rarely, if ever, blame a man for getting all that he can for his district. But the House is correcting that a little. But the point in what I said about the Jamestown sale was this: Having stated what the citizens told me about these sales, I said—

Here in the House we have stood by and let things like this go through under the guise of war necessities. We must not do it again. It is not too late to cut down these bills. It is time to quit throwing away money like water.

Mr. Speaker, I said that, and I stand by it. Now, the stories that I heard may have been gossip, told me during a pleasant visit to the National Soldiers' Home in that vicinity, but no one whom I met seemed to know the exact details of the transaction. Every Member of the House here was a party to it. Few Members know the exact details. We were dependent upon reports, and finally upon the conference report. I said Friday that I thought we had paid $1,200,000. I now correct the figures, based on the statement of the gentleman from Virginia himself. We paid $1,422,530, or $200,000 odd more than I thought we paid. I said that they had demanded $1,200,000, and after the thing had been voted down here in the House, the Members of the House not being willing to stand for it, that we had then paid $1,000,000.

I ascertain now that we paid $1,200,000, and I am told that citizens involved in the ownership of the property making that sale were asked to accept that sum, and if any of them were not satisfied with the proposed rate or proportion that they received they could accept 75 per cent in money and sue the Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to pursue that any further. It has gone by. It is an example of some high prices that have been paid. This House has been unable to help itself. When we did protest and vote against this, immediately there came statements that we could not controvert that it was an absolute war necessity. That statement was made in the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the statement was also made that the finger of God pointed to this as the place. These men who had it to sell received a price of $1,400,000, when it had been hawked around town for sale at a greatly less price. I stated that the offered price was $300,000, but I am told it was bought at a forced sale for $400,000; that no outsiders bid at the auction, for the reason that they knew that if they bought it that it carried a lot of bills and liens of the collapsed Jamestown Exposition. So, as a matter of fact, after the Secretary of the Navy had recommended this and urged it after the House had turned it down, there were attached to the price paid for it the debts of the Jamestown Exposition. That and the fact the Government wanted it gave it its value.

I have no controversy with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HOLLAND]. I know him to be a faithful, hard-working Member of this body, and I will not quarrel with him. His people got the money. Some of them rapped at me a little bit—said this Congress was "easy"—and I claimed I had a right to warn every Member, including myself, that we must scrutinize these bills in the future.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MAYS. Does the gentleman have the names of those men who said that this Congress was "easy"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I have two or three of the names.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman give the names?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can do it, but before I do give the names I wish to say that there is a distinguished gentleman from my State who is down there now, and if necessary I can wire him to investigate thoroughly this question.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman give the names?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have not the names with me at this moment. Now, I find in this morning's New York Sun an editorial concerning another sudden increase in land values, and to show that I do not pick out any one place for criticism I want to say that this locality is near Los Angeles.

Congress appropriated $80,000 for the acquisition of 12 acres of land at Point Vincent, Cal., 12 miles from the harbor, in which to place a new lighthouse. It was owned by a syndicate which demanded $632,000 for the property, $32,000 for the land itself and $600,000 for the depreciation in value of the remaining property of the syndicate at and about Point Vincent, where it is proposed to establish a fine residence section.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. COX. Are these profiteers on the Pacific coast going to get that $600,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; when the price was raised $600,000 the lighthouse project was abandoned. Secretary Redfield declined to proceed further with it. The Sun criticizes Mr. Redfield, says he should not have quit, and says that if the Government were always frightened off by the exorbitant claim of landowners the country would have to get along without any more new public buildings, forts, or lighthouses. Then the Sun discusses the right of the Government to the property of its citizens, and in conclusion the editorial states what I think should have been done in the Jamestown case:

A judicial proceeding to condemn the necessary land in this case would settle once for all the vexed questions whether such a claim for the alleged depreciation of land not taken can properly be allowed to augment the award of the land taken.

Now, I think when the purchase price of land reaches such a discussion as this site at Jamestown did the United States Government would do well to have a judicial proceeding to determine the real value and not the value created by the fact that the Government wants it. I know, as every Member knows, that when we go back to our districts this fall and undertake to explain all of these tremendous expenditures of money each Member is likely to pick out for criticism the expenditure which looks to him the rankest, and for myself I am likely to pick out Jamestown and set that $1,400,000 sale in time of war up against the $2,000,000 gift of land by the citizens of Tacoma, in the district which I have the honor to represent.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Before the gentleman sits down will he tell the House what he means by each Member wanting to take home some bacon?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, the gentleman knows, surely. I think it has been well known for years past that when a man is elected to Congress and is sent here to help perform full service for this great Government, to participate in the making of laws, he is also expected to look out for the wants of his district—get post-office buildings, river and harbor improvements, nitrate plants, and all that—and if he gets them he will be considered as a good Representative of his district. Of course that does not always mean reelection, for let me say that the man who has taken home the most bacon in recent years was Judge Wickersham, of Alaska, who engineered an appropriation for a railroad in Alaska costing $35,000,000.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman please say what he means? That does not say what he means by the word "bacon." Does the gentleman mean something that is dishonorable?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no, no. What I tried to say——

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me finish my question. Will the gentleman say why he used that expression in talking about the Jamestown Exposition space, for which he said the Government pays too much?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, well——

Mr. CARAWAY. Was not the inference that way——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I used it as slang, as an expression of the street. I would not criticize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HOLLAND] here or elsewhere for trying to prove that the site was worth $1,400,000. I have not criticized him. His people, most of them, no doubt believe that it was worth that. It had attached to it a part of the debt of the Jamestown Exposition. The criticism falls upon all the rest of us, as we failed to stand by our real judgment in the matter, which is the statement I made in the first place and which is all there is to it.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. This is unanimous-consent day, and the Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to take the chair.

Mr. FOSTER assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

SALARY OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY, RHODE ISLAND.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3563) to increase the salary of the United States district attorney for the district of Rhode Island.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, let us have the bill reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the salary of the United States district attorney for the district of Rhode Island shall be at the rate of $5,000 a year.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 5, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,500."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. STINESS. Mr. Speaker, before that is done, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. CRAMTON. I withhold the objection for a moment.

Mr. STINESS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Michigan will not press his objection at this time. This bill has been here for two years. The recommendation of the United States district judge three years ago was that this salary be increased to $4,000. I know something of the duties of the office, because I held the office just before the present incumbent. I know that during the last two years and since the war these duties have increased very much, and I think there is no reason why this salary should not be increased, on account of the increased duties of the office and on account of the increased cost of living. Because of the war various new duties have been thrust upon the present incumbent, and it seems to me that the salary ought to be increased.

Mr. SANFORD. What is the present salary?

Mr. STINESS. Two thousand five hundred dollars. That salary has been paid for a great many years. It used to be the custom that the person who held the office practiced law generally, but of late years that has changed, and the United States district attorney must now devote all of his time to the duties of the office. If the gentleman from Michigan were familiar with the duties of the office, I know that he would not make the objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I want also to appeal to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] not to object to this bill. It has received very careful consideration from the Committee on the Judiciary. We have had hearings upon it and have gone into it very carefully. The conclusion is that it is an outrage to ask a man of ability to be a district attorney of the United States for the salary that is now being paid in this case. It is far below that paid the district attorneys all over the United States as a general proposition. The Committee on the Judiciary considered this and unanimously reported the bill and urged that it be passed. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will not object to considering the bill upon its merits.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right further to object, I do not care to go into the merits of the bill further than to suggest this, that it is to be assumed that the Department of Justice is as familiar with the needs and merits of that official as any of us, and the report of the committee upon this bill proposes a larger salary than the Department of Justice recommends. Further than that, this same bill was before us in the last Congress, and the question was raised as to the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary to handle bills of this kind. There is no question about the jurisdiction under the rules, and it is a mystery to me why gentlemen should persist in having their bills referred to a committee that does not have jurisdiction of them. The rules provide that "the examination of the accounts and expenditures of the several departments of the Government and the manner of keeping the same," and so forth, "the abolishment of useless offices, the reduction or increase of the pay of officers, shall all be subjects within the jurisdiction" of the nine standing committees on the public expenditures of the several departments, and that expenditures in the Department of Justice shall be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. Rather than raise the point of order on these bills I make objection at this time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state whether or not any of the committees on the expenditures to which he has referred has ever brought in a bill increasing the pay of a district attorney or a district judge of the United States?

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall answer the gentleman by stating that at this session of Congress the Committee on Expenditures of the Department of Justice, of which I am a member, has recommended a bill for the increase of the salary of a district attorney in the district of Connecticut, and that bill is now on the calendar.

Mr. STINESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. STINESS. I would suggest to the gentleman that the recommendation made here by the judge of the district court and also by the Department of Justice was made two years ago. Since that time we have been in war. About Narragansett Bay there are a dozen forts where there are a large number of soldiers, and there are a great many prosecutions for the sale of liquor in the war zone, and other offenses.

There have been a great many prosecutions under the espionage act and other matters of that kind, so that there has been a very large increase in the duties of the office. Now, I have no quarrel with the gentleman from Michigan about what committee this should go to; I do not care. If it has gone to the wrong committee I am sorry, but the fact is that the man who performs the duties of the office at $2,500 a year should be paid at least $5,000, and it seems to me fair to consider this as a war measure, because these duties have increased on account of the war, and with all these forts and soldiers and new duties it seems to me this man should be paid more. Now, when I held that office, which was immediately before the present incumbent, when I first went into the office there was not so much to do. We had two terms of the grand jury a year, and it took four or five days for a term. The work increased after that, so that the grand jury is in almost continuous session and sits there three or four weeks at a time. I did not ask for an increase in my own salary because a different administration had come in, and I realized that it was not going to be long that I would remain in that office. This gentleman took my place. He is a good Democrat, he is a good official, he is capable, he is performing the duties with ability, and because this bill has gone to some committee to which the gentleman thinks it should not have gone, I hope he will not let that stand in the way of giving this man the salary to which he is entitled. He can not live on $2,500, and there is no use talking about it. It is not a living salary, as the gentleman knows, and therefore I hope he will withdraw any objection that he has about its going from one committee to another and let the bill pass on its merits.

Mr. CRAMTON. I suggest to the gentleman that the consideration as to the cost of living, and so forth, will apply to all district attorneys, and it seems to me the logical way is to have the whole subject given consideration in an exhaustive way by the proper committee.

Mr. STINESS. I will say to the gentleman that this case is different from the ordinary cases of district attorneys, because on account of the war many activities are centered in the district. There is the naval training station, the torpedo station, and thousands and thousands of men are there who were not there before.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield? There has been more or less controversy over this matter and measures of a similar nature. There has been a contest on the floor of this House whether these small committees are doing work. There was a question whether or not they should have assistance when Congress met at the beginning of the session. Under the rules this committee has jurisdiction of this class of bills. The Judiciary Committee and the large committees of the House are flooded with business, and why do not you ask unanimous consent to have the bill stricken from the calendar and refer it to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and the gentleman will get his bill reported out. It ought to be objected to, we ought not to let the bill go through.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a word to say. I am the man who introduced the bill, and I am very grateful to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. STINESS] for saying something in advocacy of it. Because I felt anything I might say to the gentleman from Michigan would be absolutely lost upon him. I kept quiet. Anything I might say would be absolutely lost on him. I have tried to save the time of the House. Whatever effort I made would be in vain, dealing, as I was, with that kind of intelligence.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, objection not having been made the second time to letting the bill go through in the last Congress in this shape, the gentleman did not appreciate the courtesy, but comes in this Congress and insists again on it after he had notice that I objected.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, let me say——

Mr. CRAMTON I will object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. May I ask unanimous consent to address the House for a minute?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

[Mr. O'SHAUNESSY here used words which were subsequently stricken out.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order, and I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down.

[Mr. O'SHAUNESSY here used words which were subsequently stricken out.]

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the last remark of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] be taken down. The gentleman can not stand here and insult the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will withhold until the Chair can state the question.

Mr. CRAMTON. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] did not have the floor, and that his language can not appear in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was by unanimous consent only, and anyone has a right to object. But the gentleman demands that the words be taken down.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the second remark be taken down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that the second remark of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] be taken down. It will be done.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, in order to let business proceed, I will withdraw the remark. Possibly we will find others at another time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object, unless he has the right under the rules to do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When a request is made that the words be taken down, it can not be withdrawn except by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I object. I insist that the words be taken down and that the House pass upon them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the language objected to.

The words objected to and afterwards ordered stricken from the RECORD were read by the Clerk.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the words be stricken from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those in favor of the motion will say "aye," those opposed "no"——

Mr. DYER. On that I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. RUSSELL. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is an automatic call of the House.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to inquire of the Chair if we are in the House or not. If so, where is the mace?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. We are in the House.

The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of expunging the words from the RECORD will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 269, answered "present" 6, not voting 155, as follows:

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Florida, Mr. SEARS. I desire to withdraw my vote of "yea" and be recorded as voting "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Clerk will call the next bill on the calendar.

MEDALS OR DECORATIONS RECEIVED FROM FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2796) to permit American citizens to wear medals or decorations received from certain foreign countries on entering the military or naval service of the United States, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, when this bill was last under consideration I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] had some remarks to make about it. I do not see him here at the present time. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over at the present time without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over at the present time without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the next bill.

MEDALS OF HONOR AND DISTINGUISHED-SERVICE MEDALS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1720) to provide for the award of medals of honor and distinguished-service medals.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that the Committee on Military Affairs is about to report a bill that will have the full support of the War Department. Therefore I object to the present consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JUDGMENT IN FAVOR OF THE CHEROKEE NATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4699) providing for the payment of certain interest on items 1 and 4 of the judgment of the Court of Claims of May 18, 1905, in favor of the Cherokee Nation.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object to the consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CLAIMS OF CHEROKEE NATION AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 357) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, consider, and determine certain claims of the Cherokee Nation against the United States.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects. The Clerk will call the next bill.

INJURIES TO GREEK NATIONALS IN SOUTH OMAHA, NEBR.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 69) to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Government of Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Turkey for injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will call the next bill.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK, COLO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 171) to repeal the last proviso of section 4 of an act to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park, in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes, approved January 26, 1915.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The Clerk will call the next bill.

SALARIES IN CUSTODIAN SERVICE, TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 344) for the regulation of salaries in the custodian service of the Treasury Department.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COX. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana objects. The bill is stricken from the calendar.

DETERMINATION OF HEIRSHIP, FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10590) to provide for a determination of heirship in cases of deceased members of the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, conferring jurisdiction upon district courts to partition lands belonging to full-blood heirs of allottees of the Five Civilized Trbes, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think some explanation ought to be made as to the necessity for passing this bill before waiving the right of objection.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the reasons for the first section of the bill are set forth pretty clearly in the report, and especially in the brief of Mr. Semple, which, I am sure, the gentleman from Wisconsin has read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the House will be interested in that phase of the bill which seeks to make retroactive proceedings as to the title of real estate of Indians, to which this bill relates. I think that is rather an objectionable feature of the bill.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I agree with the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, and if unanimous consent is given to pass this bill I will then ask unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill 4151 for this bill. That bill has already passed the Senate, and it eliminates that part of the bill which is retroactive.

Mr. STAFFORD. So, then, the gentleman is in favor of striking out that provision of the bill which would make retroactive decisions as to realty?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I am perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman one further question, which relates to a different subject matter, and that is as to the provision authorizing the partition of real estate of Indians where an interest is owned by a restricted Indian.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The situation is about this: The act of Congress approved May 28, 1908, undertook to confer jurisdiction for a complete settlement of inherited estates on the Oklahoma State courts. Now, the county courts constitute the probate courts of our State, but the Oklahoma laws specifically vest jurisdiction for partition in the district courts. This leaves us with no tribunal competent to partition inherited estates where the rights of one restricted heir is involved.

Many of these estates descend to both restricted and unrestricted heirs. The unrestricted heirs may be held up indefinitely by one restricted heir, their interests jeopardized, and their part of the estate made almost worthless.

Land buyers sometimes get undivided interests for much less than actual value because no valid title can be made. The gentleman can understand how havoc can be played with titles, values, and legitimate development under such unsatisfactory and indefinite procedure as that existing now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there many instances where the land is owned exclusively by restricted Indians?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Where the inherited estates are owned exclusively by restricted Indians?

Mr. STAFFORD. Where the inherited estates descend to heirs who are exclusively, or a major portion of them, restricted Indians?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is true in some cases, but in many cases the inherited estate descends to both restricted and unrestricted heirs. An exception to that, of course, would be the immediate descendants, the children of the deceased persons, both of whom fall in the restricted class. Where there are no children, then the gentleman can see that the descent might go to unrestricted as well as restricted Indians. And in some cases you will find that the sons and daughters of a father may some of them be restricted and some unrestricted, because some are the children of an Indian mother and others the children of a white woman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman has no question that this provision will not work any injury to the rights of the restricted Indians, but will be beneficial to them?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It will not be injurious to the restricted Indians and it will work great benefit to the unrestricted Indians.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can understand how it will work great benefit to the unrestricted Indians in case among the heirs at law there are but one or two restricted Indians, because the sale of the interest in the real estate in which he owns an undivided share is forbidden. Will the gentleman inform the House what is the present method of the determination of heirships among the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Full-blood Indians?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There is at present no procedure for the determination of heirship. There is no such thing as a final determination of the heirship of full-blooded Indian heirs in the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. STAFFORD. This first section of the bill endeavors to provide a method of the determination of that heirship?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if the Senate bill which he suggested he would offer as a substitute contains the language which Mr. Secretary Lane, in a letter of March 16, 1918, to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], said he would like to see incorporated in House bill 10590?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; if the gentleman will look at the report, he will see that the language is as follows:

Provided, That an appeal may be taken in the manner and to the court provided by law in cases of appeal in probate matters generally.

That is contained in the Senate bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; but that other language, which I see is in the House bill in accordance with the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior, is that in the Senate bill? This is the language to which I refer:

That the lands of full-blood members of any of the Five Civilized Tribes are hereby made subject to the laws of the State of Oklahoma providing for the partition of real estate. Any land allotted in such proceedings to a full-blood Indian, or conveyed to him upon his election to take the same at the appraisement, shall remain subject to all restrictions upon alienation and taxation obtaining prior to such partition. In case of a sale under any decree or partition the conveyance thereunder shall operate to relieve the land described of all restrictions of every character.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is in the bill as passed by the Senate, which I will have read if we get unanimous consent for consideration.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice that is contained in the letter of the Secretary of the Interior to which I refer, and he says that he recommends the enactment of the House bill if it is amended in accordance with this particular suggestion.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The amendments are carried in the Senate bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is there any other language in the Senate bill which will at all contradict these amendments?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The only provision placed in the Senate bill which is not in the House bill is down in the middle of section 1, and is this language:

But this provision shall not be construed to reopen the question of the determination of an heirship already ascertained by competent legal authority under existing law.

That has been added in the Senate bill, I understand, at the suggestion of the department.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That particular clause would not in any way affect the two amendments suggested by the Secretary?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No; it would not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Which are incorporated in the bill?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It would not affect them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Since I last addressed the gentleman my attention has been called by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] to a decision rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States to-day which passes upon the question of the heirship or title to lands of Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes. Of course, the gentleman can not be acquainted with the scope of that opinion, and I think perhaps in view of that decision it might be well to let this bill be passed over temporarily, to see just what the scope of the decision of the Supreme Court is.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will permit, this bill deals with procedure. I think the decision of the Supreme Court, from what I hear, only deals with the rights of the heirs. This bill, as the gentleman understands, deals with the method of determining the heirs and not what the rights of the heirs are. The decision of the Supreme Court did not deal with that question nor could it deal with section 2 giving the district courts of Oklahoma jurisdiction where, in the decision of Coleman against Battiest, it was held under existing law our Supreme Court did not have jurisdiction. So the passage of this bill could not possibly do any damage. Let me say to the gentleman, while I am on my feet, that this bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, it is recommended by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, and it has been passed by the Senate, and recommended by the House Committee on Indian Affairs, and there is no opposition to it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And it has been requested by the Federal land bank at Wichita, Kans.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know the influences back of the bill, and I recognize the need, but I thought it might be better to postpone it in order that we might get acquainted with the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think, as I have said, that the decision of the Supreme Court only deals with the rights and not with the method of determining the heirs.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And the question of there not being a procedure for the determination of the heirs has been passed upon by the Supreme Court long ago. We have no way of determining the heirs unless this bill is passed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice as the bill was originally introduced it provided that in the determination of questions of fact as to who were the heirs the decision of the probate court in the State of Oklahoma conducted in the manner provided by the laws of the State for the determination of heirship should be conclusive of the question, and then I observe that the House committee inserted a proviso:

That an appeal may be taken in the manner and to the court provided by law, in cases of appeal in probate matters generally.

That is an exceedingly important proviso.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is in the Senate bill. The Senate placed it in this bill; and if the gentleman will permit me, the original bill from which the gentleman is reading was introduced at the suggestion of the attorney for the Federal land bank at Wichita, Kans. He simply sent the bill to me, and I introduced it; it was sent in the regular course to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary suggested certain changes, every one of which has been adopted in the bill reported and in the bill as passed by the Senate.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman will see that if Congress should enact a law and say that the decision of the probate court in Oklahoma shall bar any attempt at an appeal——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think what the gentleman says is very important, and I was glad the Secretary called my attention to it, so we put it in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill S. 4151 on the Speaker's table be considered in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the Senate bill 4151 be substituted for the House bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, did I understand the gentleman to say that this bill was on the Speaker's table?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The Senate bill is on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to taking the Senate bill from the Speaker's table and substituting it for the House bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a determination of the question of fact as to who are the heirs of any deceased citizen allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians who may die or may have heretofore died, leaving restricted heirs, by the probate court of the State of Oklahoma having jurisdiction to settle the estate of said deceased, conducted in the manner provided by the laws of said State for the determination of heirship in closing up the estates of deceased persons, shall be conclusive of said question: Provided, That an appeal may be taken in the manner and to the court provided by law in cases of appeal in probate matters generally: Provided further, That where the time limited by the laws of said State for the institution of administration proceedings has elapsed without their institution, as well as in cases where there exists no lawful ground for the institution of administration proceedings in said courts, a petition may be filed therein having for its object a determination of such heirship and the case shall proceed in all respects as if administration proceedings upon other proper grounds had been regularly begun, but this proviso shall not be construed to reopen the question of the determination of an heirship already ascertained by competent legal authority under existing laws: Provided further, That said petition shall be verified, and in all cases arising hereunder service by publication may be had on all unknown heirs, the service to be in accordance with the method of serving nonresident defendants in civil suits in the district courts of said State; and if any person so served by publication does not appear and move to be heard within six months from the date of the final order, he shall be concluded equally with parties personally served or voluntarily appearing.

SEC. 2. That the lands of full-blood members of any of the Five Civilized Tribes are hereby made subject to the laws of the State of Oklahoma providing for the partition of real estate. Any land allotted in such proceedings to a full-blood Indian, or conveyed to him upon his election to take the same at the appraisement, shall remain subject to all restrictions upon alienation and taxation obtaining prior to such partition. In case of a sale under any decree, or partition, the conveyance thereunder shall operate to relieve the land described of all restrictions of every character.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The bill H. R. 10590, to provide for a determination of heirship in cases of deceased members of the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, conferring jurisdiction upon district courts to partition lands belonging to full-blood heirs of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes, was laid on the table.

NUMBERING AND RECORDING OF UNDOCUMENTED VESSELS.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 1549, an act to require numbering and recording of undocumented vessels.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what is the necessity for the United States taking jurisdiction of these motor-propelled boats, 16 feet in length and over, whether they have a permanent or a detachable motor, as this bill proposes to do?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We have two hundred and fifty or three hundred thousand motor boats plying in different waters, chiefly on the Atlantic coast, which are not numbered, and there are no means for identification. It is important to identify them, first, for the purposes of taxation, and, second, if they violate the rules of the road.

The statute of 1910 provides that all motor boats shall have lights, life preservers, whistles, means for extinguishing burning gasoline, and shall comply with the rules of the road for navigable waters. There is no lack of legislation to secure safety in respect of these boats. But it often happens that the parties operating craft of this character take advantage of the difficulty of detecting infractions of the statutes, and in defiance of the laws cross the bows of large steamers, greatly interfering thereby with the navigation of these vessels. Further, they cross the bows of other motor boats, and in still other ways violate the regulations of the police laws, to the very great danger of all concerned. Frequently they disregard the regulations relating to lighting after sunset, and leave their boats in dangerous places without anchor lights. The inspectors are continually confronted with violations of this character, but in many instances are unable to trace the guilty parties.

After we became involved in the war, as a military measure, the Navy Department undertook to enforce a rule of this kind as a protection to our naval vessels and merchant ships on the eastern coast, but they found they had no power to do so. This legislation is shown to be necessary in view of what has been stated on the floor to-day, that the German submarines are active in our waters. It will be a means of identifying the motor boat so that we may know the ownership and identify the boat, whether it is operated by an enemy alien or some other one inimical to our interests. That is a reason in addition to the reasons that have been assigned in the committee report.

The only objection ever made against numbering motor boats was because some of the owners of the high-class boats thought that to place numbers on them would disfigure them. But there is now no objection from any source whatever so far as I am advised.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit me to state an additional reason why this is proper legislation? In many sections of the country fishermen owning these boats leave the waters of their own State and fish in foreign jurisdictions and if they there violate the State laws there is no way of identifying or tracing them. This would permit that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And oftentimes the boats are stolen, and it is impossible to identify them. It is just like letting automobiles go about the streets of our cities without any method of identifying them.

Mr. STAFFORD. When I read the bill and the report it occurred to me it was unnecessarily placing under Government regulation fishing motor boats and other larger craft and exacting from them a license tax of $10 a year merely under the guise of regulation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This does not carry any tax whatever.

Mr. WALSH. Ten dollars is the penalty.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The only expense is to put the numbers on the boats and the owner has to report to the collector of the port.

Mr. WALSH. That $10 is the penalty.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; for violating the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I gained the impression from reading the report, which was nearly a month ago, that all of these vessels would have to pay a license.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. If they were enrolled as required by the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Does this act apply to the inland waters of the United States?

Mr. ALEXANDER. All of the navigable waters of the United States where motor boats are used.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. I would like to say to the gentleman that the members of the Motorboat Club of Buffalo have written to me objecting to the bill. The club itself has not objected, but I wondered if there is any burden placed upon them that should not be put on motor boats in the Great Lakes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not at all. There is no expense attached except in the placing of the numbers on the boats. It is simply a means of identification. It is of the utmost importance now, if never before, in view of the presence of enemy submarines off our coasts and for the reasons I have already given.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the chairman of the committee say that this bill would not require any additional tax. I direct their attention to the report. Perhaps I read it erroneously. It says:

It will aid the Treasury Department in the collection of the taxes imposed on pleasure boats of a certain character by section 603 of the act of October 3, 1917. As it is, the department finds great difficulty in locating the boats subject to this tax.

Mr. WALSH. That is another tax altogether.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is another tax entirely. If the motor boats are liable to that tax under exising law, this simply helps to identify the boat and enables the Government to trace the owner.

Mr. STAFFORD. Personally I do not think we should try to regulate motor boats in all of our inland streams and on the Great Lakes. There may be necessity during the war to have a bill like this, especially in view of the present exigency of submarines appearing on the Atlantic coast, but for the National Government to take charge of the regulation of all motor boats on the inland streams, wherever navigable, I think it is going quite far.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The statute of 1910 provides that all motor boats shall have lights, life preservers, means of extinguishing burning gasoline, and so forth. We do not impose any additional burden upon them here except to say that they shall be numbered, and that is for the purpose of identification.

Mr. LEHLBACH. There is no objection to the numbering of these motor boats that can not with equal force be urged against the licensing and numbering of automobiles, and nothing can be said for licensing and numbering automobiles that can not with equal force be said for motor boats. The only reason the Federal Government has to do this is because it has control of all navigable waters of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman advances a good argument in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every undocumented vessel, operated in whole or in part by machinery, owned in the United States and found on the navigable waters thereof, except public vessels, and vessels not exceeding 16 feet in length measured from end to end over the deck, excluding sheer, temporarily equipped with detachable motors, shall be numbered. Such numbers shall be not less in size than 3 inches and painted or attached to each bow of the vessel in such manner and color as to be distinctly visible and legible.

SEC. 2. That the said numbers, on application of the owner or master, shall be awarded by the collector of customs of the district in which the vessel is owned and a record thereof kept in the customhouse of the district in which the owner or managing owner resides. No numbers not so awarded shall be carried on the bows of such vessel.

SEC. 3. That notice of destruction or abandonment of such vessels or change in their ownership shall be furnished within 10 days by the owners to the collectors of customs of the districts where such numbers were awarded. Such vessel sold into another customs district may be numbered anew in the latter district.

SEC. 4. That the penalty for violation of any provision of this act shall be $10, for which the vessel shall be liable and may be seized and proceeded against in the district court of the United States in any district in which such vessel may be found. Such penalty on application may be mitigated or remitted by the Secretary of Commerce.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Commerce shall make such regulations as may be necessary to secure proper execution of this act by collectors of customs and other officers of the Government.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect six months after its passage.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege in connection with an article published about me in the St. Louis Republic under date of May 25, 1918.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It is because of the headlines placed over an article, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The shameful record of Congressman SHACKLEFORD.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, the St. Louis Republic is waging against me and other Missouri Congressmen a campaign of such vindictiveness and falsehood that I feel I owe it to myself and to the public to make some reply.

It opened the assault of May 25 in an article entitled "The shameful record of Mr. SHACKLEFORD." To justify that malignant headline it set out numerous specifications, some of which are wholly untrue.

It charges that I did not vote for conscription. Technically that charge is true, but the publishers of the Republic knew that I favored conscription; that at the time the vote was taken I was absent from Washington for a week or so at the advice of my doctor on account of sickness; that I did not go away, however, until I had been assured by those having the conscription bill in charge that there was no doubt of its passage. One way to tell a falsehood is to conceal a part of the truth. The Republic chose that method.

It charges that before war had been declared I opposed administration measures of preparedness. That is another falsehood. I defy the Republic to point to a single vote cast by me against any measure of preparedness advocated by President Wilson.

It charges that I was sponsor for the McLemore resolution warning Americans not to travel on armed ships of the warring nations. That charge is also false. I had a large part in framing the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs against the McLemore resolution. When the resolution came up in the House I voted to lay it on the table and kill it. This is shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 7, 1916, on page 3720.

Why has the Republic resorted to the publication of these several false charges against me? There can be but one answer. It was moved by a wrongful desire to inflict injury.

The Republic having thus willfully misrepresented me it is fair to assume that it will continue its policy of falsification. The people, however, will doubtless judge its future utterances by its past record and not require me to follow up and expose every untruth it may publish from now until the election. They will probably keep in mind the instruction which the judge sometimes gives to the jury, that if they find any witness has testified falsely on any material matter they may disregard all of his testimony.

In further justification of its characterization of my record as "shameful," the Republic makes some other charges which may be briefly noticed.

It is charged that I voted for the Stone resolution, declaring a state of war with Austria-Hungary. That statement is not quite correct. It was not the Stone resolution for which I voted, but a resolution from the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I was a member. I assisted in the preparation of that resolution and voted for it in the House. It went to the Senate and was there concurred in. The President had asked for the passage of this resolution and was satisfied with its form. What is there in my action on this measure to make my record "shameful"?

The Republic charges that I voted for the prohibition and woman suffrage amendments. I did vote for resolutions referring these proposed amendments to the States to be ratified or rejected by them as they may choose. What was there in either of these votes to render my record "shameful"?

The Republic charges that I voted against the bill which would have "forced" the President to send Col. Roosevelt to France in command of a division of the American Army. That charge is true. The President was Commander in Chief of the Army. It was his duty to appoint officers to command under him. He was responsible for the conduct of the war, and I felt it would be out of place for Congress to dictate to him in that matter. What was there in my action on that measure to render my record "shameful"?

The Republic says that I am an astute politician; that I rarely speak on the floor of the House; but that I play a prominent part in committee meetings and am regarded as an especially aggressive worker in cloakrooms, where many a bill has been put across or killed long before final action was taken on the floor. I should hardly claim that much for myself, but if it be true it simply shows that I have the friendship and the confidence of other Congressmen and that I am able to exercise influence with them. Would it be a good policy for the district to change a Congressman with such capacity and influence for a new and an untried man? Is there anything in this characterization of me to render my record "shameful"?

If the Republic sets itself up as a dictator of Missouri politics then we have a right to ask that it should be truthful and honest in its dictatorship.

On the morning of the last election the Republic had an editorial containing the following words:

Woodrow Wilson has given us the greatest administration since Lincoln, because the President and Congress have worked constructively together. Our lawmakers have had vision, conscience, insight. The election of a Congress prepared to continue this service to the Nation and to mankind is just as important as the election of the President himself.

Missouri expects every man to do his duty to-day by voting for Senator REED and the Democratic congressional ticket.

On November 6, the day before the last election, the Republic had another editorial from which I quote:

The Congress of the past four years has set a new mark in efficiency in legislation.

Missouri takes deep satisfaction in the highly honorable and conspicuously important part by the Missouri delegation at Washington in the new legislation enacted to meet new needs of a new day. No one can recount the history of this epochal period and leave out the achievements of Missourians in the high places of responsibility in the National Legislature.

These two editorials were words of high praise of me and the other Missourians. Both of these editorials were published more than eight months after the McLemore resolution incident of which the Republic now complains. Were these complimentary editorials honest expressions of the opinion of the Republic? If so, then its contrary expressions now are not honest.

The Republic claims that it is inspired to make these malevolent attacks on me and other Missouri Congressmen by a spirit of patriotism, but its record proves this to be untrue. Patriotism never inspired anybody to stir up strife and differences among the American people in an hour of danger like this. Patriotism never inspired anybody to utter falsehoods about any public man for the purpose of undermining the confidence of the public in him. What then has moved the Republic to its policy of vituperation? In my judgment there are three moving causes for it.

In the first place the Republic has never been as prosperous as its owners would like. It has not kept pace in circulation with the Globe-Democrat, its great rival. Consequently its advertising columns do not draw the volume of business nor command the prices therefor that is desired. The managers of the Republic, recognizing the splendid spirit of patriotism that pervades the country have undertaken to capitalize it for a larger circulation. They hope to do this by assuming a "holier-than-thou" attitude.

Again, the Republic and other large newspapers and magazines have for years been going through the mails at very much less than the cost of carriage. This loss to the Government now amounts to something like $80,000,000 a year. When we came to make up the war-tax bill in the last Congress we took part of this subsidy away from the publishers. I and other Missouri Congressmen actively supported this measure. Its passage largely increased the amount of postage which the Republic has to pay the Government. Naturally, the Republic does not look kindly on any of us who increased its taxes. It wants to defeat us, but can not afford to state its real reason and so resorts to such subterfuges as the McLemore resolution, failure to support the bill to send Roosevelt to France, and so forth.

Then, too, the Republic is one of those papers, of which happily there are not many, that professes loyalty to one party and sells its columns to the other. [Applause.] To provide itself with a plausible excuse for such conduct it is probably now paving the way by attacking those Democrats who are likely to be nominated.

In the last campaign, when the Democratic Party had one of the hardest struggles of its existence, the Republic sold its columns to the support of Judge Hughes. On each of the last six days before the election there was carried in the Republic nearly a whole page statement of reasons why Wilson should be defeated and Hughes elected. The Republican campaign committee paid the Republic large sums for this service. The Republic sold its space to get money. The Republican committee bought it to get votes for Hughes. That committee was made up of wise men, who knew what they were doing. They were not throwing their money away, but were putting it where it would do the most good. Nobody can doubt that in Missouri Wilson's vote was made smaller and Hughes's larger by this shameful sale of the columns of this Democratic daily. Had Hughes carried Missouri, he would have won the election.

On those days of the campaign when this great Democratic paper was selling its space to the Hughes committee I and other Democratic Congressmen who are now being vilified and misrepresented by it were in the campaign holding up the flag of Democracy and rallying the voters to the support of Wilson. Is it not strange that in the face of that record the Republic should now in the house of our fathers challenge me and these other Missouri Democrats?

In the same issue of the Republic which carried the vituperation and the slanderous article to which I have referred there was an editorial, from which I quote:

There is probably not one man in this Congress who would now favor legislation intended to restrict the war activity of the country to a limit below the utmost that can be done.

If that statement be true, and it is, then why keep up a fight on these Congressmen? They are very busy with their country's business. Why disturb them and compel them to take the time to look after their own affairs and defend their reputations against the false charges of sinister newspapers?

On May 28 the Republic had another editorial, from which I will quote:

This is no time for fights between American leaders. There is only one enemy, and if there is any American who is impairing his usefulness to the country as a whole by having a feud with any other American he falls short of the full duty of American citizenship.

I commend these words of the Republic to its managers. This is no time to stir up strife between Americans. We should all stand together and win the war. The Republic has said that there is not a man in Congress who would not go to the last limit for victory. Then why malign and harass them? Why not leave their minds free to give their country their best service? The situation is serious. Our boys are going by the hundreds of thousands. They should have, and should be made to feel that they have, a united country behind them. It must discourage them to know that people at home have lost sight of them in a struggle to put some men out of Congress simply to make room for others to get in.

I assure the Republic that everybody here is loyal and will do his best. Then why not forget past differences and stand together in supporting the flag which we all so dearly love?

Oh, the shame of the St. Louis Republic! [Applause.]

GEORGIA EXPERIMENT STATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 231, authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment, and the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, the appropriation for the Georgia Experiment Station, of the State of Georgia, under act of March 4, 1917, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, to the board of trustees of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of the State of Georgia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, provision for substantially the same purpose as this is carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill, which has been agreed to in a partial conference report. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the resolution is stricken from the calendar.

INDIANHEAD RAILROAD.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6982) to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Navy to enter into and contract for the construction of a line of railway from a point in the District of Columbia to Indianhead, Md.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this bill has already passed the House and is now on the Speaker's table, having been returned by the Senate with Senate amendments. This bill is erroneously on this calendar, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has the wrong bill. The Speaker asks the Clerk to pass the one the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the Indianhead bill? Mr. Speaker, this bill has been substantially incorporated in the amendment in the naval appropriation bill, and under the circumstances I do not think we should act upon it here, but await the action of the conferees on that amendment. Therefore I object.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is my recollection, which I am sure is accurate, that this bill here pending was inserted as a paragraph in the naval bill. Before the paragraph was reached during the consideration of that bill it was criticized here, and thereupon the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. PADGETT], the gentleman from Tennessee, asked leave to withdraw the paragraph and it was withdrawn, he at the same time saying that he understood that the Pennsylvania Railroad was going to build this proposed line of track. I therefore object to its consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. Both the gentlemen from Wisconsin object, and the bill is ordered stricken from the calendar.

PUBLIC-BUILDING SITE AT FARIBAULT, MINN.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3332) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey certain land to the city of Faribault, Minn.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to sell to the city of Faribault, Minn., at a proper price and upon such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States, that portion of the Federal building site in said city described as follows: The west 16 feet of lots 1 and 2 of block 46, of the original town (now city) of Faribault, Minn., for public alley purposes; to convey said land to said city by the usual quitclaim deed, and to deposit the proceeds of such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STAFFORD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAYMENT FOR LEGAL SERVICES RENDERED TO THE CREEK NATION.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 906) making an appropriation to Stuart, Lewis, Gordon & Rutherford in payment of legal services rendered by them to the Creek Nation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman reserve his right to object for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman agree that the bill go to the foot of the calendar?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice and go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks to pass the bill without prejudice and same to go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BRIDGE ACROSS MAHONING RIVER, OHIO.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10021) granting the consent of Congress to the county commissioners of Trumbull County, Ohio, to construct, operate, and maintain a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county commissioners of Trumbull County, Ohio, to construct, maintain, and operate, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mahoning River, near the city of Niles, in the township of Weathersfield, in the county of Trumbull, State of Ohio, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 4, insert a new section, section 2, as follows:
"That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE TENNESSEE RIVER NEAR LOUDON, TENN.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10818) to authorize the county of Loudon, in the State of Tennessee, to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River near Loudon, Tenn.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is sick and sent the Chair word that he would like to have this bill passed without prejudice.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Does that take it to the foot of the calendar?

Mr. STAFFORD. In view of the circumstances, I do not think it would, the gentleman from Tennessee being ill.

APPEALS FROM DECISIONS OF BOARDS OF LOCAL INSPECTORS OF VESSELS.

The next business in order on the Unanimous Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1544) to provide for appeals from decisions of boards of local inspectors of steam vessels, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think some explanation should be made as to the purpose to be accomplished by this bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the language of this bill in the form in which it was reported from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries is identical, I think, with the bill that passed the House in the last Congress but failed to pass the Senate. It was framed with a view of meeting conditions growing out of the Eastland disaster. Under existing law there is no appeal provided by law from the decision of local inspectors. This bill does no more than provide that appeal may be made either by officers named or by some one directly interested from the local inspector to the supervising inspector and from the supervising inspector to the Supervising Inspector General, and it is better to enforce our navigation laws and fix the responsibility to the public of those who may be negligent in the discharge of their duties and jeopardize or cause the loss of human life and at the same time protect those who may be unjustly convicted of an offense by providing for appeal. On page 3 of the report the Secretary of Commerce sets out a number of cases where there were accidents and where the masters of the vessels were convicted before the board of local inspectors but punished nominally, although the offense was very grave, and yet there was no appeal from their decision.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, do I understand this permits the Department of Commerce to appeal also from the decision of its own inspectors?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. Now, it says:

That whenever any person directly interested in or affected by any decision or action by any board of local inspectors of vessels shall feel aggrieved by such decision or action he may appeal therefrom to the supervising inspector of the district, and a like appeal shall be allowed from any decision or action of a supervising inspector to the Supervising Inspector General, whose decision, when approved by the Secretary of Commerce, shall be final.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I noticed the language to which the gentleman has directed my attention, but the gentleman cited cases where accidents had occurred or disasters and parties in charge of vessels had had the case investigated by local boards of inspectors and the sentence inflicted was very light, although the offense was great.

Now, if this bill becomes a law, as I read that language, the navigation department of the Department of Commerce——

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Steamboat Inspection Service.

Mr. WALSH. The Steamboat-Inspection Service could not appeal from that decision, with a view of having the case reviewed and a more severe penalty being imposed.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I call the gentleman's attention to the second section, that says:

That whenever there shall be a disagreement between the local inspectors in regard to any matter before them for decision they shall report the case to the supervising inspector of the district, who shall investigate and decide the same; and any supervising inspector may within 30 days thereafter, upon his own motion, review any decision or action of any board of local inspectors within his district, and in like manner the Supervising Inspector General may within 30 days thereafter review any decision or action of any supervising inspector or board of local inspectors, and the decision of the Supervising Inspector General in such case shall, when approved by the Secretary of Commerce, be final.

Mr. WALSH. That is only in case there is a dissenting opinion, so to speak, filed by one of the local inspectors.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not only where there is a difference of opinion, but from any decision of the local inspectors.

Mr. WALSH. Now, there may be cases, and are cases, I have no doubt, where the local inspectors impose nominal penalties upon persons who are responsible for accidents, and it is done unanimously, and yet something may occur later to show that a more severe penalty should have been imposed. The only way it can be imposed, if this bill should become a law, is in case there is a disagreement between the local inspectors. Now, does not the gentleman think, with this measure, which is urged to perfect the navigation laws, with the right of review on the part of the Steamboat-Inspection Service of the Department of Commerce, that they ought to have the right to reopen and investigate these cases without the necessity of their being a disagreement amongst the local inspectors?

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the language will do that. I call the gentleman's attention to the language beginning in line 13 on page 2:

Any supervising inspector may within 30 days thereafter, upon his own motion, review any decision or action of any board of local inspectors within his district.

That is so, whether it is a unanimous or divided opinion.

Mr. WALSH. That seems to be hooked up with the early part of the section.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And then again it says:

The Supervising Inspector General may within 30 days thereafter review any decision or action of any supervising inspector or board of local inspectors.

Mr. WALSH. That all seems to be hooked up with the first part of the section.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to call attention to the fact that it is upon his own motion.

Mr. LEHLBACH. There are two propositions. One is that in case of disagreement they shall report it. And it goes on to say that on his own motion the supervising inspector may.

Mr. WALSH. The language is clear, I will admit, but it is hooked up with the earlier part of the section by a semicolon, and it would seem to depend upon the disagreement.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think it is quite clear that the supervising inspector in the first instance, and later on the Supervising Inspector General, on his own motion, may review any action of the local inspectors. The Supervising Inspector General may review any decision or action of the supervising inspector or board of local inspectors.

Mr. HARDY. The purpose of the framing of the language in the form in which it is was to make it absolutely compulsory that if there was a division it should go up to higher authority. If there was no division, still the right of review existed in the higher authority.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, there would be no question——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Still further reserving the right to object, if this was started out as a new sentence then it would be clearer.

Mr. HARDY. The committee had it in mind, and they thought the semicolon would be sufficient to distinguish between the two.

Mr. WALSH. In view of the explanation of the gentlemen of the committee, who have given this careful attention, and in view of the great importance of the measure, I am willing to waive any doubt for the present I have as to the language, and I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1544) to provide for appeals from decisions of boards of local inspectors of steam vessels, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any person pecuniarily interested in any decision or action of any board of local inspectors of steam vessels shall feel himself aggrieved by such decision or action, he may appeal therefrom to the supervising inspector of the district, and a like appeal shall be allowed from any decision or action of a supervising inspector to the Supervising Inspector General, whose decision, when approved by the Secretary of Commerce, shall be final: Provided, however, That application for such reexamination of the case by a supervising inspector or by the Supervising Inspector General shall be made within 30 days after the decision or action appealed from shall have been rendered or taken: And provided further, That in all cases reviewed under the provisions of this act where the issue is the suspension or revocation of the license of a licensed officer, such officer shall be allowed to be represented by counsel and to testify in his own behalf.

SEC. 2. That whenever there shall be a disagreement between the local inspectors in regard to any matter before them for decision, they shall report the case to the supervising inspector of the district, who shall investigate and decide the same, and any supervising inspector may, upon his own motion, review any decision or action of any board of local inspectors within his district, and in like manner the Supervising Inspector General may review any decision or action of any supervising inspector or board of local inspectors, and the decision of the Supervising Inspector General in such case shall, when approved by the Secretary of Commerce, be final.

SEC. 3. That any decision or action reviewed by the Supervising Inspector General or by any supervising inspector, as provided in section 1 of this act, may be revoked, changed, or modified by such reviewing officer, who shall have power to administer oaths, and to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses by a similar process as in the district courts of the United States; and the disbursing clerk, Department of Commerce, shall pay, on properly certified vouchers, such fees to any witness, so summoned, for his actual travel and attendance, as shall be officially certified to by the officer reviewing the case, not exceeding the rate allowed for fees to witnesses for travel and attendance in the district courts of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Commerce shall make such regulations as may be necessary to secure a proper enforcement of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That section 4452 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by section 6 of the act of March 3, 1905, is hereby repealed.

Also, the following committee amendments were read:

Amend, line 3, page 1, by striking out the word "pecuniarily" and inserting in lieu of the same the word "directly"; and after the word "in" insert the words "or affected by."

Amend, line 5, page 1, by striking out the word "himself."

Amend, line 7, page 1, by striking out the comma and inserting a semicolon after the word "district."

Amend, line 6, page 2, by striking out the comma after the word "officer."

Amend, line 11, page 2, by striking out the comma after the word "decision."

Amend, line 13, page 2, by striking out the comma after the word "same" and insert in lieu of the same a semicolon; and by striking out the comma after the word "may" and inserting thereafter the words "within 30 days thereafter."

Amend, line 15, page 2, by striking out the comma after the word "district."

Amend, line 17, page 2, by inserting after the word "may" the words "within 30 days thereafter."

Amend, line 24, page 2, by striking out the word "section" and inserting in lieu of the same the word "sections"; and after the word "one" insert the words "and two."

Amend, line 11, page 3, by striking out the comma after the word "oaths."

Amend, line 5, page 3, by striking out the comma after the word "witness" and by striking out the comma after the word "summoned."

Amend, line 5, page 3, by striking out the comma after the word "attendance."

Mr. WALSH. In reporting this amendment on page 2, line 13, the Clerk reported striking out the comma. There has been inserted there a semicolon, which, I assume, is the committee amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The comma is stricken out and the semicolon placed there.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman just yield for a moment? I wish to ask his attention to the point raised a moment ago. Will the gentleman state when this 30 days begins to run or expire? It says:

And any supervising inspector may within 30 days thereafter.

Does that mean 30 days after they have reported the case to the supervising inspector of the district, or does it mean 30 days after they have investigated and decided the same?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is after any decision by the board of local inspectors. They report those decisions.

Mr. WALSH. Then, of course, if it is after any decision by the supervising inspector, it would seem to me that the contention which I raised earlier is correct, that the supervising inspector can only open these cases on his own motion in case there is a disagreement in the local board, because that is the only time that it is reported to the supervising inspector.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; they are reported, as I understand.

Mr. WALSH. I know; but it is the only time it is reported, when there is investigation and further report.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The decisions of the local inspectors, in any event, whether there is a disagreement or not, are reported to the supervising inspector.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but the gentleman says that the 30 days begins after the supervising inspector has investigated and reported the case, as the result of the disagreement by the local board.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Of course, every decision calls for an investigation, but it is after the decision of the local board.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the gentleman is correct there.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is our intent. I think it is clear.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the gentleman to say it was 30 days after the investigation and decision of the supervising inspector of the district, then after the decision the supervising inspector of the district might reopen it on his own motion.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is no appeal under the existing law from the decision of the local inspectors, and now we have undertaken to make it so. Not only in a case where there is a disagreement may their action be reviewed but also when they are in agreement. When the decision of the local inspectors is reported to the supervising inspector he may review that decision and reverse it if he thinks the facts warrant it, and although he may affirm it the Supervising Inspector General may himself review and reverse that decision. The purpose is to place the responsibility all along the line, from the Supervising Inspector General down to the local inspector, to avoid just such accidents as the Eastland disaster.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I think it is important that we should do what the committee intends. Will the gentleman tell me when the "30 days thereafter" begins, that is set forth in line 17?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It reads, "may within 30 days thereafter review any decision or any action of any supervising inspector or board of local inspectors." He does not have to wait for the action of the supervising inspector of the district. He may review the action of the local inspectors himself.

Mr. WALSH. Yes. But when does that 30 days expire?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Either after the decision of the local board of inspectors or in the other instance after the decision by the supervising inspector.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give me five minutes more?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a suggestion?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I think there is a little misapprehension. I do not think the local inspectors make reports to the supervising inspector of the district of all their decisions. They make their decision, and it stands unless there is a division. If there is a division they are by this law required to report their action to the district supervising inspector. If not, their decision stands. But under this bill any supervisor can visit all these local boards and review all their decisions.

He can take it up on his own motion any time within 30 days after the rendering of any decision by the local board. Whether there is a division or not, the supervising inspector has the right to do it.

There are three different conditions provided for. One is where there is a division. In that case, they are required to report to the supervising inspector of the district. Then, if there is no division and the decision is unanimous, the district supervising inspector has the right of his own motion to review the decision and action of the local board. And, again, the Supervising Inspector General may, within 30 days thereafter, review any decision or action of the district supervising inspector. So that it provides for the taking up of these decisions, whether they are done by unanimous agreement or not, first by the supervising inspector of the district, and then, if the inspector general is dissatisfied with that, he goes on on his own motion. There is not much formality of appeal or report. This bill was intended to give to the supervising inspector of the district the right to go into the action of these local boards and see what they were doing and investigate and examine any decisions they might make.

Mr. WALSH. And a like right is given to the Inspector General?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The point I make here is that under the language of the section, as framed, any supervising inspector may, within 30 days thereafter——

Mr. HARDY. What does that "thereafter" mean? "Upon his own motion he may review any decision or action of the board." Take that sentence by itself. "Any supervising inspector may within 30 days thereafter upon his own motion review any decision or action of any board of local inspectors within his district." We were attempting to make this grammatically correct and at the same time not very much alter the language that came to us from the Senate and also the language that was incorporated in the bill that the House passed last session and that went to the Senate and died by inaction there. I do not see but that "thereafter" can refer to but one predicate. It refers to any decision or action of the local board of inspectors.

Mr. WALSH. But it says when they are divided they shall report the case to the supervising inspector of the district, who shall investigate and decide the same; and then it says, "Any supervising inspector may within 30 days thereafter." Now, the natural inference given to that language would be that it would be 30 days after this supervising inspector had investigated and decided the case.

Mr. HARDY. I am as anxious as the gentleman from Massachusetts is to get it perfectly clear, and if we can find any words that will relieve any doubt, I shall be glad to adopt them.

Mr. WALSH. I do not desire to delay the passage of this important measure for the purpose of putting in any language which I propose. I do want to get the opinion of the members of the committee as to whether or not this language is susceptible of the meaning which they intend to convey, and if it would not be clearer to change the semicolon into a period and strike out the word "and" and capitalize the word "any" in line 13.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HARDY. I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes longer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. Why not eliminate the period and semicolon and put an end to this controversy?

Mr. HARDY. I am trying to find what will make it clearer than it is. I think it might be made to read:

And any supervising inspector may, upon his own motion, review any decision or action of any board of local inspectors within his district within 30 days after the same is rendered or taken.

Mr. WALSH. Of course there would not be any doubt about that language.

Mr. HARDY. If he will offer that amendment we will accept it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee amendments are first in order.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to offer this amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment when it is reached.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 1, line 3, strike out the word "pecuniarily" and insert in lieu thereof the word "directly."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, at the beginning of the line insert the words "or affected by."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all the committee amendments except the one in lines 13 and 14, on page 2, be acted upon in gross.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all the committee amendments to the bill, with the exception of the one in lines 13 and 14, on page 2, be agreed to in gross. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The other committee amendments were agreed to, as follows:

Page 1, line 4, insert "or affected by."

Amend, line 5, page 1, by striking out the word "himself."

Amend, line 7, page 1, by striking out the comma and inserting a semicolon after the word "district."

Amend, line 3, page 2, by striking out the comma after the word "officer."

Amend, line 8, page 2, by striking out the comma after the word "decision."

Amend, line 10, page 2, by striking out the comma after the word "same" and insert in lieu of the same a semicolon; and by striking out the comma after the word "may" and inserting thereafter the words "within 30 days thereafter."

Amend, line 12, page 2, by striking out the comma after the word "district."

Amend, line 20, page 2, by striking out the word "section" and inserting in lieu of the same the word "sections"; and after the word "one" insert the words "and two."

Amend, line 22, page 2, by striking out the comma after the word "oaths."

Amend, line 1, page 3, by striking out the comma after the word "witness"; and by striking out the comma after the word "summoned."

Amend, line 2, page 3, by striking out the comma after the word "attendance."

Mr. WALSH. Now, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: On page 2, in line 13, strike out the semicolon and insert a period. Strike out the word "and" following the period and capitalize the word "any"; and then strike out the words in that line and in line 14, "within 30 days thereafter"; and after the word "district," in line 15, insert "within 30 days after the said decision or action has been rendered or taken," so that the language will read as follows:

Any supervising inspector may upon his own motion review any decision or action of any board of local inspectors within his district within 30 days after the said decision or action has been rendered or taken.

Mr. HARDY. Let me suggest to the gentleman that if he strikes out the semicolon, inserts a period, strikes out the word "and," and puts in a capital "A" for the word "any" the sentence will be plain. Then it could not refer back to the question of the report and would be perfectly clear. We will make no objection to it.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will offer that as a substitute for my amendment, I will accept it.

Mr. HARDY. I offer as a substitute instead of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, to strike out the semicolon after the word "same" and insert a period, strike out the word "and," and then begin the word "any" with a capital "A," so that it will read:

Any supervising inspector may, within 30 days thereafter, upon his own motion, review any decision or action of any board of local inspectors within his district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDY: Page 2, line 13, after the word "same," strike out the semicolon and insert in lieu thereof a period. Strike out the word "and" and capitalize the letter "A" in "any."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I will accept that substitute for the amendment which I offered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the gentleman from Massachusetts offered a substitute for the committee amendment. Now, he suggests that the gentleman from Texas offer a substitute for his substitute. I do not know of any parliamentary rule which makes that in order.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his amendment. The question is on the amendment which has been reported by the Clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "An act to provide for appeals from decisions of boards of local inspectors of vessels, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE IN HAWAII.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 2380) granting to the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii additional powers relative to elections and qualification of electors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Miss RANKIN. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is the lady from Montana opposed to this bill?

Miss RANKIN. No; I am in favor of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize somebody who is opposed to it, if there is anybody, in accordance with the rule; otherwise the Chair will recognize the lady from Montana.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is entitled to 20 minutes and the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this bill passed the Senate on September 13, 1917, unanimously. I want to state that hearings on this bill were had before the Committee on Woman Suffrage of the House. A number of parties appeared, particularly Mrs. Benjamin F. Pittman, of Boston, who has been in Hawaii and is familiar with the situation there; also Mrs. Maud Wood Park, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, and others.

After such hearings and full consideration by the committee the bill was reported out of the committee unanimously. There was and is no opposition in the committee to the bill. It simply gives the Hawaiian Legislature the power and the right to enact a law, if they see fit, or they may submit it to the citizens by the way of referendum, to say whether or not female suffrage shall be granted to the women of Hawaii. At this time I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, what is the use of reprinting this report?

Mr. RAKER. Because it is valuable and there is no other way of getting it into the RECORD. It contains valuable statements.

Mr. WALSH. The statements of Mrs. Maud Wood Park and Dr. Anna Howard Shaw and Mrs. Benjamin F. Pittman?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; and I think the statement of Mrs. Pittman is remarkable.

Mr. WALSH. Those statements are printed in full in the report, and it is a little unusual to reprint the reports in the RECORD.

Mr. RAKER. I was trying to save time instead of recapitulating them in my remarks. I want them to go to the House and to the country for the benefit of the country.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the gentleman ought to reprint the reports in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. Was the Delegate from the Hawaiian Islands in favor of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; he wrote a letter to me personally and asked a meeting of the committee, and he sent a written statement, as he was called away on a subpœna to testify as a witness in an important case in Hawaii and could not be personally present.

Mr. GARNER. And the Delegate is in favor of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. He is not only in favor of it but he is anxious for its passage.

Under the organic act creating the Territory of Hawaii suffrage was confined to male citizens. This bill proposes to vest in the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii the "power to provide that in all elections authorized to be held by the organic act of the Territory of Hawaii female citizens possessing the same qualifications as male citizens shall be entitled to vote."

The bill also provides that the legislature "is further hereby vested with the power to have submitted to the voters of the Territory of Hawaii the question of whether or not the female citizens of the Territory shall be empowered to vote at elections held under the laws of the Territory of Hawaii." The proposal comes to the Congress of the United States from the people of Hawaii through the action of their Territorial legislature.

The measure is favored by both political parties of the islands, and there is indicated a large measure of popular interest in the granting of suffrage to the women of the Territory.

Since the organic law can only be changed by an act of Congress, the power necessary to make the needful changes so as to allow women to take part with men in the exercise of suffrage is by the bill vested in the Legislature of Hawaii, which can either of its own motion grant the rights of equal suffrage to all its citizens, subject to the other limitations of the organic act, or can provide for a referendum on the subject, or can do both. This statement of the facts of the case relieves the question from the suggestion that the Congress of the United States is forcing upon the people of the Territory of Hawaii a suffrage system which may be unwelcome to them. The request comes in the form of a petition from the representative body of the Territory, and further provision is made for a referendum vote. All that Congress is asked to do is to permit the legislature to grant the privilege of equal suffrage to the women of the Territory in the discretion of the legislative body itself.

The question of equal suffrage for the territory of Hawaii should be disassociated from the question as it affects the United States of America. Nevertheless it is pertinent to observe that the alternative method here recommended empowering the legislature to grant equal suffrage or submitting the matter to a referendum of the people are methods already in force in the States of the Union.

During the present year the Legislatures of North Dakota, Ohio, Rhode Island, Michigan, Nebraska, and Indiana have voted to grant presidential suffrage to the women of these States, while in Maine, Iowa, South Dakota, and Oklahoma the legislatures have referred the question of woman suffrage to the people.

Congress simply grants in this bill to the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii the power granted the State legislatures in the various State constitutions and by Congress in acts granting Territorial government. Porto Rico was granted that power in the recent bill providing for civil government in that island.

It is also proper to observe that the cause of woman suffrage has been tremendously advanced on account of the war conditions which now prevail over so large a part of the world. The women of England, for example, patriotically enlisting in every form of service except that of actual combat on the fields of battle, have so deeply impressed members of Parliament that this long-deferred measure of justice has recently passed the House of Commons by an overwhelming majority. It then passed the House of Lords, and was approved by the King. The women of England now have full rights of suffrage, for which they have been struggling for so many years.

In other parts of the British Empire, in Australia, New Zealand, the six Provinces of Canada, and British Columbia, women possess equal rights with men; while in India, Burma, and British Honduras women have been granted municipal suffrage by the British Parliament. Finland, Norway, Denmark, and Iceland have granted equal suffrage, and Sweden every suffrage right except the vote for Parliament. Republican France has pledged to extend municipal suffrage to women in the immediate future. One of the States of Mexico, Yucatan, has granted suffrage to its women. As Mr. Asquith recently remarked:

"I no longer regard this question from the standpoint we occupied before the war. Women have worked out their own salvation. I am ready to give them the vote."

It has been deemed advisable to remove the source of discontent and disunion by rewarding the tremendous share of women in the labors and sacrifices incident to a state of war.

An act of Congress, therefore, empowering the Legislature of Hawaii to remove one restriction of the organic act or to submit the question to a referendum of the voters will be in line with many precedents that have been established during the period of the great war.

Ever since Jefferson declared as the foundation of our liberties the principle that "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," it has become apparent that equal suffrage is inevitable not only in America but throughout the world.

It is worthy of note that the House of Representatives on January 10, 1918, by the constitutional two-thirds vote passed H. J. Res. 200.

The premier of Italy, last week, said that he feels the time has come for the extension of full suffrage to the women of Italy, and that he trusts that the Italian Parliament will immediately pass the measure granting woman suffrage in Italy.

Within the last two months the great Lone Star State of Texas has given primary suffrage to the women of Texas. The bill should pass without a dissenting vote.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that everyone in the House who voted for woman suffrage on January 10 last is in favor of this bill. It merely gives the Legislature of Hawaii the right to decide whether or not they shall give woman suffrage to the women of Hawaii, or submit it to the voters. I believe that the women in Hawaii are just as anxious for another step in democracy as are the women all over America and every country in the world. We are fighting this war for democracy, and democracy does not come in any one step; it comes by all the people taking the steps that are before them, and this is one of the steps toward a fuller democracy. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 3547, with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3547) to extend the provisions of the pension act of May 11, 1912, to the officers and enlisted men of all State militia and other State organizations that rendered service to the Union cause during the Civil War for a period of 90 days or more, and providing pensions for their widows, minor children, and dependent parents, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted etc., That the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers, who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912, be and the same are hereby extended to include any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army, serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State, or as a member of any other State organization, under orders of an officer of the United States, or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States, and who actually rendered a service of 90 days or more in any of the said military organizations during said war, and who were honorably discharged therefrom or otherwise honorably relieved from duty under the order of proper military authority.

SEC. 2. That the widows, minor children, and dependent parents of those provided for in section 1 of this act shall be entitled to the same pensions as are now provided by law for the widows, minor children, and dependent parents of the soldiers who were in the regular service during the Civil War.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe rules and regulations governing the character of evidence necessary to prove the service herein set forth: Provided, That a certificate of the adjutant general of the State to which the military organizations belonged, showing the date of honorable discharge therefrom, shall be accepted in lieu of the honorable discharge required by the provisions of the act referred to in section 1: And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to the case of any person wherein the evidence discloses any fact that would have barred him from an honorable discharge had he been in the military service of the United States.

SEC. 4. That title to pension under this act shall commence from the date of filing application therefor in the Bureau of Pensions after the passage and approval of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. STAFFORD. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. From what I have heard of it I think I shall be, although I am not positive.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin to 20 minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to very briefly state the purpose of this bill. This is the second time that this bill has been reported to the House by the unanimous vote of the Invalid Pensions Committee. When it was reported to the House before, for some reason we were not able to get it up for consideration. By this bill we hope to do to-day what ought to have been done, in my opinion, many years ago; that is, to recognize and to pension the State troops who rendered the same services in defense of the Government during the Civil War that was rendered by the Regular troops, all of whom have long since been granted pensions. I can speak with more information about Missouri troops, because I have given them more attention, but there were State militia in Kentucky, Indiana, and other States that rendered the same character of service. The Missouri Militia was recognized by President Lincoln as a part of his army, and he asked the governor of that State not to disband the militia, because they were rendering a service which, if they were discontinued, would compel him to send his Regular troops to take their places. It is true that the State of Missouri paid its militia during the Civil War, but after the war was over Congress reimbursed the State for every dollar that it had paid out to sustain its militia. They fought side by side with the Regular troops. Some of them were wounded and many of them were killed in the battles that were fought in defense of the Union at that time. They fought with Government arms and ammunition, lived upon Government provisions, and were commanded by Federal officers.

Mr. LANGLEY. And if the gentleman will permit me to suggest, the troops of Kentucky and some of the other States did the same thing.

Mr. RUSSELL. Kentucky's militia was in exactly the same attitude. She had some State troops that rendered similar service, sometimes for six months and sometimes for a year, fighting side by side with the Regular troops in the battles of the Civil War, using the ammunition of the Government, and fighting under the command of Federal officers. After the war was over Congress returned to Kentucky, as it did to Missouri, every dollar paid out by that State to sustain the militia during the war.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WALSH. What are the other States that are interested? I notice from the report that Kentucky and Missouri are mentioned, and other States, and on page 2 mention is made of Indiana and Pennsylvania.

Mr. RUSSELL. There are four States that will have the principal part of men who will be benefited by this legislation—Missouri, Indiana, Kentucky, and Pennsylvania. There were some in Kansas, I think some in Arkansas, and perhaps some in Nebraska.

Mr. LANGLEY. And also in West Virginia.

Mr. RUSSELL. And some in West Virginia.

Mr. WALSH. How much will these various companies from these various States add to the pension rolls?

Mr. RUSSELL. It will be very slight, because there were very few in those States, even during the war, and nearly all of them have died. I think the estimate in the report of the probable expense of this bill is far beyond what will be true. It is stated that Missouri would probably add 5,000 soldiers to the rolls. I do not believe there are 2,000 of these militiamen alive to-day, and the few left are old and feeble. A great many of them afterwards went into the regular service, and that diminished the number; they are getting pensions now, and four-fifths of the balance of them have died. This was the best estimate that I have been able to get from the adjutant generals of the several States. I do not believe the bill, if passed, will cost the Government $3,000,000 the first year, and the amount will rapidly decrease as the old soldiers pass away.

Mr. WALSH. Have some of these been pensioned under special acts of Congress?

Mr. RUSSELL. None of them, unless they were wounded in battle. We have tried in some cases to get through special bills, and while some of them have passed in the House they have usually, if not always, been defeated in the Senate.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; I will.

Mr. FESS. I am ignorant of the facts in the case, but how does it come that the other States are not in the same situation as the four mentioned?

Mr. RUSSELL. The chief part of the State troops were in the border States that did not secede, such as Kentucky and Missouri. There were a few State troops raised in some of the other States; but the great body of these troops were in Kentucky and Missouri, the two border States during the war, and they fought with the Union troops, and were paid by the States at the time; but Congress has paid back the money, recognizing that they rendered necessary and valuable services for the Union.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. Just for a moment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It may enlighten the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to state that the troops from Indiana that are included in this bill served principally in resisting the Morgan raid and they saved Cincinnati, the One hundred and eighth Indiana especially. I know that regiment was intrenched under command of Gen. Lew Wallace at the time that the Morgan raid was threatening the States.

Mr. LANGLEY. They rendered a valuable service.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have set out here in the report documents which I wish the Members would read, letters and orders written and signed by President Lincoln, saying that the Missouri Militia was a valuable part of his Army and that they were rendering an important and a beneficial service.

Mr. FESS. Could the gentleman tell me who were the Squirrel Hunters in connection with the Civil War?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; I do not know.

Mr. LANGLEY. Those are organizations, I think, drawn in the service.

Mr. RUSSELL. This bill does not include anybody except State troops who fought during the Civil War to put down the rebellion in cooperation with Federal troops and under the command of Federal officers. In Missouri our militia were commanded for a time by Gen. Schofield, a Federal officer.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, the designation, I think, applies to the group that defended Cincinnati on the occasion of the Morgan riot, and I wondered whether that was a Federal or a State organization.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I taken?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Were they not troops that enlisted for service for 100 days?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used eight minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. How much time does he wish?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want about three or four minutes after some one who is opposed to the bill has used some time. Let the gentleman reserve the remainder of his time.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think we are going rather fast at this time when we are so pressed for revenue to consider a bill that has been rejected in prior Congresses to pension not only the soldiers of those who were connected with the State militia, but also their widows and children. Obviously this very proposal has met with opposition in the Senate, otherwise the special bills included in the omnibus pension bills which have gone to the Senate to pension soldiers connected with State militia who had performed real service in real battle would have passed. This bill seeks to open up the floodgates of the Treasury to State militia organizations whether they saw service or not.

Mr. LANGLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is that limitation?

Mr. LANGLEY. He must have rendered actual service for 90 days.

Mr. STAFFORD. Just like the home guards to-day are rendering actual service in the present emergency by police duty. This bill is not limited to those who smelled powder and really saw actual fighting. There may be instances where there were State militiamen who were identified with actual fighting, but there is no such limitation in this bill. Furthermore, there is nothing in this bill that prevents claim agents from obtaining returns. Who knows—I do not know—but who knows there may not have been and have been for years a lobby seeking to have this bill passed, with large fees to come as a result of it——

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield, in fairness, of course, to the gentleman from Missouri after that statement.

Mr. RUSSELL. This is an amendment to the Sherwood bill, and it provides that attorneys can not get any fees, and this appropriates that as a part of the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will stand corrected as to that, and I am glad the gentleman corrected me.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. IGOE. As I understand the bill, it is limited to those soldiers who served under Federal officers armed and equipped by the——

Mr. STAFFORD. I know Missouri is interested in this; and if we may establish this precedent, and especially now, when the Treasury is in such need of funds, why, we will have the precedent also for the home guards after this great war is over. They, too, will claim to have a pensionable status. I think of all times this bill should not be now considered. We have heard from time to time—at least, I have—of the pressure brought by Missouri Representatives for giving the Missouri militia a pensionable status. The Senate of the United States, from the admission of the gentleman from Missouri, has refused to recognize that they were entitled to any pensionable status.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. The reason the Senate has refused is that it says that it ought to be done in a general bill; that is the reason.

Mr. LANGLEY. The Senate took the position there ought to be general legislation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe, so far as I am concerned, there ought to be special legislation which applies only to those who saw real service.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman know most of those men were in a large number of small, hot, bitter fights in Missouri, and were fighting all over the State?

Mr. STAFFORD. There might have been local engagements.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They were local engagements, and they were for blood, too.

Mr. FARR. In Pennsylvania they were engaged in bitter fights.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska to speak for the home guards of that State.

Mr. KINKAID. Does the gentleman know that the survivors of these militiamen who fought in the Civil War are not now confined to the States they were chosen from, but are scattered over the States of the Union?

Mr. STAFFORD. Why did not they join the Federal forces in the regular way? Why did they stay back at home and why did not they yield themselves to command of the military authorities to defend the Union just as to-day those connected with the National Army are yielding themselves for the national purpose? They were under the State militia to do home duty as home guards are now doing. I reserve the remainder of my time. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used five minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, it is too late to talk about taking money out of the Treasury to pay for wars. This is to pay for a war that is past, a debt that has long been due to soldiers in the service of the United States in the sixties. Few rendered better service to the country than did the men who are included within the provisions of this bill. They were from Missouri, they were from Kansas, they were from Nebraska, they were from New York, Pennsylvania, and from many other States of the Union. They fought in some of the hardest-fought battles of the war, including Gettysburg. Why has not this thing been done before? Simply because the legislation was attempted by special bills. It was said, "Why do you not include them all in one bill?" No one can explain why this was not done. It is just a question of rendering justice to men who performed a great service to their country. Men from Kansas went to Missouri, fought down in Arkansas; they remained in the service until the war was over. They did not take the time to enlist in the regular service. They were not thinking about the organization they were with. They were thinking about rendering service to the country at the time, and they were taking no chances on anything except rendering the quickest and best service they could to their country. It is the purpose of this bill to give them a pensionable status. They rendered exactly the same kind of service in the field as the men they fought side by side with. They fought under Union commanders and beside the men in the regular service who have been pensioned for years. I know some of them. I always thought they had been in the regular service. They belong to the Grand Army of the Republic. They have suffered every hardship that any other soldier suffered——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have in mind an old man, about 80 years of age now, who had 250 days of actual service during the Civil War in Missouri, and yet he has no pensionable status.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have one in my home town who served in Missouri, and a better citizen never lived anywhere, and until he became old a few years ago he never suggested such a thing as a pension. I introduced a special bill for him, but it could not pass, because the committees of Congress said that they wanted to include him along with all the other men who served in similar organizations. And so it is. The only way to do justice to these men is to pass this bill, and I sincerely hope that further objection on the ground that it takes money out of the Treasury will not be made. These men have this due them, not as a gratuity, but as a matter of absolute justice. We agreed to provide for them just as we agreed to provide for the others who fought the battles of that great war. They were included among those whom Lincoln said at the close of the war should be provided for, as well as their dependents.

Mr. WALSH. When was that agreement made?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. When Lincoln said that those who fought the battles of the war, and their dependents, should be taken care of in their declining years.

Mr. WALSH. He did not refer to the militia.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He referred to those who fought the battles of the war.

Mr. WALSH. He referred to those who were in the Federal service.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He did not confine his statement to the regular troops and recognized all who fought in the battles of the war, without regard to where they came from or the organization in which they served. I hope this bill will pass. It does justice long delayed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, it is not a popular thing to-day to refuse or decline approval of pension legislation which attempts to do justice to those who in the troublesome days of 1861 engaged in defending various sections of this country. But I submit that after the great Commonwealth of Missouri has received from the Federal Treasury at least the sum of $7,456,000 in one payment and various other payments from time to time, for the use of its militia in doing guard duty or repelling invasion, or engaging in skirmishes within its borders or across the borders, for the protection of its own homes and firesides, that the State of Missouri is in a position to do something for these men. The report here does not set forth whether it has ever attempted to come to their relief or make provision for them or not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, does the gentleman know that this sum of $7,000,000 and these other odd sums were given to Missouri to recoup that State for money that it actually spent in fitting those troops, and arming them, and in giving them uniforms? It was not in the nature of a compensation. It was paying back the money that the State of Missouri patriotically put into the war because it could not get the Federal administration out there to put in enough.

Mr. WALSH. This sum was paid to reimburse the State on account of money expended, and then there were various other sums paid to the State of Missouri to reimburse it. But we have not heard of the other States where the State militia went into the Union service and faced the enemy being paid or reimbursed. The truth is that there are three or four States—Indiana, Pennsylvania, Kansas, Kentucky, and Missouri—that are known. Some other States are referred to, but no statistics are given, whose troops did valuable service. There is no question about their repelling invasion perhaps, and about their defending the States, and if facing the enemy in actual service they deserve consideration. But they were not part of the Regular Army, and I doubt whether the great Lincoln in his reference, at the close of the war, to what would be done for the people at the close of the war, contemplated making provision for militiamen who saw no fighting.

Now, a great many of them, of course, it will be said, did not come within the 90-day provision. But many who will come within that limitation did no actual fighting. They simply comprised a home guard and were not fighting men in the true sense.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. RUSSELL. Would the gentleman let me read just about two lines from this report, instead of answering the question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. This is what President Lincoln said at the conclusion of his remarks when the Government was about to disband the militia. He said:

I, therefore, as at present advised, can not attempt the destruction of the enrolled militia in Missouri.

That was after stating their valuable service.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Missouri if there is not a precedent for the payment of this money, at least a precedent embodying the principle contained in this bill? Some years ago I recall distinctly that Congress passed a bill reimbursing the State of Pennsylvania for money which it paid, or which it had reimbursed to the business men of Philadelphia, for money which they had paid to the militiamen of Pennsylvania who went down to help Meade in that battle.

Mr. RUSSELL. They returned the money, you know, to Kentucky and to Missouri; money advanced to sustain these militiamen. Congress reimbursed them for the money on the ground that they had rendered a Federal service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me three or four minutes more?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman four minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for four minutes more.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, of course Pennsylvania has been reimbursed, and Missouri has been reimbursed. I imagine that Indiana has also been reimbursed from the Federal Treasury, and possibly Kentucky. But it seems to me that before we embark upon this general legislation to make these militiamen the beneficiaries at this particular time we ought to know how much it is going to cost, and to know in such case that actual fighting service was rendered. Now, here is a report, voluminous, with many extracts, and conveying the information that legislation similar to this now proposed, not quite so general in character, has been attempted before and failed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. The first time this was attempted——

Mr. RUSSELL. Does not the gentleman think that those people who rendered that faithful service to this Government 55 years ago have waited long enough?

Mr. WALSH. Of course, that question can be asked with reference to any legislation in the nature of pension legislation. In fact, I think I may have asked the question myself of the gentleman as a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but it was in reference to volunteers who had served as a part of the Regular Establishment and who had not remained subject to the State call and only State jurisdiction and who were fighting. These volunteers, these militia, could have become a part of the Regular Establishment very easily. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] stated that they did not do it; they did not take the time to do it. Of course, they did not; they remained as a State militia, and they remained for the most part near their own firesides, and the character of the service which they rendered was local, and it was under State command, and some never saw the enemy.

Mr. FARR. The Pennsylvanians were not members of the State militia. They were called out on account of the invasion of Pennsylvania. A great many of them served at Gettysburg.

Mr. WALSH. What were they?

Mr. FARR. They were emergency men. They volunteered to protect the Union.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that the Pennsylvanians come under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. FARR. That is my understanding.

Mr. WALSH. They were not State militiamen.

Mr. RUSSELL. Any State organization that served for 90 days in cooperation with the Federal troops and under the command of Federal officers in putting down the rebellion will come under this bill.

Mr. WALSH. That would be within the provision of the amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. Of the bill also.

Mr. WALSH. The amendment opens the door still wider. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR] states that his troops were not State militia.

Mr. FARR. They were emergency men.

Mr. WALSH. He states that they were emergency men. By whom were they raised?

Mr. RUSSELL. By the governor of the State.

Mr. FARR. The governor of the State called for volunteers, because Pennsylvania was being invaded.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to ask the gentleman how he interprets the word "militia," for the simple reason that it has been suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR] that Pensylvania, during the invasion of that State, raised a large number of emergency men.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. I should like to have unanimous consent to speak for five minutes on this important question. We will get right down to where Pennsylvania stands, or ought to stand.

Mr. RUSSELL. This includes any State organization. If I had the time I would be glad to yield it to the gentleman.

Mr. FOCHT. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for this debate is limited.

Mr. FOCHT. I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time of this debate be extended 10 minutes, and that 5 minutes of that time be given to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] and 5 minutes to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of this debate be extended 10 minutes, 5 minutes to go to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I have demands for time in opposition that I can not meet. I ask unanimous consent to make it 15 minutes, giving those in favor of the proposition 10 minutes and those opposed to it 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to extending the time 15 minutes, 5 minutes to go to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that with the rapidity with which we are passing pension bills now I think the militia will be taken care of at this session, and the emergency men will probably be taken care of just before the next election.

Mr. FARR. They are included in this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. I yield first to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this bill ought to have been passed 50 years ago. [Applause.] If it had not been for the 111,000 men that Missouri sent to the Union Army, when that State had only 160,000 voters in 1860, and if it had not been for the 75,000 Kentuckians that Kentucky sent to the Union Army, the Confederate flag would be waving in Richmond this minute. Now, it is true that a good many of these men never went out of the State of Missouri, but they took the place of the men who did go. Missourians and Kentuckians did not need any great amount of drilling to know how to use a rifle or a double-barreled shotgun. They went from their homes and fought innumerable battles in Missouri, in squads, companies, regiments, brigades, and armies. Of course, Pennsylvania sent her emergency men to Gettysburg when Pennsylvania was invaded. Missouri was invaded every two or three months during those four years, and so was Kentucky, and some of those men fought the most bloody battles that were fought during the entire Civil War. They were shot to pieces; cut to pieces; they died. The State was overrun by both armies.

There is no prejudice left in the State of Missouri growing out of the Civil War; and I will tell you what happens: When a Union soldier writes to me to get him a pension or to get his pension increased, his Confederate neighbor writes a letter right along in the same mail asking that it be done. [Applause.]

Talk about these men not fighting! I will tell you what I saw with my own eyes when I was a small boy. I saw seven Kentucky home guards charge the whole of Morgan's cavalry—the flower of Kentucky chivalry—down a broad gravel road without any ambush about it. The Kentuckians and the Missourians would fight the devil. [Laughter and applause.]

There has always been a discrimination against the border State men. It was easy to be a Union man in Massachusetts, it was easy to be a Confederate in Mississippi, but in Kentucky and Missouri, in that border land, it was perilous to be either or to sit on the fence; a fellow had to feel of his topknot every morning to see if, like the flag of his country, it was still there. [Laughter.] It was father against son, brother against brother, neighbor against neighbor, and frequently husband against wife. If there ever was a set of men worthy and fit to be put on the pension roll, it is the Kentuckians and the Missourians. They followed Frank Blair, who did more than any other one man in the United States, except Abraham Lincoln, to save the Union. If monuments were built in this town to soldiers in proportion to the services they rendered, Blair's would tower among the tallest. He kept Missouri from seceding. That prevented Kentucky from seceding; and if you had given the 111,000 Union soldiers of Missouri and 75,000 from Kentucky, and those two great agricultural States to feed on, they never could have starved Lee's army into surrender. This bill ought to have been passed long ago. It has been frequently reported. Judge Henry W. Gibson, of Tennessee, offered in a bill like this to put them all on the pension roll, but they did not serve long enough. You had to have a length of service of 90 days. It was fixed accidentally. There was an entire battalion in my district that served 89 days, which shut them out of the general pension law. There is no man on the top of the earth with good sense enough—Solomon would not have had sense enough with his wonderful headpiece—to tell why a man who served 89 days ought not to be put on a pensionable basis as well as a man who had served 90 days. If the House wants to do justice long deferred, it ought to pass this bill with a whoop. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I fully realize the embarrassment of following the eloquent and distinguished Speaker, a statesman and logician. He has spoken well and with conviction with respect to the border States, and while Pennsylvania occupied a position of somewhat different relation from that of the border States, nevertheless the question of the invasion of Pennsylvania in 1863 by Gen. Lee and his army is interesting historically and of vast importance. The fact of the matter is that during the whole period from the outbreak of the war until after the battle of Gettysburg, nearly all of the conflicts and raids were within 50 or 75 miles of Washington. The reason for that was that the Union troops were massed about the Capital to protect it, always being in fear and apprehension that the Confederates would attack in force the Federal Capital.

Now, in relation to what was suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] as establishing a precedent for a bill like this: The business men of Philadelphia furnished the clothing for the emergency men of Pennsylvania who were called in 1863 by Abraham Lincoln through Gov. Curtin. The State of Pennsylvania later reimbursed the business men, paying them interest on their loan, and later the United States Government reimbursed Pennsylvania without interest on the loan. That is the way that came about and was concluded.

Now, as to the justice of this bill, the facts apply to Pennsylvania as elsewhere. But to these emergency men it does not apply, as I understand, since it relates to only militiamen who must have been in the service 90 days. A gentleman on this side in all generosity and spirit of chivalry and justice told me that he understood what I meant when I referred to the emergency men, and that just as certain as the men of Missouri and Kentucky or any other border State who served a week or a month or three months or longer are favorably regarded, so will all be considered as having been Federal soldiers and will come within the interpretation of the pension laws. Certainly, if Missouri and Kentucky militiamen are entitled to the consideration that will be given them in this bill, it should extend to the emergency men of Pennsylvania, who answered when Lee marched triumphantly up the great Cumberland Valley, creating alarm among the people lest the invasion of the State be extended to Harrisburg and Philadelphia. Thousands of emergency men answered the call and resisted the advance. My own father, a minister of the gospel, left the pulpit and went out with them, and by reason of exposure lost his life when I was a year old. I know that there were emergency men there who are entitled to consideration because they protected the State and to a great extent interfered with if they did not intercept a portion of Lee's army beyond the Susquehanna. Senator Daniels, a brave, chivalrous gentleman from Virginia, told me all about how he reached the Susquehanna River and there saw the bridge in flames, the torch having been applied by one of these emergency men to prevent him from crossing the river and invading Lancaster County. None of those men were out 90 days, but they did perform a great service. The force of these emergency men broke the advance of Lee and his army, and instead of having the great battle at a place somewhere farther east, at a point which might have been selected by Lee, Meade and his generals selected the place to deliver the blow at Gettysburg, and they chose Round Top, Culps Hill, and the heights south of Gettysburg, and there rolled back the tide that broke against them. Some of us may think that it is pretty long after the war to do this, but the very fact that it is so long after the war, and the very fact that there are only a few yet living who participated even in the border States of Missouri and Kentucky, make these men no less entitled to the passage of this bill, and I am anxious that we also pass a bill when it comes along for the emergency men of Pennsylvania who went down and resisted the great advance of Lee and his armies.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. FARR. The emergency men of Pennsylvania are included in this bill.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; but they must have served three months, and they did not serve that long. Let us amend the bill and include them all along the line.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. When Morgan made his famous charge there was a group of men called out at Cincinnati to protect that city, and they served for a certain time. They were nicknamed the squirrel hunters. Those men are not included.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute longer in order to answer the question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Those men are not included in this measure, because this limits it to those who served 90 days.

Mr. FOCHT. It ought to be amended to include them all and make it a clean-up along the border and elsewhere of all that collection of loyal men who did serve their country but who have heretofore been barred from participating in pensions and honors due them. The bill should be so amended as to include them all, thus finally recognizing patriotism in whatever measure exhibited.

Mr. FESS. I think so, because these men came out at the call and offered their lives in a very emergent case in the Civil War.

Mr. FOCHT. There can be only a very few of them. I would say scarcely 200 in Pennsylvania, many less than 500, and I doubt whether there are anything like 5,000 in the entire country. But Lincoln called, and they responded, so let us give them this honored place in the sun along with the veterans who gave longer and greater service and whose valor is always cherished and ever near our hearts.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the exact status of these soldiers ought to be understood, and when it is I think there will be no question about the House voting for this bill. They have been denied pensions on a mere technicality. President Lincoln recognized them as a part of his Army. They have failed to be accorded a pensionable status by the ruling of former Secretary of War Root, whose ability as a lawyer is beyond question. Here are his declarations with reference to the question of whether they are entitled to pensions. He said:

> The Missouri Militia did not constitute a part of the Army of the United States, but were a force acting from time to time in cooperation with it; that the order disbanding such troops can not be construed as equivalent to an honorable discharge in the sense in which these words are used in section 2304, Revised Statutes.

They were recognized by competent authority as a part of the United States Army. They fought and received wounds, they served in cooperation with the Army, and were denied pensions simply because their discharge was not quite technical. As the Speaker of the House well said, they participated in a number of battles. The most prominent battle in Missouri in which they participated was the battle of Springfield, and their defense under Holland at that time against the largely outnumbering force of the Confederates under Marmaduke constitutes a very bright page in the history of the State troops.

My State is only slightly interested in this measure. There are a few members of the Enrolled Missouri Militia in my district. They fought in the battles mentioned in this report, and fought gallantly. Now, if the policy of the country is to pension men who fought in the Union Armies and cooperated with them, this bill ought to pass. [Applause.] I call to mind a few members of the Enrolled Missouri Militia now honored citizens of my district, which borders on the State of Missouri, Mr. R. H. Hamilton, of Keener, Boone County, and Mr. Willis Russell, of Green Forest, both high-type men, men of high character, and men who deserve a reasonable pension to make easier their lot now that they are entering upon the final march that is soon to end at the portals of the great hereafter. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have 11 minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 11 minutes remaining.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] a question.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will be very glad to answer the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. Is it a fact men who belonged to these organizations of the State militia of Missouri, Kentucky, Indiana, and Pennsylvania, if wounded in battle, can secure a pension?

Mr. RUSSELL. Some of them, yes. They had a rule in the committee, or there was an act that permitted soldiers in the State organizations who were actually wounded in battle to be granted pensions.

Mr. WALSH. Is that by general law?

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman will permit me to correct him there, there was a statute, which expired by limitation in 1873. They had to apply before that date.

Mr. RUSSELL. I believe that is a fact. That law is now out of existence.

Mr. WALSH. Up until 1873 those men who were wounded could procure pensions under the general law?

Mr. RUSSELL. I know there was such an act at one time.

Mr. WALSH. Have they been securing pensions since that time, where they were wounded, by special act?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think since I have been in Congress, nearly 10 years, that any man has ever gotten a pension as a Missouri enrolled militiaman. The House has passed some such bills, but the Senate has, I think, in all cases refused to do so. Has the gentleman a minute remaining? If so, I would like to read two or three lines from a letter written by one of the Speaker's constituents, a man whom he knows very well, Jesse F. Trower. Somebody said something about these soldiers rendering no service. He says:

> I gave 511 days of actual military services in this State. That was more arduous and dangerous than many of those drawing pensions for years. In the battle at Ashley, Pettis County, Mo., one of my brothers was killed, another brother was badly wounded. I was by the side of the one killed.

That is the kind of service that he rendered in Missouri, and thousands of other militiamen rendered the same faithful service. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, many will remember that the southern part of the State of Indiana was in open revolt for quite a period during the Civil War; that had it not been for the State militia organization under the command of Federal officers there is no telling what would have happened along the border between Indiana and Kentucky. Oliver P. Morton, governor not only of the State of Indiana but acting as the Union governor of the State of Kentucky, was commended time and time again by President Lincoln for his ceaseless vigilance in keeping in repression the southern sympathizers along the Ohio River. The One hundred and eighth Indiana did signal service, not only in keeping down rebellion within the borders of the State of Indiana but likewise in resisting attacks and repeated raids by Morgan in the State of Indiana and in the State of Ohio. Yet this regiment was never mustered into the United States service. At the suggestion of Abraham Lincoln, Gen. Lew Wallace, one of the greatest volunteer generals to give his service in the Civil War, went to the city of Cincinnati and took the One hundred and eighth Indiana with him; also two or three other companies and parts of Indiana regiments. He also organized an army out of the citizenship of the city of Cincinnati, threw up breastworks, and saved the city of Cincinnati from being destroyed by Gen. Morgan.

This is but a sample of the service that was rendered by these men in the State of Indiana along the border, and not only in Indiana but across in Kentucky, where they fought side by side with the Kentuckians, and also across the border in the State of Illinois. The southern part of Illinois was in open rebellion against the North, or a considerable portion of it was for a time, and these men rendered signal service there along with the militia of that State. I indorse the statement of the Speaker of the House that it is a duty the Government owes these men. It is not a charity that we are giving them, but it is paying them for services rendered and recognizing them as we have recognized those who served as members of the United States Army. We are giving them a chance to have their names placed upon the scroll of honor—the United States pension roll—to which they are justly entitled for patriotic service rendered.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, while I am in sympathy with the legislation, I have asked for this time in order to call a matter to the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

In response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] as to attorney fees, it was the opinion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] that, due to the fact that the act of 1912 had a prohibition of attorney fees none was necessary in this act. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that while section 1 does extend the provisions of the act of 1912 to this class of men, this is not strictly an amendment of that act and there might be a question as to whether attorneys could secure fees under section 1. But section 2, as to widows, minor children, and dependent parents, certainly would open the way for pension attorneys to get fees. While I am in sympathy with the legislation I am not in sympathy with a lot of fees being opened up here to Washington pension agents. I want to ask the gentleman whether, in order to remove all possible question, he would be willing to accept an amendment such as was placed in similar legislation to the effect that no attorney shall be recognized and no attorney fee shall be paid for the presentation or prosecution of any claim under the provisions of this act?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that I would have no objection in the world, but he understands it would have to be done by unanimous consent. But I take it, this being an extension of the Sherwood Act, which has that provision——

Mr. CRAMTON. Section 2 refers to persons who do not come under the Sherwood Act.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Sherwood Act does not include widows——

Mr. CRAMTON. Or children.

Mr. RUSSELL. Well, I have no objection——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if this is the proper place, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CRAMTON. It will stand as a new section, to be numbered as section 5.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: At the end of the bill, on page 3, insert the following as a new section:

"SEC. 5. That no attorney shall be recognized and no attorney fees shall be paid for the presentation or prosecution of any claim under the provisions of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The section is inserted at the end of the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman use the balance of his time. I have but one more speech.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I shall not indulge in prophecy as to what the status of the Union would have been if there had been no State militia to protect the border States from invasion of the Southern forces. It is certain, however, that this bill in its amended form seeks to give pensionable status to men in the militia forces and other forces that never were in battle, and its purpose is to include all and give them a pensionable status, and by so doing cast reflection upon the hundreds of thousands of Union soldiers who volunteered in defense of their country. They were slackers to stay at their firesides and repel some temporary invasion. They were merely members of the State militia acting, in a way, as policemen, to give protection to their localities but not obligated for service outside at the command of the military officers of the Nation.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Do you call the Battle of Gettysburg a temporary invasion?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I well recall what was done at the Battle of Gettysburg, because my mother has told me how Philadelphia was alarmed and how all were called upon to go to the rescue, if need be, to prevent an invasion; but that was a temporary affair. These men did not volunteer as my mother's brothers volunteered in the service from the beginning of the war to the end of the war. They were merely called upon to protect their homes, fearful that Lee's army coming up from the South would go on to Philadelphia and New York. If they are on a par with the men who volunteered for three years, if they had the mettle in them to offer their service and their lives for the entire war, why did they not volunteer?

You are seeking now by this legislation to minimize the effect of the service and the valor of the true guardians of the Union, those who volunteered for the duration of the war, ready to go wherever their commanding officers would direct them. You are asking here by this amendment which is offered to include all who were members of State militia, who chanced to be members of the State militia and other organizations and had served 90 days, whether they had smelled powder or not. A few instances are cited—and we know how often a few instances are cited to justify a general bill which, if considered in its entirety, could not be justified—a few instances are cited where some men had engaged in battle; but this discussion shows that these men in the State militia did not leave the State.

I read to you what the official records show, as stated by Secretary of War Root, when he passed upon this question:

It will be seen from the foregoing that the enrolled Missouri Militia was a State force, organized under the militia law of the State for State service; that portions of it served—

Yes; that is the argument made here to justify this general bill extending to all a pensionable status—that portions of it served at various times and at short periods under United States officers and informally with United States troops in defense of the State.

We have declined up to the present moment to pension the old soldiers who enlisted for the duration of the war and longer if they had not served 90 days. If they had served only 85 days, you can not get a special bill through here, even though they had enlisted for two years or during the duration of the war. But now you are going to pension those who were members of the State militia, who joined that honorable body to protect their own firesides, who acted as police officers in a little larger sense, but who were unwilling to go to the front in company with the regular forces.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is what you are doing, and you are minimizing by this action the character of service of those who volunteered for the duration of the war. You are placing on a parity with those men who enlisted in the regular organizations those who declined to enlist and respond to the call to service. You are placing those men on a parity with the valiant soldiers who enlisted in the Federal forces under the direction of the commanding officers of the national army. I again repeat that the organizations covered by this bill are nothing more than on a par with the home guards who are now being organized throughout the country to do police duty. Occasion might have arisen when these home guards might have been called upon to put down sedition, but as I see the country manifesting its national spirit in waging this war they will not be called upon for that service. Are you going to ask that they, too, when this war is over, shall be put on the same status as those valiant boys who are going abroad to fight our battles? That is what you are doing. You are putting on the same plane, on a par, the State militiamen with those who volunteered to go to the front and fight for the Union.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Differentiating between the man who stayed at home and the man who went to the front, did not the feeling on the whole pension question reflect itself in the act of 1912—a service pension—and did not the gentleman vote for that?

Mr. STAFFORD. Unfortunately I was out of Congress at that time and did not have the privilege of voting on that question.

We have not up to the present time recognized the pensionable status of a soldier who had not served 90 days. You could not get a bill through Congress for such a man, even if he had rendered service for 85 days. Now you propose to pass a general law for those who stayed at home and were not involved in any battle whatever.

Mr. FOCHT. If we did those men an injustice before, we want now to correct that injustice. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. You want to do an injustice to the soldiers of the Civil War and pension these men who declined to enlist in the Federal service. You say that these men should have the same pensionable status as those who enlisted in the Federal service.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does not my friend overlook this part of the bill showing what sort of service they rendered under orders of an officer of the United States, or who volunteered for the time being to serve with a regularly organized military or naval force?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; under orders; but some of those men never saw service. They were merely doing police duty to protect their own homes, and you are citing a few instances of musket battles in Missouri, or down in Kentucky, when three-fourths of them never saw a battle at all, but remained at their firesides as members of the State militia.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time, three minutes, to my colleague from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have sat here for several years and watched the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] perform, and he is always interesting and usually fair, but this is the first time I have ever seen him assume the rôle of the defender of the old soldier on the doubtful grounds that to pass this bill would be a reproach to the old Union soldier. The men who are taken care of in this bill fought for the Union side by side with those who now draw a pension, and many of whom have drawn pensions for years. I submit to do justice to anyone has never been and can not be a reflection on anyone else. All that we are asking in this bill is to do justice to a class of men who were not only loyal to the Union but who proved their loyalty by their action during the trying days of the Civil War.

Mr. Speaker, I think that there is a lamentable lack of right information in regard to the men affected by this measure. The men whom the gentleman from Wisconsin designates as "having done police duty" out in the State of Missouri thought they were rendering service to the Federal Government in the same way and under the same authority as those who happened to have been recognized afterwards as Federal troops. I know that the Seventy-second Enrolled Missouri Militia, to which reference has been made by my friend from Arkansas, Judge TILLMAN, did render effective service at the battle of Springfield in 1864. I also know that these men were under the control and subject to the orders of a Federal officer. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] refers to them as home guards. In our State the home-guard organizations have had a pensionable status for years. Shortly after the war closed a commission, known as the Taylor-Hawkins Commission, were sent out into our State. They reported on these different military organizations, and in that report they recognized the Missouri Home Guards, the Provisional Enrolled Militia, Missouri Cavalry, and certain other State militia organizations, but there were a number of certain other State militia organizations which they reported were not to be regarded as Federal troops. I have never been able to find out any reason why that distinction was made. I have inquired at the War Department, I have their report, I have investigated records, and I have never been able to find out the standard that commission used in reaching their conclusion. Now, gentlemen, here are the facts: These so-called militia organizations of the State were under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. They were under the jurisdiction of a Federal officer. The Federal Government has recognized them by reimbursing the State for the money expended by it in their support. Gen. Schofield, a Federal general, had control of these organizations in our State during the war. They fought side by side with the men in the Missouri Cavalry, who have been recognized as a Federal organization. They fought side by side with the home-guard organizations, which have also been recognized as Federal troops. In my own county, in which the Battle of Springfield was fought, the Seventy-second Enrolled Missouri Militia went to the front and successfully defended the city of Springfield, drove Marmaduke and his forces away, fought side by side with Federal troops, were under the command of a Federal officer, underwent all the hardships and took all the dangers of regular Federal troops and other home organizations that have been recognized as Federal troops. But for some reason, as I stated, which I can not explain, under the Taylor-Hawkins Commission report, they have never been recognized as Government troops. It is but common justice and common honesty that these men be given a pensionable status, and thereby put them on an equality with the men who are now drawing pensions; that is all that we ask.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing this bill with the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 53, noes 10.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, on that I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of suspending the rules and passing this bill with the amendment will, as their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 176, nays 62, answered "present" 1, not voting 191, as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 12100 and the bill H. R. 12099 be given a privileged status, not to interfere with the consideration of conference reports or appropriation bills.

One of the bills amends the shipping act, the purpose being to make it clear that vessel property may not pass under foreign ownership without the consent of the Shipping Board, and also broadens the definition of "vessel" so as to include a vessel in the course of construction and before it is launched. The other bill is a bill to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to give a privileged status to the two bills named, not to interfere with conference reports and appropriation bills. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask the gentleman to withdraw his request until morning, so as to give opportunity to Members of the House to examine these bills.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have no objection to that. They are important bills, and one is strictly a war measure.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, on Decoration Day I heard a very useful and patriotic address delivered by the Hon. FREDERICK ZIHLMAN, a Member of this House, on the Antietam battle field. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting it therein.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

VALIDATING CERTAIN PUBLIC-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 78, to validate certain public-land entries.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 4, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a supplemental estimate for the services of a clerk stenographer and typist, Treasury Department (H. Doc. No. 1143); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a proposed clause of legislation authorizing and directing allowance and credit in accounts of Lieut. Col. Charles J. Nelson, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army (H. Doc. No. 1144); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation required by the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1145); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to the printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8763) to amend the act entitled "An act to extend temporarily the time for filing applications and fees and taking action in the United States Patent Office in favor of nations granting reciprocal rights to United States citizens," approved August 17, 1916, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 616), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KEATING: A bill (H. R. 12352) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. ROGERS: A bill (H. R. 12353) to authorize the Secretary of War to provide and issue distinctive buttons or badges to men who, since April 6, 1917, have been honorably discharged from the armed forces of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DENT: A bill (H. R. 12354) to authorize the Secretary of War to exchange certain lands owned by the United States in Monroe County, Pa., for certain other adjacent lands owned by the Monroe Water Supply Co.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana: A bill (H. R. 12355) to regulate the interstate use of automobiles and all self-propelled vehicles which use the public highways in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. CRAMTON: A bill (H. R. 12356) to amend section 801 of public act No. 50 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, entitled "An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1917; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LEHLBACH: A bill (H. R. 12357) to increase rates of pensions for permanent specific disabilities incurred while in the military or naval service of the United States; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SIMS: A bill (H. R. 12358) to extend the franking privilege to such officials of the several States as are charged with the administration of the State Confederate pension laws; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. POU: Resolution (H. Res. 370) urging the immediate consideration of Senate bill 1553; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. ASWELL: Joint resolution (H. J. The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation required by the Division of Purchases, Storage, and Traffic, General Staff of the Army, for the fiscal year 1919, $2,896,429 (S. Doc. No. 233), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $145,103,037 required by the Director of Purchases, Storage, and Traffic for inland and port storage, for the fiscal year 1919 (S. Doc. No. 232), which, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 1549. An act to require numbering and recording of undocumented vessels;

S. 2380. An act granting to the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii additional powers relative to elections and qualification of electors; and

S. 4151. An act to provide for a determination of heirship in cases of deceased members of the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, conferring jurisdiction upon district courts to partition lands belonging to full-blood heirs of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1544) to provide for appeals from decisions of boards of local inspectors of vessels, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 3332. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey certain land to the city of Faribault, Minn.; and

H. R. 10021. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county commissioners of Trumbull County, Ohio, to construct, operate, and maintain a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I send to the desk a letter accompanied by a resolution passed by the New Britain Chamber of Commerce, of Connecticut, and ask that the Secretary read it.

There being no objection the Secretary read as follows:

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., May 31, 1918.

Hon. F. G. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR HONORABLE SIR: We beg to advise you that the directors of the New Britain Chamber of Commerce have unanimously adopted the resolutions attached. These resolutions have received the indorsement of the National Chamber of Commerce of the United States and the American Association of State Highway Officials, and we urge your consideration.

We believe the recommendations of these resolutions are vitally important and necessary and should be made operative at the earliest possible moment.

Yours, very truly,

NEW BRITAIN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
LEON A. SPRAGUE, Executive Secretary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will not ask that the resolutions be read if they may be printed.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the meeting of highway transportation men of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States in session at Chicago, Ill., April 11, 1918.

Whereas the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, assembled in its war convention in Atlantic City last September, urged as a war measure the prompt improvement of public highways; and

Whereas the transportation requirements of the country due to the war can be only met by complete coordination of the carrying capacities of railroads, highways, and waterways; and

Whereas there has developed in our country a tremendous increase in highway transportation for the haulage of munitions, foodstuffs, and essential supplies; and

Whereas we recognize the necessity of a Federal war-time policy in respect to highway improvement, permitting the various States to immediately formulate a definite highway program: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we urge upon the Federal Government and the several States the importance of adopting a program that will insure adequate highway construction and maintenance, so that our highways may properly carry their share of the burdens of transportation; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge upon the President and the Members of Congress the creation of a centralized Federal authority to determine the highway policy of our Government, with power to direct the administration of that policy.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Third Middlesex Representative District Organization of the Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association, praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a petition of Sedgwick Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Washington, of Spokane, Wash., praying for an increase in the pensions of veterans of the Civil War, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Yakima Hop Growers' Association, of Washington, and a telegram in the nature of a memorial from McNeff Bros., of Portland, Oreg., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Randall amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill prohibiting the use of food materials in the manufacture of malt beverages, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented resolutions adopted by the United Commercial Travelers of Stillwater, Minn., favoring the enactment of legislation to provide for the creation of a centralized Federal authority to determine the highway policy of our Government, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the recognition of the independence of Ireland, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of the Alice Paul Branch of the Minneapolis Woman's Party Association, of Minneapolis; of the Woman's Council of National Defense, of Koochiching County; and of Mrs. Henry Wailler, of White Bear, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of William Fenton Post, No. 258, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, of St. Ignace; of Edward Dwight Post, No. 163, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, of Vermontville; of B. T. Chapin Post, No. 287, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, of Allegon; and of Oscar Bartlett Post, No. 233, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, of Lamb, all in the State of Michigan, praying for an increase in pensions of veterans of the Civil War, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the Rotary Club of Portland, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the creation of a centralized Federal authority to determine the highway policy of our Government, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Out of order, I ask to have read a telegram, in my care, addressed to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object to this request, but when it is disposed of I should like to go on with the pension bill under the unanimous-consent agreement.

There being no objection, the Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

LAS CRUCES, N. MEX., June 3, 1918.

UNITED STATES SENATE
(Care Hon. A. A. JONES), Washington, D. C.:

We the people of the Protestant churches of Las Cruces, N. Mex., respectfully urge you to immediately pass the Barkley bill or any other providing for national bone-dry prohibition as a war measure, being urged by the Government to conserve food in our homes. In the name of consistency, we ask that this measure be passed.

W. A. SUTHERLAND.
H. B. HOLT.
FRANK A. HAWLEY.
B. T. LINK.

CLAIM OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT (S. DOC. NO. 231).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in relation to a claim presented by the Government of France against this Government on account of losses sustained by a French citizen in connection with the search for the body of Admiral John Paul Jones, which was undertaken by Gen. Horace Porter, formerly American ambassador to France, and I recommend that an appropriation be made to effect a settlement of this claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 4 June, 1918.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 3332. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey certain land to the city of Faribault, Minn., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

H. R. 10021. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county commissioners of Trumbull County, Ohio, to construct, operate, and maintain a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9959) increasing rates of pension of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. THOMPSON. Let the pending amendment be reported.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is offered as a substitute for the amendment previously offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. Add at the end of the bill the following:

That no pensioner shall be entitled to receive any benefits under the provisions of this act for any period during which he shall be an inmate of any State or National soldiers' home; and the provisions of this act shall not apply to any pensioner whose net annual income from all sources, including his pension, is $1,000 or more, to be determined by the income-tax reports on file in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who shall annually on the 1st day of July transmit to the Commissioner of Pensions a list of all pensioners having an income, as shown by such reports, in excess of the said sum of $1,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of this bill, or to do more than briefly explain the amendment which is under consideration and point out the differences between the House bill and the amendment proposed by the Senate committee. I confess to no great familiarity with pension legislation, and can not speak with the same authority upon these questions as those Senators can who for years have been members of the Pension Committee and have had to do with legislation which has come from that committee during past sessions of Congress. I had not intended to offer any amendments to this bill or to submit any observations whatever, but the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], was unexpectedly called from the city, and he requested me to call attention to this amendment which he submitted a few days ago and stated, as I recall, that at the appropriate time he would offer it as an amendment to the Senate bill. It is always an ungracious task to oppose legislation which is in the interest of those who have served in the armies of our country, and those who have the temerity to do so are often denounced and their motives misrepresented and assailed. There is always a feeling that men who are called to serve their country in time of war should receive the gratitude of their countrymen and consideration at the hands of the people, and this feeling is frequently appealed to and generally relied upon to secure legislation increasing pensions. Of course there are always some who are willing to take from the Public Treasury even where morals or constitutional limitations would interpose objection. In other words, some people seem to regard the Public Treasury as an unfailing fountain to which all may go for gratuities and gifts and benefactions. In war times the demands upon the Treasury from every source and from almost every section are greater than ever. The Government staggers under imperative demands, and yet many worthy enterprises and measures are pressed for consideration which could with propriety be postponed to a more propitious hour.

In these observations I am speaking generally and not with any particular reference to the measure under consideration. I do, however, wish to impress upon Senators the necessity of economy and prudence in dealing with the Public Treasury. The exactions which are being daily made are so tremendous that every man who has vision must view with apprehension the financial future not only of the Government but of the people. We can not spend billions annually, with decreasing sources of taxation and diminishing productivity in the fields of agriculture and manufactures and in the activities of trade and commerce, without sooner or later feeling the oppressive burden which inevitably will bear heavily upon the country. And yet every appeal for economy, so far as I have been able to discover since we entered upon the war, has met with but very little support. Every section of our land is seeking an appropriation. Money is sought to operate the railroads, to develop mines and industries, to prosecute private enterprises, and in many instances to aid in purely local and often selfish schemes and plans. Efforts are constantly being made to extend the functions of the Government and to embark the Nation upon wild and tempestuous seas of experimentation.

Indeed, there is no project so visionary, no scheme so Utopian, that its adoption is not urged by many and appropriations sought to aid in its execution. Where the money is to come from to meet these stupendous demands it is impossible to determine. There are limits to the power of taxation, and it follows necessarily that there are limits to the ability of the Government to procure revenue. Taxation may be so onerous as to destroy industry and property values. The burdens of taxation must be wisely and prudently laid upon the people; and while enormous amounts must be taken from the people under revenue laws, the aim should be to so lay the taxes as not to paralyze or destroy business. But, Mr. President, with the increasing demands which are being made for appropriations and in view of the fact that millions of men are being taken from gainful occupations, it becomes more and more apparent that unless the most rigid economies are practiced the people and the Government will bend under the oppressive burdens which are to be placed upon them. Pursuasive reasons are assigned for many, indeed the greater part, of the appropriations which are sought from the Government, and it is almost impossible to withstand the pleading of the proponents of many measures calling for governmental aid.

Pension bills properly call for sympathetic consideration. Men who served and saved our country are entitled to the gratitude of the Nation. There is no man who appreciates the issues of the Civil War who does not experience a feeling of profound reverence for those men who fought and suffered for the Union. The men who were wounded, the men who incurred physical disabilities, and who for months and years bravely defended the flag and fought for the maintenance of the Union, are entitled to the consideration of the country. So it is a very ungracious task to oppose any measure that increases pensions to Civil War veterans; and in offering this amendment and in asking the Senate to approve the House bill, known as the Sherwood bill, I do not want to be put in the attitude of opposing the legitimate claims of the Civil War veterans. As I stated, I am not very familiar with pension legislation and am not an authority upon the questions involved in the present measure; but, as I understand, Hon. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the House, prepared and introduced in the House a bill known as the Sherwood bill, which passed the House and came to the Senate for consideration. The House bill provides, in substance, that the rate of pension of any person who served in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War and was honorably discharged therefrom, and who is now in receipt of a pension or shall hereafter be granted a pension under the provisions of any general law, or is now pensioned under a special act of Congress, and who is entitled to a pension of less than $25 per month, shall receive under the bill a pension amounting to $25 per month.

The bill further provides that for every person who has reached the age of 70 years and served 1 year the rate of pension shall be $26 per month; and the soldier serving 1½ years receives $28 per month. Service for 2 years calls for $30 per month; for 2½ years, $31 per month; and for 3 years or over, $32.50 per month. The bill further provides that in case such person has reached the age of 75 years and served 90 days, he shall receive $27 per month; and if service was for 6 months, $29 per month; and if for 1 year, $31 per month; for 1½ years, $35 per month; and for 2 years or over, $39 per month. There is a further provision for persons who were wounded in battle or in line of duty and who are now unfit for manual labor by reason thereof, or who from disease or other causes incurred in line of duty suffered disability and are unable to perform manual labor. They shall be paid at the rate of $39 per month regardless of the length of service or of age. Section 3 of the House bill provides that no pensioner shall be entitled to receive any benefits under the provisions of this act for any period during which he shall be an inmate of any State or National soldiers' home; nor shall the provisions of the act apply to any pensioner whose net annual income from all sources, including his pension, is $1,000 or more.

This bill was considered by the House committee and was reported to the House and subsequently passed the House with practical unanimity. The author of the bill is Gen. SHERWOOD, a distinguished Union soldier. In a letter to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Pensions Gen. SHERWOOD states: "This bill was prepared by the Committee on Invalid Pensions after a deliberation of about two months and after full consultation with the legislative committee of the Grand Army of the Republic, and I am a member of the legislative committee." He further states in his letter that the bill carries, in round numbers, a little less than $21,000,000 for the first year; that it excludes from the provisions 23,000 soldiers in National and State soldiers' homes and all soldiers having a yearly income, inclusive of pensions, of $1,000 or more. Proceeding, the General uses this language:

> Had it not been for the war and the increased cost of living, of course, there would have been no need for new pension legislation at this time, and in order to make the bill an emergency measure these two exceptions were made. Formerly it cost the Government $240 a year to keep each soldier in a soldiers' home; now it costs the Government $400 a year for each soldier. Hence the increased cost of living is borne exclusively by the Government for the soldiers living in soldiers' homes."

The House measure, as will be seen, is therefore the product of men who are familiar with the needs of the soldiers and with pension legislation, and the bill which they reported would appear from the record to have met at that time at least the approval of representatives of the soldiers. Of course, I can appreciate that there will be some soldiers who would welcome almost any increase in pension.

I do not make this statement by way of criticism but merely as illustrating a conspicuous trait of human nature. It is the natural disposition of people, particularly where they feel that they are entitled to consideration, to obtain as much as they possibly can. Indeed, some people are so selfish that no concessions to their demands would prove satisfactory. I believe that there have been some private pension bills that lacked merit, and that some persons have received and are receiving pensions who are not entitled to them. I can understand that even though the Sherwood bill was universally approved by the soldiers when reported, it would now meet with opposition from some if they believed that a measure carrying larger pensions could be enacted into law. And so the bill drawn by Gen. SHERWOOD, in connection with representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic, does not now, I understand, meet the approval of all of the old soldiers. There are some who prefer the Senate bill because it increases the pensions very materially and gives to those who served but a few months the same rates of increase as many who served for years. Without analyzing the two bills in this respect, it is sufficient to say that the report of Commissioner Lane shows that the estimated cost of the Sherwood bill for the first year is approximately $22,000,000, and I am advised that estimates furnished as to the appropriations required to meet the pensions under the Senate bill will, for the first year, be in the neighborhood of $40,000,000. Of course, since those estimates were furnished a large number of the beneficiaries under either bill have passed to the great beyond, so that there would be a substantial reduction in each amount. As I understand the position of the distinguished chairman of the Senate Pension Committee, it was to the effect that the Sherwood bill had received the approval of the House, it had been prepared by a veteran of the Civil War, who had won high honors because of long and gallant service, after full conferences with representatives of the soldiers, and that it would be the part of wisdom to adhere to the House bill and to pass the measure substantially as it came from the House. The Committee on Pensions of the Senate, as Senators are aware, substituted another measure for the House or Sherwood bill.

Mr. President, as I understand, there was a comprehensive law passed in May, 1912. It was understood that it was so comprehensive and dealt with the entire subject in a manner so just and generous that the claim was made that no additional pension legislation would ever be required. I am advised that representations were made at that time by those who claimed to speak for the Civil War veterans, that if Congress would enact into law the bill then under consideration there would be no further claims made for additional pensions except in some specific or unusual case.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Senator to yield to me that I may correct that impression. I had charge of the bill at that time in putting it through as chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and I reiterated many time that there might be occasions and probably would be occasions for a change at some future time and that I did not regard at that time that to be the final bill, and I wish to say to the Senator I do not regard this one to be the final bill, notwithstanding the optimistic utterances that are made.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator who has just interrupted me knows far more about pension legislation than I do. He has been familiar with this question for many years by reason of his long service in the Senate and because at one time he was chairman of the Committee on Pensions. But I am sure that statements have repeatedly been made of the character to which I have just referred.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is right.

Mr. KING. If it is not improper, I call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota, and other Senators, to the recent statements made before the Committee on Pensions of the Senate by the past commander in chief, Mr. Gardner, and others representing the Grand Army of the Republic. As I recall their statements, they were to the effect that when the act of May 12, 1912, was passed assurances were made that that was the end of pension legislation except in a few unusual or unanticipated cases. I am quite sure that Mr. Gardner, speaking for the organization, made substantially the statement which I am now crediting to him.

Additional pension legislation is now asked for primarily because of the high cost of living. The contention is made that the great advance in everything entering into the lives of the soldiers makes it necessary that they shall receive higher pensions; otherwise some, and indeed many, would suffer serious privations. I think the claim was made in the House committee, before whom the subject was considered at great length, that the reason for this legislation was the high price of living. The report of the House committee accompanying House bill 9959 contains the following language:

It is not claimed this bill is adequate to fully meet the increased cost of living. It is a fair estimate that the purchasing power of a dollar to-day, as compared with the time the act of May 11, 1912, was enacted, is a trifle less than 40 cents on the dollar. This bill, if enacted into law, will increase the purchasing power of the soldiers' pensions to about 72 per cent. In other words, if conditions as to prices had remained normal, compared with 1912, the present proposed legislation would have the same effect upon the surviving soldiers of the Civil War as if their pensions had been reduced 28 per cent.

I think I am correct in stating that the principal reason urged for this legislation was that because of the change in industrial and economic conditions it was only fair to make further contributions to the old soldiers to enable them to meet the high prices incident to such changed conditions.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will just add to that the increased age of the pensioner and the increasing disability to earn a living, taken in connection with the high cost of living, he will state a further reason for the proposed legislation.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly, if the committee went deeply into all the reasons that might be urged in justification for the legislation proposed, it might be agreed that the Senator is correct, and yet that reason was just as apparent when the act of May, 1912, was passed, and which seemed so satisfactory as to lead the representatives of the old soldiers to assume that no additional legislation would ever be requested. However, as I read the report of the House committee, the suggested reason of the Senator from North Dakota does not seem to have been considered by them; certainly it was not assigned as one of the grounds for their report and as a reason for supporting the House bill. The bill which passed the House of Representatives, and which is known as the Sherwood bill, came from the House committee, as I recall, with a unanimous report. It is true that Hon. OSCAR E. BLAND, of Indiana, submitted what might be denominated a supplemental report, in which he expressed views somewhat in antagonism to those contained in the report which was submitted accompanying the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely want to correct the impression which my colleague seems to have, that this was a unanimous report. It was a majority report from the committee, and was not a unanimous report.

I will say further, that when the bill was under discussion on the floor of the other House, there was a rule brought in which would not allow an amendment to be offered to the bill. Members had either to vote for the House bill or they had to vote against it. Therefore, the vote which the bill received was a vote in favor of an increase of pension, and not that the individual members wanted that particular pension bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my information is that the House committee voted unanimously to report the Sherwood bill, and the report accompanying the bill appears to be unanimous, except, as stated, that Representative BLAND submitted additional views, in which he expressed the view that higher pensions should be provided than those given in the Sherwood bill.

The House bill differs from the substitute which is reported by the Senate committee in a number of particulars. I shall not take the time nor the trouble to explain in detail the differences, because all Senators are familiar with them. I call attention, however, to two items in which the difference is marked. In the House bill section 3 provides that—

No pensioner shall be entitled to receive any benefits under the provisions of this act for any period during which he shall be an inmate of any State or National soldiers' home; and the provisions of this act shall not apply to any pensioner whose net annual income from all sources, including his pension, is $1,000 or more.

The substitute bill reported by the Senate committee omits this section and contains no similar provision. It is manifest that the House bill did not intend to extend the increases provided in the bill to pensioners who were receiving, either from investments or from other sources, large incomes. It has been a subject of considerable discussion for many years as to whether it was just and fair for men who are receiving large incomes from their investments or from other sources to obtain at the same time a pension from the Government. Instances have been brought to the attention of the public where men have incomes of thousands of dollars per annum, and yet they were drawing pensions from the Government. I have known of many cases where persons who served in the war but received no injuries whatever and indeed in some instances they were never at the battle front, and they were in excellent physical condition, and yet they were drawing large pensions, notwithstanding the fact that they were the recipients of incomes ranging from a few thousand to many thousands of dollars per annum. Such cases have provoked criticism and have led to many general charges that the pension roll contained many fraudulent or, at least, many unworthy claimants.

Doubtless the House committee deemed the reasons sufficient and satisfactory to warrant them in placing in the House bill section 3, just referred to. The Senate bill, as stated, omits this provision and, therefore, repudiates the position of the House and indorses the view that the same pension should be given to the soldier who received no injuries and whose annual income is thousands of dollars as that which is paid to the soldier who received wounds in line of battle and who has no income whatever except the pension derived from the Government. If the proposed Senate bill becomes law, then we give notice to the country that pensions are not based upon injuries or disabilities, or the needs and necessities of the worthy and valiant soldier, but the rich man, the man of large income, the man who is sound of body and of mind, the man who was in the Army only 90 days, the man who merely guarded a train and who was hundreds of miles from shot and shell, shall receive the same pension as the former. Senators may find sufficient reasons for supporting this view. This position may seem just and fair and consistent to them. It occurs to me that the House bill is founded upon a sounder and certainly a fairer and juster principle.

As stated, the reason assigned for increasing the pensions is the increased cost of living and the inability of many of the old soldiers to support themselves under the present conditions. It has been claimed that many of them are indigent, and indeed do not have sufficient to meet their daily necessities. For this view to be consistent and logical those whose incomes take them out of this class ought not to receive the increased pension. If increases are granted because of the poverty and needs of the soldiers, then those who are not in poverty and who are not in need of increased pensions ought not to receive them. At any rate, that was the position of Gen. Sherwood and the position of the House. I ask Senators to consider whether or not the principle followed by the House is not sound and just.

There has been some criticism of this provision, under which no pensioner having an income of $1,000 or more should be entitled to receive any benefits under the provisions of the bill; it was said that the trouble of executing a law of this character would be exceedingly great; that there would be complications; that to ascertain what a man's income was would make the cost greater than the amount which ultimately would be charged to the Treasury. To meet this view the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] submitted an amendment, which forms a part of the amendment which I have just suggested to the Senate, and that provides that in ascertaining the income of the pensioner it shall "be determined by the income-tax reports on file in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who shall annually on the 1st day of July transmit to the Commissioner of Pensions a list of all pensioners having an income, as shown by such reports, in excess of the said sum of $1,000."

If this amendment is adopted, then the criticism referred to is without merit. The plan proposed by the amendment is simple, and the Commissioner of Pensions could readily provide rules and regulations to enable his office to deal with the question in a satisfactory manner.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator from Utah object to being interrupted? I think he could explain matters as he goes along possibly a little better by permitting interruptions than by not doing so.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to interruptions, although I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that I may not be able to explain matters, because I am not very familiar, I confess, with pension legislation, and the Senator from Montana, who was unexpectedly called from the city, had this matter in charge, and I am only attempting the part of a poor and indifferent substitute.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to suppose a case of this character: Suppose that during the year 1917, as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in 1918, a soldier had an income of a thousand dollars a year; we will assume that after the 1st day of July he has no income. You have no method of ascertaining that fact under the amendment which is proposed, and he would be deprived of the pension that would be his due until another year elapses to again ascertain on a second report from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he had no income during that year. The fact that a soldier had an income in 1917 of a thousand dollars is no evidence whatever that he will have a thousand-dollar income in 1918. I think the Senator from Utah will see, if he stops to consider that proposition, that the amendment does not meet the case and can not meet the case. The matter must be investigated from time to time right along by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me, before I attempt to answer what he suggests, to inquire for information if there was not a measure some years ago—I think it was denominated the widows' pension act of 1908—under the terms of which there was a similar provision to this; that is, that there was a limitation provided? Is it not also a fact that under that provision there was no difficulty, or but little difficulty, in enforcing it?

Mr. McCUMBER. No. The 1890 law granting pensions to widows provided that no widow who had an income of $250 a year should be entitled to pension. If she applied under that law, she had to state at that time what her income was; and, in addition to her own statement, the Commissioner of Pensions required other evidence; in other words, the bureau investigated the matter, so that it was determined at the time and before any pension was allowed at all whether or not a widow had an income of $250. The matter was never left to some other arm of the Government, to the taxing power, to make a report once a year. If the commissioner found that after she had drawn her pension for six months she then had an income of $250 a year the pension would be discontinued.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. May I say in that connection that the complaints were so numerous and so much trouble was occasioned that that provision was repealed?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course I can not challenge the accuracy of the statement of the distinguished Senators who have just spoken, because their greater familiarity with this subject permits them to speak with an authority that I certainly do not have, but I am advised that that law was fairly satisfactory and was enforced as successfully as most laws usually are.

I wish to say, in reply to the Senator from North Dakota, that I see no reason why the income-tax report, which must be made, may not be taken as a guide. The proposed amendment does not provide that it shall be conclusive; that is to say, if the report submitted for one year shows an income in excess of $1,000, that may be prima facie evidence that the income the following year will be approximately the same amount. It is not, however, conclusive by any means; it would be merely a guide to determine whether the pension should be paid; and if, as I understand the proposed amendment and the operations of the law, a man's income should suffer a loss during that year and should sink below the thousand-dollar line, then by making a satisfactory showing to the Commissioner of Pensions he would be placed on the pensionable list. The amendment I have suggested does not prevent the Commissioner of Pensions from acting favorably upon any application for pension when he receives evidence that the income of the soldier is less than $1,000. The proposed amendment does not establish the question of income for all time. The income-tax return is made annually. Each person's income varies, and the tax of this year may greatly differ from that of next year. The Pension Office will have no greater difficulty in meeting this question than will the Internal-Revenue Office in meeting the question of taxation under the revenue bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the Senator supports the amendment on the theory that it obviates an investigation by the Pension Bureau. My argument was simply that it would not obviate it, because, while it might be said that the internal-revenue report would be prima facie evidence, after all the matter would have to be investigated immediately to determine whether or not the soldier had a thousand-dollar income, for in his application under the new law undoubtedly the blanks would require him to show whether or not he was receiving a thousand dollars from other sources; and if he should say that he did not have, notwithstanding the fact that the record showed that he did have, an income of a thousand dollars in 1917, an investigation would be required. That would call for a vast number of special agents, that would involve an extra appropriation, and by the time you got through you would find that it would cost more than could possibly have been saved to the Government.

I think that is a most important consideration.

While I am on my feet, I want to present to the Senator another consideration, and that is this, as we found in connection with many cases of widows' pensions: When there is no question of income, practically every possible question of fraud under the pension laws is eliminated, while when there is a question of income at stake fraud from every source is invited. It was found to be easy, as was discovered in connection with the consideration of special pension bills, for the soldier or the widow to get rid of their little incomes by transferring them to some other member of the family. So the person with an elastic conscience would always be safe in securing the pension, while the person who was honest and conscientious in all matters would say, "I have this amount of income, and I am not going to try to get rid of it in any way or transfer it to any other member of the family or make any transfer of my property," and would be deprived of the little pension that would otherwise come to him.

Those, I think, are the only real cases of fraud we have ever had that amount to anything in connection with the administration of the pension laws. The number who would have a thousand-dollar income is small; probably not to exceed 3 or 4 per cent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the wit of man never has been sufficient to enact laws that may not be circumvented. The ablest lawyers frame legislation for State legislatures, for Congress, for Parliament, and the greatest legislative bodies in the world, and yet the next session of the legislative bodies is called upon to correct the mistakes, the omissions, the errors, and the evils which were sought to be remedied in the previous legislation. It seems not humanly possible to enact a law that will meet every condition and that will prevent fraud, deception, and evasion. I grant that there may have been—and the Senator says that such is the fact—evasions by old soldiers or by their widows in the past; but because there have been evasions and frauds committed by beneficiaries of legislation at the hands of a generous Government, that is no argument, to my mind, against just and fair legislation. If men and women will commit perjury, will deliberately violate plain and just statutes, there is only one remedy, and that is to punish them.

Mr. President, the argument that has been just submitted by my distinguished friend is one of the stock arguments against the income tax. It has been urged by the greatest publicists of Europe and by some of the greatest writers of our own land against income-tax legislation that it leads to evasion and fraud; that it entails too much investigation and is too inquisitorial in character; that as a result the taxpayer in order to avoid the exactions that the law demands will resort to fraud and evasions and, indeed, to perjury.

That is not an argument, Mr. President, against the income tax or against any fair taxing law. There are men, as suggested by the Senator, whose consciences are so elastic that they would stop at no law, and perjury would be committed in the presence of civil magistrates or prelates of the church. No law could be drawn that they would not try to evade; no statute could be enacted that they would not endeavor to avoid. The paramount question here is, Is this proposed amendment just and fair? If it is, then it is not a sufficient argument against it that somebody may commit perjury and thus avoid the operations of the statute.

I should like to inquire of my distinguished friend—and I do not do it in a controversial way, because I entertain such profound respect for him that I would not seek a controversy with him—whether he believes that men who are earning thousands of dollars a year, and who are not in need of a pension, ought not to receive pensions, or is it his opinion that they ought to be the beneficiaries of pension legislation to the same extent as those who are in poverty or whose necessities demand financial aid?

If the Senator will answer, I shall be very glad to get his view on that matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can answer that without the least hesitancy. I think that what we are granting to these old soldiers is a gratuity on the part of the Government to those who do not need it—we may call it a gratuity simply—and that it is an assistance to those who do need it. To say that because some old soldier who fought four years for his country has saved a little, by being a little more careful than the others, he should be deprived of that expression of gratitude on the part of his Government seems to me to be entirely unjust, although he may not need it.

I do not want to see the old soldiers put in the position of mendicants. I do not want this granted to them as alms. I want the Government to grant it in a free and liberal spirit, and with a grateful heart for what they have done for the country; and I want it to be granted in such a way that every one can accept it without feeling that he has placed himself in a position where he can be called an alms soldier. He is entitled to it from my standpoint, and he ought to receive it free from the stigma of penury.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, his position is this: That if a man is earning $10,000 or $100,000 a year, or if he receives that income from his investments, he ought to have the same pension as the man who is in want and who has no income whatever. I can not agree with that view; but I do not care to enter into a protracted discussion of that question, although it is cognate to the question involved. I will only say that, in my opinion, there should be a distinction. No matter how the pension may be viewed the millionaire, the man in good health, the man who was never wounded and was never near the smoke of battle, and who served but 90 days guarding some stores or supplies hundreds of miles from the battle line, should not receive the same consideration in money as the soldier who is in want, who served for years in deadly conflicts, and who perhaps received injuries of a serious nature.

Mr. President, there is another point of difference between the substitute bill and the bill which came from the House. In the House bill the inmates of the soldiers' homes were not to be the beneficiaries of this increase. I stated at the outset, and I think the report of the House committee supports my contention, that the theory of this increase was based upon the increase in the cost of living. A few years ago the inmates of the soldiers' homes were maintained by the Government at an annual expense of approximately $240 each. Now, by reason of the increased cost of living, the amount exceeds $400 each. The Senate bill makes a discrimination. It permits the man who is in a soldiers' home, who is being supported by the Government, to get the same compensation as the man who is at home and has to support himself out of his pension or from other sources of income.

If one of the primary reasons justifying this legislation is the increased cost of living, then it is illogical to say that the man who is being supported by the Government in the soldiers' home shall derive the same benefits from this pension bill as the man who is not in the soldiers' home. So it seems to me, Mr. President, that the House bill is more logical, and certainly is more just, than the bill which comes from the Senate committee.

Mr. President, I desire to read from a statement made by Hon. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, chairman of the House committee. We all know that Gen. SHERWOOD is a distinguished citizen of this country; that he entered the Civil War as a private, served with distinction for more than four years, and was mustered out a brigadier general.

If anyone is entitled to speak for the old soldier, either in the House or in the Senate, it seems to me that Gen. SHERWOOD is that man. His long experience and his familiarity with pension legislation and with the condition of the soldiers it would seem qualify him to speak and would give to his remarks a persuasiveness that could not be found in the statements of any Senator or any other Congressman.

Calling attention to the difference between the House bill and the Senate bill, Gen. SHERWOOD uses this language:

> Particularly at this time it would cause very bad feeling among both the Civil War veterans and the people abroad in the country if Congress were to do an injustice to those survivors of the Civil War who actually incurred wounds or disabilities in line of duty during the war. The vital fault in the Smoot amendment is that it completely overlooks this class of pensioners, who are clearly and eminently entitled to at least equal consideration with those who are now pensioned for age and service. Under the provisions of the House bill, the $25 per month minimum rate and 30 per cent increase is made to apply to these pensioners as well. It is also manifestly unfair to the veterans of advanced age who served from a year to the entire period of the war to give them comparatively small increases while the men who enlisted in 1864 and 1865, and served in many cases only 90 days, are given increases of from 75 to 100 per cent; yet this would be the effect of the bill as amended by the Senate committee. The House bill, however, gives the short-service men a minimum pension of $25 per month, and it is conceded that they are entitled to that, for the reason that Congress last session made the rate of pension for widows $25 per month.

Of course, the Sherwood bill is illogical, in a sense, because of giving the 90-day men under 70 years of age the same increase as the men who fought for three or four years; but the position is justified, apparently, because Congress gave a rate of $25 to the widow, and it was supposed that if the widow of the soldier who served but 90 days received $25 per month, then the soldier who served for a like period should receive as great an amount. However, there is no justification for the provision giving to those who served only 90 days or 100 days or a few months the same compensation, when not wounded, when suffering from disabilities, as the men who fought for years in the Civil War.

Right on that point, Mr. President, I am informed that there has been a very earnest propaganda in favor of the Senate bill by the 90-day men. Telegrams which I have seen would seem to indicate that. I do not think the old soldiers who fought two and three and four years are very eager for the Senate bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. KING. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SMOOT. I intend to answer the Senator, and perhaps it would be better for me not to say anything at all at this time, or call the Senator's attention to the statement just made. The only objections that I have had to the so-called Smoot bill, however, have been from 90-day men. They claim that some of the bloodiest battles that were fought in the war were fought by 90-day men, which is true. Take the One hundred and fifty-eighth Massachusetts, who met on the Common of Boston with 1,158 men. They did not fight much more than 90 days, and when they were through there were only 78 left out of the 1,158; and I could go on and recite, all through the war, similar instances. Men who only enlisted for 90 days were in some of the bloodiest battles that were fought; and I will say to the Senator that the only objections that I have had to the bill that was introduced by me, and is now under consideration, are from 90-day men. They claim that they entered the Army; some of them served no longer——

Mr. KING. They were mustered out.

Mr. SMOOT. Some of them were, and therefore they have suffered just as much as men who have served longer, and therefore they ought to be entitled to the same pension as the men who, under the provisions of my bill, receive $10 more than they do. I will go into that in detail as soon as my colleague is through.

Mr. KING. The position of Gen. SHERWOOD seems to me to be sounder, and certainly to be juster, than the position just contended for by my distinguished colleague.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, Gen. SHERWOOD introduced in the House the first pension bill granting a dollar a day to every soldier who served in the Civil War, irrespective of age, and irrespective of length of service; and he undertook to pass such a bill through the House of Representatives.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, Gen. SHERWOOD's position, as he confessed it to me, and as his correspondence which I have before me indicates, is in favor of a recognition of length of service, as well as consideration for age. In a letter to Senator WALSH, Gen. SHERWOOD makes this statement:

> During the last year of the war, when raising recruits, President Lincoln called for a million men; one call was for 500,000, another call for 300,000, and another for 200,000. This was in 1864. Many of these men were called for one year, and some for six months, and some for 90 days. The 90-days men were usually called on to guard lines of transportation. The draft law called for men between the ages of 18 and 45, and a good many of these men called out in 1864, who saw no service and were never at the front, are older than the old veterans who enlisted in 1861 and served during the entire war. Hence, you will see by granting a pension based solely on age, you will, in a majority of cases, grant a greater pension to the 90-days men, who had no service at the front, than the old veterans, like myself, who was in 42 battles and 123 days under fire. I served four months as a private at $11 per month, and was mustered out as a brigadier general.

Mr. SMOOT. We all do that, and that has been the policy of pension legislation ever since the 11th day of May, 1912. That is what the so-called Smoot bill provides, age and length of service, notwithstanding what Gen. SHERWOOD says in his letter to the chairman of the committee. I am sorry to say that Gen. SHERWOOD did not read the bill, or else he certainly did not understand it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, obviously there ought to be a distinction in paying pensions to soldiers.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a distinction.

Mr. KING. The man who was in the Army for 30 days or 90 days certainly ought not to receive as much as the man who fought for his country for four years unless—and I make this distinction—he received wounds or injuries that would take him out of the class, which for want of a better term I will call service class.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that the existing laws take him out of that class. If he has lost an arm, he gets so much; if he has lost a leg, he gets so much; if he has lost an eye, he gets so much; and this bill will never affect him.

Mr. KING. Oh, I understand that. I was making that distinction because the broad statement that preceded the last qualification might have been misunderstood. Of course, I am familiar with the law which makes provision for those who suffered disabilities and wounds and I understand the basis of pensioning soldiers falling within this category, but I recur to the statement I made a moment ago. If the question of justice cuts any figure in pension legislation there obviously ought to be some distinction between pensions granted to men who merely served 30 days or 90 days and pensions granted to those who were in the Army three or four years. The Senate bill grants a larger increase relatively to the 90-day men than it does to the men who were in the Army for several years.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator makes that statement on what was written by Gen. SHERWOOD. I want to say to the Senator that the increase given in the pension for length of service under the Senate provision is exactly in the same proportion as that given in the law of May 11, 1912. It is true that in the Senate bill there is a general increase to $30 wherever a person served 90 days, and in the House bill it is $25. There is the difference between the two. The pension in the Senate bill is $5 more than in the House bill for service beginning at 90 days; but the increases in the Senate provision begin with $32, $35, $38, and $40, and the pensions in the House provision increase in about the same proportion.

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, I make this statement, based upon the records and upon the evidence submitted by Gen. SHERWOOD. The Senate bill, by placing all soldiers below 72 years of age in one class, practically abandons the age-and-service distinction in the case of 160,000 pensioners, nearly one-half of the entire Civil War roll. These figures are based upon the last report of the Commissioner of Pensions, and, as stated, in that class will be found men who served only 90 days, and then not upon the battle line, but in mere police duty or guarding railroad tracks remote from the scene of battle. By the provisions of the Senate bill a soldier 71 years of age who served 4 years will be given the same pension as the soldier 62 or 65 years of age who served only 90 days.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator is certainly mistaken. He does not know what the Senate bill is, or he would not make any such statement as that. It is true that the Senate bill provides that all men who served 90 days shall have a pension of $30 per month. It is true that the House bill provides that all men who served 90 days in the Army, irrespective of whether they were ever injurd or not, shall receive $25. The difference between the two bills is the $5 a month. That is the difference between the two bills as to that class of men. Now, the same thing applies to the present law. It is not a question now of how long a man served, if he served over 90 days. His age then counts, and then the length of service counts, as to whether the pension shall be increased over the minimum amount of $18 for men 70 years old. Whatever increase there is over $18 for men over 70 years old is the increase up to $30 under the Senate bill and $25 under the House bill; but both bills recognize the age and the service. Those are the facts in the case as to the two bills.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, notwithstanding what my colleague has said, I repeat that the Senate bill throws into one class approximately 160,000 men——

Mr. SMOOT. So does the House bill.

Mr. KING. And that within that class will be found 90-day men and men who served in the war for a period of one year or more, and they get the same compensation, so that, as Gen. SHERWOOD said, there is a discrimination.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I know that my colleague does not want to make a statement that can not be borne out. I just want to call his attention to what the bill says, and then he will plainly see that that can not possibly be right. Somebody has informed him wrongly.

That from and after the passage of this amendment the rate of pension for any person who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War, now on the roll or hereafter to be placed on the pension roll and entitled to receive a less rate than hereinafter provided, shall be $30 per month.

Now—

In case such person has reached the age of 72 years and served six months, the rate shall be $32 per month; one year, $35 per month; one and a half years, $38 per month; two years or over, $40 per month.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that under the Senate bill those under 72 years of age are thrown into the one class?

Mr. SMOOT. They are thrown into the $30 class just the same as the House bill throws them into the $25 class. It is exactly the same principle. There is not a particle of difference.

Mr. KING. Beginning at 70 in the House bill and 72 in the Senate bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and if the Senator would carry out his idea as to the Senate bill providing too much of an increase, if we cut it down to 70 years, it would make a difference of between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000 more. Different posts of the Grand Army of the Republic throughout the country wanted it 70 years, but I could not cut it down to 70 years and take in all, because I thought the increase would be too much. So we compromised on 72 years, but if it had been 70 years I say to my colleague it would have cost a great deal more, at least $7,000,000 to $8,000,000 more, per annum.

Mr. KING. I feel confident, after a limited investigation of this subject, that the statement made by Gen. SHERWOOD that—it is also manifestly unfair to the veterans of advanced age who served from a year to the entire period of the war to give them comparatively small increases, while the men who enlisted in 1864 and 1865 and served in many cases only 90 days, are given increases of from 75 to 100 per cent. Yet this would be the effect of the bill as amended by the Senate committee—is borne out by the facts.

In speaking of the Senate bill Gen. SHERWOOD states: "The short-term soldiers receive an increase of about double that of the long-term soldiers, which has created a good deal of dissatisfaction. The increase should be even with all classes of soldiers, and a bill that increases the pension received by short-term soldiers out of proportion to what the long-term soldiers would receive would be regarded as generally unfair, inequitable, and unpatriotic."

There is no question, Mr. President, but what some of the short-term soldiers did heroic service in sanguinary battles, and there is no question but what the militiamen called by President Lincoln in the latter part of 1864 and those who served only 90 days would have given the same splendid and heroic service as all other soldiers if the demand had been made of them. But it is true that most of the soldiers called into service shortly before the termination of the war served in positions that did not call for fighting. They were used to guard railroad lines and property of the Government, in many instances at points far distant from the fighting line. They were absent from home but for a short time. They encountered no dangers and experienced but slight privations. While they are entitled to all credit and praise for what they did do and for what they were willing to do, I can not reconcile myself to the view that they are entitled to the same pensions, the same financial rewards from the Government, as those men who fought upon many bloody battle fields and who for years contended for the supremacy of the Union. It seems to me there should be a distinction made. But I repeat that the Senate bill places in one class approximately 160,000 of those whose names are upon the pension rolls, and that a large part of that number consists of men who served but 90 days, or a short time in excess of that period, and that all found within the class receive the same rating and obtain the same increase. As I have before stated, another serious defect in the Senate amendment is found in its failure to provide for the veterans who actually incurred disabilities either by wounds, injury, or disease in the service, and who are now pensioned under the general law. Of course, one obtaining a pension under the general law, and who finds himself entitled to a higher rate under the Senate bill, would by making application obtain the benefits of the Senate bill even if he did not automatically pass under the provisions of the same. But no just provision is made in the Senate amendment for this class of soldiers, while many younger men who were called into the service late in the year 1864, and many of whom were not mustered into service until November and December in that year, and, indeed, in some instances, not until March, 1865, and whose length of service was only 90 days or a few days additional, would receive under the Senate bill increases of from 50 to 90 and 95 per cent, and such would be true though they received no injuries, suffered no disabilities, and participated in no battles.

Mr. President, I submit that the House bill, which was, as I understand, unanimously passed by the House, contains provisions more satisfactory than the Senate bill. As I have heretofore indicated, the American people are ready and willing to do justice to the brave men who made supreme sacrifices to save our Nation. Speaking for myself, I am in favor of liberal pensions for all who received wounds and injuries and incurred disabilities in the line of duty. Those who have so suffered, and whose opportunities for participating in the activities of life have been impaired, should be most generously cared for by a grateful people. And those who for years gave their service and risked their lives in the mighty conflict that tried the souls of men should receive most generous treatment.

I confess that I do not feel that the obligation is so strong upon the Government to make such contributions to those who served but for a few months, who suffered but few privations, who incurred no risk, who received no wounds, and who suffered from no disabilities attributable to military service. In my opinion, there is ground for a distinction in such cases, and the House bill recognizes the distinction to which I have referred; the Senate bill does not.

Mr. President, I shall ask the Senate to adopt this amendment to the Senate bill. Then I shall offer that part of the amendment requiring the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to transmit to the Commissioner of Pensions a list of all pensioners having an income in excess of $1,000 as an amendment to the House bill for the purpose of perfecting that, and then at the appropriate time I shall ask the Senate to reject the amendment offered by the Senate committee and to support the bill passed by the House as thus amended.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, during the little time I shall occupy this morning in explaining the Senate bill I was in hopes there would be a fairly good attendance in the Senate, for I am quite sure that if Senators understood just what this bill provides for the veterans of the Civil War, and compared it with what we have already done for our soldiers engaged in the present war, there would not be a vote against it in this body.

I am going to take time enough, Mr. President, this morning to call particular attention to our liberality to our soldiers, which I approved, as I did when the war-risk insurance bill was up for consideration, so that not only Senators interested in it now but hereafter can refer to it and by comparison defend any vote that they may cast to-day to increase the pensions of Civil War veterans to the amount that is provided for in the pending bill.

Mr. President, the most that has been said by way of criticism of the Senate bill is that we have stricken from the House bill the provision that gave Civil War veterans now the inmates of a national soldiers' home the benefit of the increase in pension, and, again, that we have stricken out the provision that wherever there is a soldier of the Civil War whose income exceeds a thousand dollars he shall not be entitled to the increase provided.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that nearly 90 per cent of the old soldiers who are at present at a soldiers' home went there because their earning capacity had failed them, and also the little pension that they were receiving was not sufficient to buy food enough to feed himself and his wife and children. The only thing that a soldier in that condition could do was to go to a soldiers' home and let all his pension go direct to the keeping of his wife and children.

The high cost of living affects the soldier's wife and child, whether he be in the soldiers' home or not. It is admitted in the House report that the cost of maintaining the soldiers' home has increased from $240 per year for each veteran to over $400. So the cost of living has increased for a soldier's wife and children at home; and in most cases the veteran would not be at a soldiers' home if he could help it; he would prefer to live with his family; but he can not do so on the pension the Government of the United States has paid him in the past, for it has been scarcely enough to keep body and soul of his wife together. If every veteran was alone in the world, if he had no dependents upon him, if he had no wife nor children to care for, the argument made to-day against a soldier living in a soldiers' home receiving an increase in pension would be correct.

I want to say now that if the Senate bill is passed many of the old soldiers now in the homes, particularly those who have served two years and over, who will receive $40 per month under the provisions of the bill will try to eke out an existence at home and leave the soldiers' home. They are not there because they want to be there; they do not like to be away from wife and children and to have it said by unthinking people they are paupers. God knows that men who fought and bled for their country and saved it and its institutions, and now the greatest country in all the world, are entitled to recognition and gratitude on the part of our Government.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator, for my information, what is the average age now of the surviving soldiers of the Civil War.

Mr. SMOOT. The average age is a little under 75 years.

And what, Mr. President, does this little increase amount to? In eight years from now on Decoration Day in any part of the country an old soldier of the Civil War will be pointed to as a living miracle, one who has had a charmed life.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator another question? Does the Senator know how many soldiers are passing per year to the great beyond?

Mr. SMOOT. Last year, in the year 1917, there were 9.2 per cent of the soldiers living on the 1st day of January, 1917, passed away during that year, and every year as the years increase that percentage will grow by leaps and bounds. During this month there will be over 3,000 of them pass to the great beyond.

Mr. KENYON. So whatever we do we had better do now.

Mr. SMOOT. We had better do it now and do it quickly.

Mr. President, the proposition of paying pensions to old soldiers in the soldiers' home is not a new question. I have been on the Pension Committee for 16 years, and among the very first things considered after I was a member of that committee was just such a proposition as that before the Senate now, first, to prevent any soldier who went to a soldiers' home from receiving a pension; second, if the soldier had a $1,000 income, he was not to receive a pension.

I take it, Mr. President, that any Senator who is in favor of recognizing the old soldier for the service he did for his country, who believes in pensions at all, will vote against any such proposition. Why pauperize them? I do not refer to the man who has a $1,000,000 income a year, referred to to-day, if there is such a man, nor to the thousands of old soldiers of the Civil War who are not receiving a pension to-day, who never asked for one, and never will ask for one, but the many thousands who are dependent upon their pension to live. If a $1,000 limit is agreed to, what does it mean? It means that every man who shall draw a pension in the future acknowledges to the world that he is the next thing to a pauper. I want to say that the Government of the United States owes it to the veterans that an increase in their pensions be granted under existing conditions, and let us stop and think if they were fighting to-day how much better off would they be than when they were fighting for the very life and existence of our country.

Mr. President, I received a letter from a veteran the other day about this $1,000 limitation. It will take but a few moments to read it, and I am going to do so.

JERSEYVILLE, ILL., May 28, 1918.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Two days ago I sent you a letter regarding the pension bill which you have introduced in the Senate and neglected to state in that letter that the reason I am taking the interest I am in this matter is that I was the first post commander of the Lowe Post, G. A. R., in this city, and the boys naturally look to me to help them out, and they feel it is hardly fair to make a question of how much a man earns to secure him a pension, because, as I previously stated, it practically pauperizes him; whoever receives the pension shows to the world he is not able to take care of himself, which some of us would hesitate to do. It should be remembered that the Civil War veterans had no attention paid to them as is being done to-day with the soldiers. There were no Red Cross, hospitals, Y. M. C. A.'s, or anything of that character to lighten his burden, neither was his family taken care of. In my own case, my mother was left a widow with five children, three girls and two boys, I being the baby, and I enlisted at 16, my brother also went into the Government service as ship carpenter, he being 20, leaving mother alone, and the Government at that time paid no attention whatsoever to her or took no interest whether she starved to death or not, which is altogether different in these days, and I am thankful the present method prevails instead of the one under which we served, but don't put the old soldiers, who went through the hardships which they did, on the pauper list. Either give him a chance to get his pension because of a grateful Nation or cut it out, and do not treat him as a tramp at the back door whom you feed because you sympathize with him because of his hunger.

Mr. President, no one could express it better than this old soldier has done. The Commissioner of Pensions has stated not once but many times that if this provision is put into the bill the act will be hard of administration. The old soldiers themselves, in a bill before Congress not many years ago, insisted that a provision be incorporated preventing a woman of loose character from receiving a pension as a widow of a Civil War veteran. What was the result? Mr. President, nearly $500,000 was spent in examinations under that law, as an investigation was made of every case of a widow who applied for a pension to learn if she was such a character. Untold delay was the result. I have letters from men who had experience in passing through that kind of examinations, the reading of which would make the blood of every Senator boil with indignation at the questions that were asked of pure American women—questions that were an insult to womanhood.

Adopt the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. KING] and it will mean delay after delay. I do not want it understood the present commissioner would cause unnecessary delay, because his heart for the old soldier is in the right place. He does not want the pending amendment adopted, and I will take my oath now that there are not a hundred old soldiers in the United States who want it.

Mr. President, why this opposition to a little increase in the pension of Civil War veterans? I can not understand it. I know it is not sufficient, but I believe that it is the most that can be secured for them under existing conditions, and whatever help is to come to them must come quickly.

I say now that if we pass this bill instead of passing special bills carrying special rates for individual cases this measure will take care of them, and there will be fewer special pension bills pass Congress in the future, and that will be in cases where the soldier is absolutely helpless, where he requires attendance night and day. As I stated the other day, the rule of the Senate is such that in cases like that we grant $50 a month. The Senate bill does not touch a case like that, but those will be the principal cases that will be passed through Congress by special act.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have the Senator state to the Senate how the compensation that is contemplated to be given in the shape of insurance to our soldiers now compares with the increase which is proposed in this bill? We surely should treat the aged veterans as liberally as we do our young active soldiers and their dependents.

Mr. SMOOT. I will gladly do it, and I will do it right now. In answer to the Senator's question, I take pleasure in calling attention of the Senate to the conditions existing to-day. I am not criticizing them, but I want the country to know what our Government is doing for the soldier who is engaged in the present war as compared with the soldier of the Civil War.

First, Mr. President, there is a family allowance. Let me call attention to what that allowance is. There is an allowance in the case of a man and his wife, including a former wife divorced, and to his child or children. If there be a wife but no child, $15 is allowed; if there be a wife and one child, $25; if there be a wife and two children, $32.50, with $5 per month additional for each additional child. That is the family allowance. Did the Civil War veterans have a family allowance? Was there ever a cent given to them on that account? We all know that there was not.

If there be no wife, but one child, the allowance is $5; if there be no wife, but two children, the allowance is $12.50; if there be no wife, but three children, then the allowance is $20; if there be no wife, but four children, it is $30, and $5 per month additional for each additional child.

Mr. President, this allowance does not stop with the wife and children, but it goes to the mother or father or the stepmother or the stepfather; it goes to almost all relatives or any relatives that may be dependent upon the soldier. The allowance is granted whether the soldier leaves the confines of the United States or goes abroad. The soldier may never see a trench, unless it be one dug in the United States.

But over and above the family allowance, Mr. President, there is what is termed compensation for death or disability. I had a case called to my attention only the other day by the War-Risk Insurance Bureau of a colored soldier from South Carolina. He had a wife and five children. From the day he entered the Army he received a family allowance of $47.50 a month. He was sent "over there" and later killed in France. He was at that time carrying an insurance of $10,000. Mr. President, we are giving our soldiers insurance at actual cost as in times of peace. The soldier no doubt received his insurance for about $6.70 a thousand, or $67 a year for the $10,000 insurance. There is no other Government that has insured its soldiers engaged in this war at a rate much less than $50 per thousand.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to say to the Senator that I know of a policy of insurance that was taken out by one of the soldiers who has gone to France. The increase of his premium was five times what it previously had been in times of peace.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; and that was a special rate. Canada is asking $50 a thousand, and we could only get two companies in the United States to bid upon policies for soldiers at that rate. Their bid was $50, the same as that imposed in Canada.

The colored soldier to whom I have referred offered his life, and he died for his country, and was entitled to recognition, and was so recognized. His family, all the time he was in this country, received $47.50 per month family allowance. As soon as he was killed what did they receive? The widow is paid $57.50 a month under the death provision of the compensation clause. Not only that, but for 240 months we shall continue to pay her $25 a month making $82.50 a month that she will receive. Is there anyone who will say that a man, 58 years after serving his country as every Civil War veteran did, who is now on the brink of the grave, to whom manual labor is impossible, and in view of the high cost of living—is there anyone who will say that such a man should not receive $30 a month from this Government for the few years that he has yet to live—and the years of those veterans are numbered beyond a doubt? If a soldier incurs a disability in the present war, the same as hundreds of thousands of Civil War soldiers incurred, under the war-risk insurance act he will be given more than if he had been killed.

The report of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau only the other day showed that we had over $16,500,000,000 of insurance in force. If we get into this war on such a scale as it seems we must, if we send two or three million men to France, and they suffer death and disabilities as the English and French soldiers have suffered, can Senators not see what this insurance is going to cost the Government of the United States? Yet Senators hesitate and criticize because we are asking at this late day, 54 years after the close of the war, the little increase provided for in the bill as reported by the Senate committee.

Why, Mr. President, while we are talking here upon this bill since its introduction into this body there have been over 4,000 of these men who have passed to the great beyond.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question or two.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is a feature about your bill which I think is very admirable, and that is the recognition that a greater pension should be given to soldiers on account of the length of service. I know the Senator from Utah has been a member of the Committee on Pensions for many years, and that he is very thoroughly acquainted with all the laws relating to pensions. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not there is any law now upon the statute books that recognizes length of service as governing the amount of pension the soldier is to receive?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that the act of May 11, 1912, recognizes the soldier's age and the length of his service in determining the amount of his pension.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator state about what that is?

Mr. SMOOT. I have the tables right here, and I will be glad to furnish the Senator the figures. Of course, when that law was passed there were only a few soldiers who were less than 62 years of age, and in fact the House committee report on the pending bill shows that in 1918 there were only 2,711 soldiers of the Civil War who are less than 72 years of age, so that I think I had better begin at the rates for soldiers between 70 and 75 years as provided for in that law.

Under the act of May 11, 1912, a soldier 70 years old who served 90 days was given $18 a month; if he served 6 months, $19 per month; if he served 1 year, $20 per month; if he served 1½ years, $21.50 per month; if he served 2 years, $23 per month; if he served 2½ years, $24 per month; and if he served 3 years or over, $25 per month. If he had reached the age of 75 years and had served 90 days, he was given $21 per month; if he had served 6 months, $22.50 per month; if he had served 1 year, $24 per month; if he had served 1½ years, $27 per month; if he had served 2 years or over, $30 per month. In other words, $30 was the maximum rate that was provided by the act of May 11, 1912.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And previous to that time there was no distinction between the man who had served for a limited time and the man who had served for a long period in the war?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever. He applied at the Pension Office, and, if the pension was granted, it was generally granted upon the basis of what he undertook to prove as to his financial condition and as to his physical condition. It was left entirely to the man and the Pension Bureau.

Why, Mr. President, in connection with the Civil War pensions, do Senators stop to think that the first pension that was ever granted to the soldiers of that war was only $4? And then when it was raised to $6 they thought that was a very large amount. I wish to say to Senators now that during the time that $6 was given to those soldiers they could have purchased almost as much with that sum as they can to-day with a pension of $30 a month.

Under the act of May 11, 1912, only six years ago, there was granted what is called a service-and-age pension, and every pension bill that has been considered since that time has been based upon that principle. All of the Grand Army of the Republic men from one end of the country to the other approve of the plan. I have the resolutions of nearly every Grand Army of the Republic post in the United States approving of what is known as the Smoot pension bill, the bill for which I am asking the Senate to vote as a substitute for the Sherwood bill, passed by the other House.

I do not wish to take the time of the Senate now to read the correspondence from Gen. SHERWOOD to the chairman of the Pension Committee of the Senate; but I will say the correspondence shows he must never have read the bill; or, if so, did not understand it. I do, however, wish to refer to the circular letter which he has sent to all Senators, to which reference has been made by my colleague [Mr. KING] to-day, and which has been pointed to as evidence why the Smoot bill should not be approved. In that circular letter Gen. SHERWOOD says:

Particularly at this time it would cause very bad feeling among both the Civil War veterans and the people abroad in the country if Congress were to do an injustice to those survivors of the Civil War who actually incurred wounds or disabilities in line of duty during the war. The vital fault in the Smoot amendment is that it completely overlooks this class of pensioners, who are clearly and eminently entitled to at least equal consideration with those who are now pensioned for age and service. Under the provisions of the House bill the $25 per month minimum rate and 30 per cent increase is made to apply to these pensioners as well.

Mr. President, there is not a Senator who does not know that if a man has lost an arm he gets a larger sum than is provided for in the pending bill. If he loses an eye, he gets nearly twice as much; if he loses a leg, he gets nearly twice as much. I doubt whether there is a single Civil War soldier in the United States who has received injuries that could not go to the Pension Office and get more than either the Sherwood bill or the Smoot bill provides. He says, further:

The Secretary of the Interior and the Pension Bureau officials have told me that they consider the present system of pensions for age and service the most satisfactory ever enacted.

Of course it is the most satisfactory system ever enacted, and both bills recognize age and service.

The House bill proposes proportionate increases based on age and service, whereas the Smoot bill changes this method against the interest of the veteran soldiers of long service.

Why, Mr. President, the only difference is that the Sherwood bill starts at $25, while the Senate bill starts with $30, and the Senate bill increases the pension according to the length of service exactly in the same proportion as does the present law. The trouble with this letter is that Gen. SHERWOOD can not find a Grand Army of the Republic post in the United States that will agree with him.

Criticism has been made of the 90-day service man. If I had the time I could cite a list of battles fought during the Civil War, some of them the most bloody battles of the war, which were fought by 90-day men. I call attention to the One hundred and fifty-eighth Massachusetts. In that organization 1,158 men, as I remember, started from Boston Common, but before their service of 90 days was over they had all been killed save 78; and if a man is wounded, whether he served five days or five years, the present law takes care of him.

So far as soldiers in soldiers' homes are concerned, the Government is paying the increase in cost of living, as stated, so they suffer no personal loss on account of the advance in living expenses. No; they do not suffer for lack of care, but their wives and their children suffer, and, as I stated, 90 per cent of those that have gone to the soldiers' homes have gone there because the pittance they are receiving to-day will not buy sufficient food to keep the bodies and souls of their wives and children together. They do not go there because they want to go there; but when it comes to the question of who shall be fed, and the old soldier knows there is a way provided by which he can be fed and cared for at a soldiers' home created by Congress and paid for by a gracious Government, and all that he would eat if he were at home will go to feed his wife and his children, he accepts the inevitable and enters a home.

If the Senate bill passes, I know that there will be many of them who will go back to their own homes and try to eke out an existence as long as they live. We talk about the high cost of living, and it is a reality; but it does not apply, Mr. President, to the workingmen of the country as it does to the old soldier. The veteran's earning capacity is nearly gone and will never improve. Few want him. He is not at his best either bodily or mentally. Every cent of increased cost of living falls upon his loved ones without a chance of an increased compensation to the soldier.

Our railroad employees are all taken care of by increased wages. The employees in our steel mills and our factories and upon our farms are all taken care of, but the old soldier can not be taken care of unless it is by an increase in his pension.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator another question. In the former part of his speech the Senator stated that the heart of the Commissioner of Pensions was with this bill. Has there been a formal indorsement of it by the commissioner?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Colorado, as I said to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] when he asked me the same question when the bill first came up, that it is always understood by the Committee on Pensions, in referring any bill to the Commissioner of Pensions, that it is for information, and nothing else. That has been the rule of the committee ever since I have been on it, and I think ever since the committee was organized. The question is not asked whether the commissioner approves the bill or not; but I want to say to the Senator that I have not the least doubt but that he does.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Can the Senator say that the approval of the department exists from knowledge outside of a formal report? I hope it does.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no doubt but that it does.

Mr. President, just a few more words and I shall close.

I have been attending the gatherings at Arlington on Memorial Day for the last 12 years. I attended the exercises held there on May 30 of this year, and I could not help but notice that even upon the platform there were very few seats occupied by old soldiers. I remember the time when every seat upon the platform at Arlington, with the exception of a very few occupied by invited guests, was occupied by members of the G. A. R. A few years ago I spoke at Arlington on Memorial Day, and I noticed in the audience quite a number of the old soldiers upon the front benches. The other day you could almost count them upon the fingers of your hands. Old Father Time has with his finger touched them in a way to let them and all the world know that their days are but few; and, Senators, the few that are left are asking you to-day, they are pleading with you, to give them the small pittance asked for in this Senate bill. They are asking you not to load it down by amendments, not to make it so that it is impossible of administration without delays and endless delays. Knowing that their days are numbered, knowing that we have done more for every soldier who is fighting for liberty to-day, can we refuse their request?

I come to you to-day, Senators, and I know whereof I speak. The veterans are almost a unit for this legislation; and I want to say also to the Senate that when this bill passes it will be the last general bill for the Civil War veterans, in my opinion, and I am quite sure it will, for I do not think it will ever go to conference, for if the House had had a chance to vote on such a bill the bill that was passed by the House, in my opinion, never would have passed. The House will have a chance to vote on this measure, and I hope by their vote they will say to the old soldier in this country, "Your declining years shall be made as happy as this little increase in pensions will enable them to be. At least we do not want to see you or your loved ones suffer for the want of bread." That is just about what this bill will do and nothing more.

Therefore, Mr. President, I do hope every amendment that is offered to the Senate bill will be voted down, and that it will be substituted for the House bill, and go to the House, and let us see what the House will do with it; and I promise you all that you will have the thanks of all the old veterans that are left, and I believe there will be a peace and a rest for your conscience that will make you satisfied with the action of this day. I shall always feel satisfied with my effort in securing assistance from the Government for the veterans and widows of the Civil War. May God bless them in their declining years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Hollis	Nugent	Smoot
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Owen	Sterling
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Sutherland
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Swanson
Curtis	Kellogg	Phelan	Thompson
Dillingham	Kenyon	Pittman	Townsend
Fernald	King	Poindexter	Underwood
France	Kirby	Pomerene	Vardaman
Gronna	Lenroot	Shafroth	Warren
Guion	McKellar	Sheppard	Watson
Hale	McNary	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott
Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Ga.

Mr. KING. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is detained on official business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

Mr. SMOOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be again stated for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] offers the following amendment:

That no pensioner shall be entitled to receive any benefits under the provisions of this act for any period during which he shall be an inmate of any State or National soldiers' home; and the provisions of this act shall not apply to any pensioner whose net annual income from all sources, including his pension, is $1,000 or more, to be determined by the income-tax reports on file in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who shall annually on the 1st day of July transmit to the Commissioner of Pensions a list of all pensioners having an income, as shown by such reports, in excess of the said sum of $1,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment just stated by the Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on official business. Were he present he would vote "nay."

Mr. PITTMAN (when Mr. HENDERSON's name was called). I announce the absence of the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] on account of death in his family. He will be necessarily absent for several days.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. NEW's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] on official business. Were he present he would vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I will transfer that pair in his absence to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], which I transfer to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I understand he would vote "nay" on this amendment. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. WEEKS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent from the city. He has a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If present my colleague would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. On this question I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is necessarily absent, to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], which I transfer to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. KING. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bankhead	King	Phelan	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Kirby	Pittman	Smith, Md.
Culberson	McKellar	Pomerene	Swanson
Hardwick	Martin	Ransdell	Underwood

Goff	McLean	Thomas
Gore	New	Tillman

So Mr. KING's amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. I offer an amendment to the original House bill, to add at the end of section 3 the following——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will permit the Chair to interrupt him, the Chair is informed that the amendment is now pending offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

Mr. KING. I think the vote on the amendment just offered is really decisive of the vote upon the Trammell amendment. The Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] is not here, and I will take the liberty in his behalf of withdrawing that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida is withdrawn, without objection.

Mr. MYERS. May one Senator withdraw an amendment offered by another Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be done without objection.

Mr. MYERS. I object. I want to vote on the Trammell amendment.

Mr. KING. I shall not insist on withdrawing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 7, amend the proposed amendment of the committee by adding, after the words "public or private," the following:

Provided further, That the increase herein provided shall not be extended or granted to any pensioner who has an annual income of $1,000 or more in addition to his or her pension allowance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 3 of the original bill strike out the period and insert a comma and the following:

to be determined by the income-tax reports on file in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who shall annually on the 1st day of July transmit to the Commissioner of Pensions a list of all pensioners having an income, as shown by such reports, in excess of the said sum of $1,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry. What amendment was made to the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] offered an amendment, on page 4, line 7, after the word "private" and before the period, to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for presenting any claim to the Bureau of Pensions or securing any pension under this act, except in applications for original pension by persons who have not heretofore received a pension.

Mr. SMOOT. I will simply say that that is a copy of the provision in nearly all the pension laws that have been passed within the last 10 years. It should have gone in the amendment, but was overlooked.

The SECRETARY. Also, on page 3, line 22, the word "amendment" was stricken from the bill, and the word "act" inserted.

Mr. KING. The question is, I understand, whether the House bill shall be accepted or whether the Senate bill shall be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call attention to one other amendment found on page 4, line 6, to strike out the word "amendment" and insert the word "act."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? Was the amendment which was suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to include the veterans of the Mexican War incorporated in the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it was not accepted, and I will say to the Senator that I think it is very much better to leave it out. I called the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to it and requested him to take it up in another bill rather than to try to put it on this bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. A parliamentary inquiry: Did the Senator from New Hampshire actually offer the amendment, or did he merely make the suggestion?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator gave notice in the Senate that he would offer the amendment, and I asked him not to offer the amendment, that I would look the matter up later, and the Senator withdrew his amendment at that time.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas offers an amendment, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 1, strike out the figures "30" and in lieu thereof insert the figures "40"; page 4, line 3, strike out the figures "32" and insert "42"; page 4, line 4, strike out the figures "35" and insert "45," and strike out "38" and insert "48"; page 4, line 5, strike out the figures "40" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "50," so as to make the section read as follows:

SEC. 6. That from and after the passage of this amendment the rate of pension for any person who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War, now on the roll or hereafter to be placed on the pension roll and entitled to receive a less rate than hereinafter provided, shall be $40 per month. In case such person has reached the age of 72 years and served 6 months, the rate shall be $42 per month; 1 year, $45 per month; 1½ years, $48 per month; 2 years or over, $50 per month: Provided, That this amendment shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, this amendment simply increases the amount provided in the substitute reported by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to conform to the provisions of the bill introduced by myself on April 6, 1918, Senate bill 4298, which I desire to have made a part of my remarks, as representing my views of proper legislation on this subject at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill introduced by Mr. THOMPSON April 6, 1918, is as follows:

"A bill (S. 4298) granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico.

"Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act any person who served not less than 60 days in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, shall, upon making proof of such facts, according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed on the pension roll and be entitled to receive a pension of $40 per month. In case such person has reached the age of 72 years and served six months, the rate shall be $42 per month; one year, $45 per month; one and one-half years, $48 per month; two years or over, $50 per month.

"That from and after the passage of this act any person who has served 60 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States in the War with Mexico, and has been honorably discharged therefrom, shall, upon making like proof of such service, be entitled to receive a pension of $50 per month.

"SEC. 2. That nothing herein contained shall prevent any pensioner or person entitled to a pension from prosecuting his claim and receiving a pension under any other general or special act: Provided, That no person shall receive a pension under any other law at the same time or for the same period that he is receiving a pension under the provisions of this act, and that no person who is now receiving, or shall hereafter receive, a greater pension under any other general or special law than he would be entitled to receive under the provisions herein, shall be pensionable under this act: Provided further, That membership in a Federal or State soldiers' home shall not render a soldier ineligible to pension under the provisions of this act or any other general or special law.

"SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act shall include any person who served during the late Civil War and who is now or may hereafter become entitled to pension under the acts of June 27, 1890, February 15, 1895, and the joint resolutions of July 1, 1902, and June 28, 1906, and the acts of January 29, 1887, March 3, 1891, and February 17, 1897.

"SEC. 4. That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in presenting any claim to the Bureau of Pensions, or securing any pension, under this act, except in applications for original pension by persons who have not heretofore received a pension.

"SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts, in so far as they conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed."

Mr. THOMPSON. I offer this amendment to help the old soldiers meet the great increase in the cost of living that has been urged by the author of the substitute as a reason for this legislation, and if at the same time it is intended to be the last word on pension legislation, as has been stated here, the amounts provided by the Smoot amendment are wholly inadequate, in my judgment, to keep pace with the constant increase in the cost of living.

Mr. President, we owe an everlasting debt of gratitude to the old soldiers. It can not be measured in dollars and cents. The valuable services rendered this country at the time of its greatest need should be fully appreciated by all who now enjoy the privileges and benefits of a prosperous and a happy life under the Stars and Stripes. To pledge one's life to any service is no small undertaking. To save the greatest Nation in the world and to settle forever the principle that the people of a republic can govern themselves is no small result. It counts for more to-day than ever before in all the history of the world.

As the soldiers of the Civil War saved this country, they have more than any other class of our citizens offered us now as a united Nation the opportunity, and enjoined upon us the duty, to save the world. These old soldiers stood by Lincoln in preserving the Union, which made it possible for the sons and grandsons of the soldiers who wore both the blue and the gray to stand by Wilson in saving the world. I have never had any sympathy with the man who claims that there is no legal obligation to pension the old soldiers. Technically this may be true, but there is a moral obligation to do so, which in the light of all the surrounding circumstances is a far greater obligation than a legal one. If my house were on fire and my own life and the lives of my family and my accumulations in property of a lifetime were in jeopardy, and the firemen would come and save my life and the lives of my family and my property, would anyone deny, if some unfortunate fireman was injured, say he lost his sight or was totally disabled, that I would not be morally bound to aid him all the rest of his life? Of course, there would be no legal obligation to do so, but——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. THOMPSON. Gladly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask the Senator if he can tell me how much his amendment will increase the total appropriation for pensions?

Mr. THOMPSON. As nearly as I can ascertain from the Pension Office, where I submitted this amendment, it will be about 25 per cent additional. It is simply a $10 raise, starting with $40 per month as the minimum for all soldiers with 90 days' service to their credit.

Mr. VARDAMAN. In millions of dollars how much would it be?

Mr. THOMPSON. In millions of dollars the estimate given me was about $50,000,000, while the bill under consideration I understand carries about $35,000,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Has the Senator any idea how many of these pensioners are still living?

Mr. THOMPSON. The reports from the Pension Bureau will show. I have an idea how many in Kansas are living, and I am proud that there are so many, as they rank with our best citizens. I know in round numbers there are about 25,000 soldiers and widows of soldiers on the pension rolls in Kansas, and I am glad of it because they are all good citizens and may well be regarded as a roll of honor.

As I was saying, Mr. President, when interrupted by my genial friend, the Senator from Mississippi, in citing the case of a fire, there would be no legal obligation to pay the debt for an injured fireman in saving my life or saving my property, but there would be a moral obligation greater than a legal one. The man could not recover judgment in a court, but no one would dare face his Maker at the close of life's battle denying the moral obligation to do so, and this principle applies with much more force when it comes to saving the life of our great Nation, which has enjoined upon it to-day the greater duty of saving the world.

I am heartily in sympathy with this legislation, but, as stated in the beginning, I believe that these amounts are inadequate, especially if it is the intention that this should be, as was said here, the last word on pension legislation. Taking into consideration the enormous increase, by leaps and bounds, in the cost of living, the amounts that I have proposed are none too large to enable the old soldiers and their families to live in comfort and decency the rest of their lives. They are certainly entitled to this consideration. Their days are numbered. The average age of the old soldier is now about 74 years, so there can not be many more years that this obligation to these brave men who accomplished so much for our country will have to be paid. Bear in mind the rates proposed by me are the rates followed by the Pension Office and by the Pension Committees in the case of private bills. Why not, then, in a general bill provide for all the old soldiers on the same basis we figure that a man is entitled to in an individual case and end the necessity for special legislation of this character?

I therefore ask for the adoption of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kansas has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. KING and Mr. SMOOT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if there is any provision in the bill as amended to take care of the soldiers of the Mexican War?

Mr. SMOOT. No; there is no provision in this measure to take care of the Mexican War veterans. I will say to the Senator that there are very few of them. I understand that a great majority, and there are not many more than 200 of them, are receiving rates that are equal to the rates provided for in this bill. I did not want to load the bill with anything other than just the pensions for Civil War veterans, and therefore I hope the Senator will not offer any amendment to it at this time. If in the future there is any doubt as to whether they are not taken care of, I assure the Senator from Kansas that I shall gladly join with him and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] in making provision for them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have had a good many letters from Indian war veterans out in our section of the country who feel that they should be given more recognition by the Government. I ask the Senator who is the author of the substitute what objection there would be to proposing an amendment of that sort on this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to be perfectly frank with the Senator and with the Senate in saying that I believe the rates that are in the Senate bill now are the highest rates that will be supported by a majority vote in this and the other House. I hope there will be no amendment to the bill, because the veterans of the Civil War want relief and they want it quickly, and I hope the Senator will not in any way jeopardize the early passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator is correct in that view, and that is one reason why I did not offer an amendment carrying out the provisions of the bill which I introduced some time ago relating to the same matter that this bill covers. I do not desire to jeopardize the passage of this measure. I believe if we adopt a substitute it will probably be ratified in the other House without controversy, and that will make it the law, while if we should amend it further it would go to conference and the outcome would be uncertain. I believe the Spanish War veterans should have more recognition, and also the Indian war veterans, but I believe it would be better to allow those matters to come up as separate measures. Therefore, recognizing this situation, I shall not offer an amendment along those lines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on official business. Were he present he would vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair as on the last vote and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. NEW's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] on official business. Were he present he would vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I make the announcement again of the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and will vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when the name of Mr. WEEKS was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent from the city. He has a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK].

Mr. McCUMBER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who is necessarily absent from the Senate. I therefore withhold my vote. Were I at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of official business.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 22, as follows:

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMOOT, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico,' approved May 11, 1912."

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 235, relative to the limitation of debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 235.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I desire to propound an informal parliamentary inquiry. The motion of the Senator from Alabama being made after 2 o'clock, it is debatable, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it is debatable.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then I will proceed to discuss it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. President, the pending motion before the Senate is my motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 235?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama is right. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, it is always with reluctance, not only because of warm personal friendship, but because of my great confidence in his judgment, that I take issue with any proposition which is presented by my distinguished friend from Alabama; but with reference to this particular matter I must take issue, and take sharp issue with him.

In my judgment, there is not the slightest reason for pressing this particular proposition at this particular moment. I quite concede that, if it were necessary in order to prosecute this war vigorously or to enact any measure that was necessary for its vigorous and adequate prosecution, the entire Senate, without division or exception, would be willing to do far more than sacrifice one of its rules or any part of its parliamentary procedure; but, Mr. President, it does not seem that such is the situation.

We have already been in this war for 14 months, and I challenge the Senator from Alabama or any other proponent of this resolution, or any Senator who intends to support it, to cite a single instance in which a single war measure has been unduly delayed or unnecessarily debated to the injury of the country or to the hurt of the prosecution of the war itself. I pause for reply. No reply is made, I take it, because none can be made.

During the 14 months of this war the American Congress has turned out an unprecedented volume of important and, indeed, in some respects indispensable legislation. It has appropriated vast and untold sums of money, unprecedented in the history of this or of any other country, without question and without murmur, for the prosecution of this war; it has conferred vast and unlimited powers, without precedent in the history of this country, and with but little precedent in the history of other countries, for the prosecution of this war. On no one of these matters has the debate been unduly protracted, unfairly extended, or has it had any other purpose or any other effect except to illuminate and in many instances to improve such measures.

The Senator from Alabama presents this proposition as a war measure; the language of the resolution so states it. I say, joining issue with him on the threshold of the question, that there is no war necessity here; that there is no war measure here. On the contrary, Mr. President, if the recital of facts which I have just made to the Senate, and of which I have invited contradiction, if contradiction be possible, is true, then there is neither necessity, occasion, nor excuse for the presentation of this resolution as a war measure.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we can ill afford at this time, with no excuse for it, with no occasion for it, and with no reason for it, to change the established rules of this body further than we have already done. Legislation that is the most important in the history of the country, far-reaching in its effects, touching fundamentally the rights and liberties of the American people and their property, has already been considered by this body. More legislation of the same or of an equally important character is bound to be considered in the near future by this body. Questions that are the gravest that can engage and command the consideration of a parliamentary body will be before this Senate. Certainly, in the absence of any purpose, in the absence of any design to unduly protract or to unduly prolong discussion, there is no occasion whatever for the Senate to lay aside that freedom of debate which has ever been its chiefest glory and its strongest weapon. The more important the questions that we are called upon to consider the more reason there is for real debate, for genuine discussion.

As the Senator from Alabama has well pointed out, we realize full well that at the other end of this Capitol, because of its numerous constituency, the numbers of the body sitting there, anything like free debate or general discussion or thorough sifting of the measures on the floor of the body is a practical impossibility. So, if there is to be on these momentous questions that are yet to come real debate in either branch of the American Congress, it must and can be here, and here alone.

If the time should come, if any Senator could reasonably state that he thought the time had come, when filibustering tactics, when obstructive measures had rendered it impossible to enact legislation necessary for the conduct of this war, the enactment of which was vital to our success, then I think we might well consider this proposition; but until that time does come, until that occasion does arise, it seems to me that the Senate would do well to proceed cautiously, slowly, and conservatively about this matter.

Mr. President, there is not so much difference, not fundamental in its construction at least, between this body and the old Senate when the Constitution was first formed. We may have a larger number of representatives, as suggested by the distinguished Senator—96 now instead of 26 then—but this body was always intended to be the conservative balance wheel of this system of ours. Here the States, without regard to their size or population, have equal representation, equal voice, and equal power. The individuals who sit here represent not so much a certain number of people as a certain political entity, a sovereignty in some respects at least, and, clothed with a representation of that character, from the beginning they have been given power that is not inconsiderable and that ought not to be thoughtlessly diminished or foolishly frittered away.

I have served at the other end of the Capitol with my distinguished friend from Alabama and with many other Members of this body, who sit on both sides of this Chamber, and we have seen there the perfection of that system to which we are rapidly approximating here—debate denied at the will or whim of the majority, amendments cut off at the pleasure of whatever faction happens to be in control, substantial rights denied for reasons of policy or of politics. Here free speech has been enthroned; here the right to real debate has existed and survived; and, as I said just now, that existence and that survival constitute not only the chief glory but the greatest power of this great body.

With one House, possibly necessarily so because of its size, put in a position where it is reduced to the practical operation of a machine, with the power of its individual Members almost gone, with individuality almost wholly stripped from them, except as they represent or operate the machine either of one party or of the other, we have seen organization and system brought to their climax in American politics. Here, Mr. President, whatever may have been the effect of a change in the manner in which the American Senators are elected, some of the traditions still live, and some of the olden practices still survive.

Senators may say in support of this proposition that it is necessary in order to cut off a filibuster of which less than two-thirds of the Senate does not approve. Some may contend, as did the Senator from Alabama, that it is necessary in order to enable the majority—and not a two-thirds majority—to work its will within a reasonable time and after reasonable debate.

Mr. President, in no other body in our Government, in no other part of our governmental machinery, except here, is there any substantial right for a minority. In most popular assemblies about the only substantial right the minority has is to be outvoted. Not even a reasonable amount of discussion can it secure, except by the consent of the majority. Not even a sensible amount of opportunity for amendments can it obtain, except by grace of the controlling faction. But here the fathers designedly placed a different sort of power. Here the men who framed the Constitution expressly intended and expressly stated that there should be a pause in the Government; that a minority that was strong enough to represent more than an individual prejudice or a personal view should have rights that could not be lightly overridden or carelessly denied, not only the right of reasonable discussion, not only the right of reasonable amendment, but also the right, if they were willing to take the responsibility, of halting for the moment some proposition that appeared to them extraordinary, and possibly extraordinarily dangerous. I am here to assert, with all the earnestness of which I am capable, and with all the sincerity that I feel on this great question, that it is a right that is most important in a free country, where liberty ordered by law is to prevail.

Ah, my colleagues from Southern States, I can remember when that right of the minority was asserted on this floor and in this body to save you from the odium of a force bill and to save your civilization from the hybridization. How any southern Senator who is acquainted with the history of the Senate and who is not ignorant of the history of this country can contemplate for a moment the awful risk of taking from the minority the right to preserve the section from which he comes and in which he lives from dangers of that sort, which may in the future, as in the past, overhang and overcloud us all, is more than I can comprehend.

I will say this: The filibuster is an extreme weapon, not one to be lightly employed, not one to be generally and carelessly invoked; and yet the instances are rare—I doubt if any well-informed Senator can cite many—in which filibusters have succeeded in which they did not represent the right side of the question involved. So that I am not terrified by the proposition that, possibly, if we adopt no other form of cloture we will not have completely destroyed the filibuster as a parliamentary weapon. On the contrary, while it is the most powerful weapon of the minority, it is, in my judgment, the most indispensable weapon of the minority, if anything like the balance of parliamentary right is to be preserved, nicely adjusted, in this body; and it does seem to me beyond question, beyond challenge, beyond peradventure that, unless we are prepared to surrender some of the basic and fundamental principles upon which this Government and this country of ours were constructed, some of the checks and balances against hasty, intemperate, and sometimes injudicious partisanship, we will not lightly fritter away the rights of the Senate and of individual Senators by agreeing to any such amendment to our rules as this.

Mr. President, there is another and quite an important reason why amendments of this character to our rules ought not to be adopted. For one, I believe in the balance of power planned in our Constitution, or, rather, the distribution of power between the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government. Of course, these powers complement and supplement each other and, taken together, make up and constitute that great whole which is itself the government, the organism, the vitality; but each in its way performing its separate and distinct function, independent, although cooperating and coordinating, is of itself and in itself an independent function. Sad will be the day for this country when the distinction between these powers of the Government is abolished or when any one of them enthrones itself in the popular esteem or the popular confidence at the expense of the others.

Of course, I realize that in time of war the executive power is and must be largely and necessarily increased, because so much is to be executed, because so much is to be done. When it comes to the execution of the laws and policies which may be made by the legislative branch of the Government, then, of course, the executive function is controlling and exclusive; but even in time of war the right and duty of the legislative body to retain its independence and its integrity, to stand for the country and for the best that is in and of the country, to give to that country without fear of consequence, without either hope of reward or fear of punishment, the best that is in and of its heart and its head, is just as sacred and as solemn a duty as is the duty of the soldier on the battle line to face without flinching the bullets of the enemy.

Under the party system of actual and practical control that governs the politics of this country, the House of Representatives will never on this earth be anything else except more or less subservient to the will of the Executive; and I warn this body that whatever party is in power, whoever may be President, when we have as completely shackled the minds and tongues of Members of this body as the minds and tongues of Members of that other body are necessarily constrained by the rule that hard necessity forces upon them, there will be no place in all this Government from which the slightest resistance to real executive autocracy can come.

So that from every standpoint—first, because it is not and can not be shown that there is the slightest necessity for an amendment to the rules of this kind growing out of the war, or because of war conditions; second, because if we gradually, by piecemeal, as it were, adopt cloture in this body we not only destroy the last forum in which a minority, however constituted temporarily, may have and exercise a substantial right, but we also build up here a machine as destructive of independent thought and independent action as could be constructed in any parliamentary body on this earth; third, because if the Senate shall by piecemeal adopt the policy of cloture there will be no balance whatever left between executive and legislative power in the practical operation and conduct of this Government—for all of those reasons I oppose this resolution presented by my distinguished friend from Alabama.

Mr. President, the personal considerations involved in this question do not appeal to me as of any considerable importance compared with the public considerations to which I have just alluded. It is no more pleasant for me and no easier for me than for other Senators to listen to long, disconnected, and rambling discussions of questions not immediately before the Senate. My personal convenience might be promoted just as much as that of the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator if some measure of this sort were adopted; but I would suffer and undergo any reasonable amount of personal inconvenience rather than risk some of the serious public inconveniences that are sure to result to the people of this country if a proposition of this character should be adopted. I can not see, to save my life, the necessity for this sort of thing. I can not see, to save my life, why it should be urged now and why above all things it should be labeled a war measure, unless it is out of deference to the popular fad that is sweeping through all legislative bodies to name everything a war measure, no matter how disconnected with the war, no matter how unrelated to it.

The Senate went a good way when it adopted the resolution adopted at the beginning of this Congress, allowing two-thirds of the Senate to impose a very mild and modified form of cloture in certain contingencies. We know very well that that was done simply because it was considered necessary, and we thought past experience had recently proved it, to have some sort of machinery devised by which we could secure prompt action on any question which affected the Nation, especially with respect to its dealings with other nations, which transactions in and of their very nature require prompt and vigorous action; but I think we have gone fully far enough when we have gone there.

I hesitate to take the step suggested by my friend from Alabama. I want to say, with all personal kindliness toward any Senator who favors it, including the author of the resolution, that it shall not be adopted except after the most earnest and persistent opposition of which I am capable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that Senate resolution 235 be taken up for consideration.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	McNary	Sheppard
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Martin	Smith, Md.
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sutherland
Curtis	Kellogg	Nugent	Underwood
Fall	Kenyon	Page	Wadsworth
France	King	Phelan	Warren
Gronna	Lenroot	Pomerene	Watson
Harding	McCumber	Shafroth	Wolcott

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence on official business of the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BORAH, Mr. JOHNSON of California, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. PENROSE, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. THOMPSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. CULBERSON entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But 41 Senators have responded to their names. There is not a quorum present. What is the will of the Senate?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is necessarily absent, to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. MCCUMBER (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CALDER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. KELLOGG. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Brandegee	Harding	McCumber	Smoot
Calder	Hardwick	McNary	Sutherland
Curtis	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Warren
France	Kellogg	Poindexter	Watson
Gronna	Lodge	Sherman

NAYS—26.

Ashurst	Kenyon	Norris	Smith, Md.
Beckham	King	Nugent	Swanson
Culberson	Kirby	Owen	Thompson
Cummins	Lenroot	Phelan	Underwood
Johnson, S. Dak.	McKellar	Pomerene	Wolcott
Jones, N. Mex.	Martin	Shafroth
Kendrick	Myers	Sheppard

NOT VOTING—47.

Baird	Gore	New	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Guion	Overman	Sterling
Borah	Hale	Pittman	Thomas
Chamberlain	Henderson	Ransdell	Tillman
Colt	Hitchcock	Reed	Townsend
Fall	Hollis	Robinson	Trammell
Fernald	James	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Fletcher	Knox	Shields	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Simmons	Weeks
Gallinger	Lewis	Smith, Ariz.	Wilfley
Gerry	McLean	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Goff	Nelson	Smith, Mich.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators are present, according to the roll call, which discloses the presence of a quorum. The question before the Senate, therefore, is the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the Senate resolution 235 be taken up for consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the resolution whether it is his desire to proceed with its consideration this afternoon?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to have the resolution made the unfinished business. If it is made the unfinished business, and no one desires to proceed with the debate this evening, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BORAH. It is immaterial to me whether I speak upon the motion to make it the unfinished business, or after it is made such; but I have no desire to hold the Senate if the Senate, as it seems, desires to go away.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be perfectly willing to take an adjournment as soon as the resolution is made the unfinished business. I ask that the question may be put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 235.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am so much opposed to this resolution that I dislike very much to see the Senate proceed to the consideration of it. The Senator from Alabama understands and so states that if the motion is carried to proceed to the consideration of it, it is done to-day merely to give it the status of the unfinished business of the Senate, and then unless the Senate votes to displace it by proceeding to the consideration of another measure, under the rule of the Senate, it must come up every day two hours after the Senate meets until finally voted upon.

I, myself, see no need whatever for a further attempt to inflict absolute or modified cloture upon speech in the United States Senate. It was only at the last session of Congress that a step was taken providing for a limitation of debate when a certain number of Senators requested it, and even that modified cloture rule has never been appealed to.

The proposed measure, of course, is much more drastic than the one which exists at present, but nothing has happened in the Senate since the question of arming merchant ships came up which at all, in my opinion, has warranted a further restriction upon the right of debate and the freedom of speech in the United States Senate.

As has been well said by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], this is the last forum that I know of in the world where real freedom of speech exists.

We ought to remember this, Mr. President. It is not simply a matter which concerns the Senator himself. A Senator here with his colleague from his own State represents the entire State from which he comes and in all its vast interests. There are many times in this country of great diversified industries, of different habits and inclinations of thought, largely populated by different races of people of different antecedents and different traditions, when a certain number of States will propose a measure where the two Senators from a State which is going to be adversely affected by the passage of that measure can not possibly do justice to the great interests confided to their care in an hour's talk to this body.

Mr. President, if the safety of this Nation can be shown to be at stake and that it would be safeguarded by limiting to a very great degree the time within which Senators from sovereign States could express their views and those of their constituents, I might be willing, if it could be demonstrated that it was for the safety of the country, to allow without protest some such resolution as is reported here to become a rule of this body. But, Mr. President, it is easy to take leaps in the dark, especially when the people are perhaps emotionally stirred, when they are excitable; and it is very difficult to go back, in this country at least, to the place from which we departed.

What is the occasion for limiting a Senator to 1 hour on a bill and to 20 minutes on amendments? I have heard no reason stated here. Nothing has certainly happened at this session of Congress which warrants a reduction of time to a Senator who has heretofore had the right to speak his mind freely and at such length as he chose upon this floor. Nothing in my experience has happened at this session, and I do not think anything will happen, and if it should, it is time then for the Senate in the face of immediate provocation and the abuse or attempted abuse of the privileges of the Senate and the courtesies which are shown by Senators to each other to take action upon the question.

One hour is to be allowed to a Senator no matter what the measure may be before the Senate. It may be upon the question whether we will have an army of 3,000,000 men or whether we will confer upon the President the right which Congress has heretofore exerted and supposed to be its own to raise and maintain armies. It may be we will allow the President to raise and maintain armies, but I do not think we ought. I think it is the business of Congress to raise armies and fix the size of armies and provide for their maintenance. That may be a question that will demand a large amount of debate. There are other questions that will demand serious consideration.

There is no rule in the Senate that provides that an amendment must be germane to the bill to which it is offered. We all remember here when the Agricultural appropriation bill was under consideration some six or eight years ago, whenever it was, all of a sudden when the bill was before the Senate, I rather think up to a third reading, when the debate upon the bill had been exhausted and the subject had been duly and well considered, a Senator rose and offered as an amendment to that Agricultural appropriation bill an entirely irrelevant and unrelated matter, an entirely new subject, consisting perhaps of 10 or 15 pages, that nobody had read or had had an opportunity to read. It was a meat-inspection measure, a matter of country-wide interest and worthy of consideration upon its own merits.

Now, the Senator from Alabama, who is a great parliamentarian and a great statesman, in my opinion, goaded on by some spirit of restlessness or desire to attempt to make haste, which would probably result in making waste, says that no Senator should speak more than 20 minutes upon any amendment proposed to a bill, so that when the revenue bill may come before this body I can get up and offer an amendment to it that the Army shall consist of 5,000,000 men, and precipitate a debate on that question which nobody has considered up to that time, and no Senator can speak more than 20 minutes on it.

What is there in the existing situation which demands that we hamstring ourselves now; that we voluntarily shear ourselves of the power and the opportunity to properly debate the great questions that are pending before us, and perhaps the still greater that are to come?

As I said, I regret sincerely that the Senator from Alabama or the Committee on Rules, for it is a majority report from that committee, has seen fit to bring this subject before the Senate at this time. Is it not a good thing to have freedom of debate, Mr. President? Is it not a good thing to allow a Senator to review a subject comprehensively and to take time, if necessary, to read from the books the precedents, and to give from history and from other authorities information and facts bearing upon every great subject that comes before this body? And if he does, that is all to be crowded into the space of an hour.

Mr. President, this is a debating body, and there are 96 Members of it. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the distinguished leader of the other side of the Chamber, stated yesterday that because an hour or an hour and a quarter was allowed each side usually in the Supreme Court of the United States, that ought to be enough time for any Senator to say all he knows upon any subject, or all he wants to say anywhere. I do not believe that the Senator, on mature reflection, will be prepared to adhere to that view. Let us consider it. The Supreme Court is not a debating society nor a debating body. The Supreme Court, as was stated yesterday, has its membership there all the time while they are in session. The case is made up before it comes to the court. The facts are all there sworn to. Testimony, perhaps, can be certified up in certain cases. At any rate, the record is there, and the briefs of both parties are there, which are themselves arguments. Many of the cases are submitted on the briefs alone, with the knowledge that the bar has that the court itself knows its own decisions and knows pretty much all there is connected with the jurisprudence that concerns the matter then pending before it.

Is that the case in this body? Here are 96 different men of different minds, representing 48 different States, with different interests, from the Rocky Mountain States to the desert-land States, from the great northwestern mining States to the tropical States of Mississippi and Louisiana, from the sources of the Mississippi River away up on the Canadian line down to the Gulf of Mexico, and every variety of climate and population and circumstances differentiating the needs of one section from another. We Senators do not know and can not know, as the Supreme Court can know, enough about all the facts and circumstances so as to be able to take judicial notice of it, and it is necessary perhaps that the one Senator who is expert on a certain question should to a certain extent educate his fellow Senators, so that they can act intelligently upon those facts. It has all got to be done within an hour under this rule, or it may be within 20 minutes if the subject matter comes up in the form of an amendment. Is that wise?

What is the impelling motive behind this proposition? Has not the Senate done its share and done it well in the legislation that has been enacted during this world war? As was stated yesterday upon this floor, we all remember how it is when a tariff bill comes before this body. I think when the revenue bill came before this body only last year the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], required two whole days to make his statement, which was a mere synopsis of what the bill contained and a brief review of the reasons for the provisions of the bill.

Were those two days wasted, Mr. President? Should the Senator from North Carolina have been taken by the throat and held down to one hour to tell the Senate and the country of the measure, to rehearse the testimony before his committee which had taken the committee a month to collect, hearing all the great experts of the country, and then forming their conclusions after debate? Should it be so that we sit for a month with a great committee in session and then when its chairman gets up and tells us what it had been doing for a month, what was testified to, what the argument was on each side, he is to be held down to an hour, and then if a Senator, owing to a great demand in his State and their interests that he represents, the business of his community, gets up an amendment to it, that that Senator is to be held down to 20 minutes? The amendment may be more important than the whole bill. It may not be related to the bill.

As I said, Mr. President, I would do almost anything to win this war, and it may be if a Senator shows evidence of obstruction and willfullness and disloyalty, a desire to filibuster on measures necessary to the war which must go through, I would be willing to go a little further than we have gone in the existing cloture rule, which has yet never been appealed to, as there has been no reason for appealing to it. But now why should we throttle ourselves in our right to freedom of speech?

It is a matter of pride to me to belong to a body the Members of which can almost always trust each other to do the right thing, to be gentlemanly and polite and courteous and considerate. I think there are very few cases—I remember only three or four in a period of 13 years' service in this body—where there has been anything like a filibuster, and, in my opinion, all those occasions were justified. But they did not stand, the filibuster was not successful, if the American people really demanded the act. Where they were successful it gave time for a second thought, and the country was not damaged by delay of legislation. In some cases it was abandoned, and wisely abandoned.

I think the Senators who vote for this kind of a resolution will live to regret it. I know that everybody who comes over from the House of Representatives comes with the same idea. I had it myself. You get used to operating under a gag law. You get used to the previous question which cuts off debate as with a carving knife. You get used after years of habit, as the Senator from Alabama was used to it, as the leader of his party, which he led so ably for so many years on the floor of the great House of Representatives, coming from the Ways and Means Committee, for instance, with a tariff bill or some other bill and going to the Speaker and saying, "Here, we have a great body of 450 men," if it be that, "and you never can get anything through this body if you allow all these men to talk all they want.

"Now, I want you to tell the Committee on Rules to bring in a rule for this special occasion which will confine debate to two hours upon each side of the question, and so control the time of debate." And So-and-So on that side of the Chamber to control the time and peddle it out to such persons as he wants to yield to for the negative and a Member upon the other side to do the same for the affirmative, and at the conclusion of four hours' debate the vote to be taken, no matter what the bill—a tariff bill or a bill of the greatest importance—that ought, if possible, to have a month of consideration and intelligent debate, backed up by the study of authorities and real debate of the kind we have here, where a man can ask a question at the time he wants to ask it and get an answer that will have a bearing upon the debate, and it may eliminate the necessity of taking an hour or more.

I say it is very natural for a Member, coming over from the House, having been brought up and lived for 20 years under that system, where the time is divided half and half—two hours to each side—and then the trap is sprung and the previous question considered as ordered, and the Clerk calls the roll, and all amendments are to be considered out of order. That rule is drawn by expert parliamentarians, and it is natural that a gentleman who has operated under that sort of Prussian discipline should be a little restive when he gets among the allies, who do things in a less arbitrary manner. I sympathize with him myself upon certain occasions when the boot is on the other leg, for I am getting somewhat weary of the human voice, especially when it is not accompanied by as much gray matter as some people think they have. But I admit that this is a deliberative body of 96 debaters, and even if they are not debaters when they come here they soon acquire the habit. They ought to be debaters, and their States expect them to be. It is here, after every bill which is put through the House in the arbitrary manner it has to go through, that the flaws are detected and the creases are ironed out, and the unconstitutional features are generally rejected, though not always.

It has been done so for about 130 years, ever since this Government was founded. There has been criticism at times, yes; when perhaps a noisy minority in the country were demanding something and threatening awful things if they did not get it at once; but for 130 years this body has stood here the representative of free thought and free speech.

How much worse the country would have been suppose the Senate had been like the House. What sort of legislation would we get? Well, the conference committee would have had to be both Houses of Congress; that is the truth about it. There would not have been any open consideration of anything which the people and the press of the country should know everything about. Everything would have been done in a corner and behind closed doors; we would have had the privilege of voting yes or no, and that would have been our part in the making of wise legislation.

So I say I regret that the distinguished Senator from Alabama has brought in this proposed rule in addition to the other contentious subjects which have been unloaded upon the country in the midst of this war, which are serving to divide the country into hostile camps instead of unifying them into one great camp of America.

I am pretty strong for liberty in these days, and I understand that is what we are fighting for when we are not fighting, as the President says the Indian said, "to make the whole damn world safe for the Democratic Party." I understand we are fighting for liberty, and one of the bases of liberty is freedom of speech and of thought. If you can not be allowed even to think, if you have got to be neutral even in thought, it is not my idea of liberty at all. If you have got to be neutral in speech, there is no freedom of speech. I believe in saying what you think, and I have said this much this afternoon to let the Senate know that I think we had better go slowly about this matter at this time and let us preserve what liberty we have left now until we see if we can keep the rest of it and, it may be, get a little more.

I hope the Senate will not take up the resolution this afternoon, because it fastens it upon us as the unfinished business for every day until the Senate shall get so sick of it that it will displace it by a motion to proceed to the consideration of some other matter.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	McNary	Shields
Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Martin	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	Myers	Smoot
Borah	Kellogg	Nelson	Sutherland
Brandegee	Kendrick	Norris	Swanson
Calder	Kenyon	Nugent	Thompson
Cummins	Lenroot	Owen	Underwood
Curtis	Lewis	Page	Wadsworth
Fall	Lodge	Shafroth	Watson
France	McCumber	Sheppard	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. PHELAN and Mr. SIMMONS answered to their names when called.

Mr. MCKELLAR entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators have responded to their names. There is not a quorum present. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. CUMMINS. Is it in order to make a parliamentary inquiry in the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. CUMMINS. The inquiry is this: If the Senate were now to adjourn, would the motion of the Senator from Alabama be the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair thinks not.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator from Kansas will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly; I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to state, by unanimous consent, that I do not desire to weary the Senate this evening with roll calls, and will not resist an adjournment at this time; but I wish to give notice that to-morrow I shall again move to take up Senate resolution 235, and, believing that a majority of the Senate are in favor of its consideration, I shall insist in the endeavor to have it taken up for consideration. I will not, however, resist the motion to adjourn at this time.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator wish to move to adjourn?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; the Senator can make it.

Mr. CURTIS. I renew the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 5, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 4, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in Heaven, that the Holy of Holies is always accessible to Thy children. That amid the perplexing problems which confront us, the dangers which threaten us, the anxieties and sorrows which fill our hearts, we may enter in and receive new light to guide us, new strength to sustain us, and comfort to bear us up.

Hence we come praying for that light, that strength, that comfort; that with courage and fortitude we may do the work Thou hast given us to do, assured that all will be well at last.

This we ask in the Spirit of the Lord, Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 12280. An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 12099, a bill to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes, and the bill H. R. 12100, a bill to amend the shipping act, be given a privileged status, the consideration not to interfere with the consideration of conference reports or appropriation bills. I will say further, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to call up these bills to-day. My purpose is that they may have a privileged status. They come from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries with a unanimous report. They are essentially war measures. Under one of them, H. R. 12099, the power vested in the President only continues during the war and in certain emergencies for six months thereafter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman intend by his request to exclude reports from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, it would if we give the bills a privileged status.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say the Committee on Rules, conference reports, and appropriation bills.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not say privileged matters?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am making it as broad as the universe.

Mr. GARNER. There is a bill on the calendar I think could be called up regardless of unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. What is it?

Mr. GARNER. It is a bill reported by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] proposing to take a census of this country under the Constitution.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a privileged matter and can be called up.

The SPEAKER. The Constitution provides for it.

Mr. GARNER. I think the precedents show it could be called up regardless of a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe the great fracas that caused the loss of the control of the House by the Republicans and the control by the Democrats was over the Crumpacker census bill, which kicked the lamp over.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have conferred with the majority leader, and my purpose is to get these bills up for consideration as soon as I can, not to interfere with other business which may be regarded as important.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. FLOOD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it is not his purpose to take up these bills to-day?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I beg to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that in his request he state the order in which these measures will be called up.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think in the order that the bill H. R. 12100 should be taken up first, and then the bill H. R. 12099 second.

Mr. WALSH. If that is understood——

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the order in which I will call them up.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if these are all war measures?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 12099 is strictly a war measure. The bill H. R. 12100 amends the shipping act; some of its provisions are permanent in their nature, but one of them defines a vessel to include a vessel from the time the keel is laid until it is launched. Another provision undertakes to confine ownership in American citizens so as to prevent any possible ownership by foreigners through a trust or in any other form.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the passage of these bills have a tendency to facilitate the war?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Unquestionably.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to me it is important now we should stick to war measures as strictly as we can.

Mr. ALEXANDER. These are.

Mr. HADLEY. If the chairman will permit, I will say in answer to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that as a member of the committee I would not have supported some of the features of the bill last referred to unless I had regarded them essentially as war measures. There are some features of the bill referred to that are not of a war character, but some very essential matters are.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a matter of shipping, I assume?

Mr. HADLEY. The committee was unanimous.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. If this request is agreed to, it merely gives a privileged status, as I understand it, to these bills, but the question of consideration can be raised against any bill that has a privileged status?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if he would be willing to qualify his request for unanimous consent by providing that District Day shall not be interfered with?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, to that qualification if the gentleman insists upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] asks unanimous consent to have the two bills he mentioned made privileged, not to interfere with conference reports, appropriation bills, privileged matters, or District of Columbia business. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] whether it would interfere with a request that I understand the floor leader will make very soon for consideration of the bill for the rehabilitation of wounded soldiers, which passed the Senate last week unanimously and has already been reported to the House and is on the calendar and which we are hoping to get up just as soon as possible? Would the request of the gentleman from Missouri shut that out?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I had a conversation with the majority leader and he told me that the migratory-bird bill and the bill to which the gentleman referred would come up next, and it was agreed between us that in no event would I request consideration before those bills were disposed of.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ROGERS. In order to make a parliamentary inquiry. The Journal which was read from the desk to-day contained the words that were stricken out by the House yesterday. Should the Journal contain words that have been stricken out by the House?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will indulge me, the usual practice is, when words are expunged from the RECORD, to ask unanimous consent that no reference be made in the Journal to the proceeding. But the Journal should be an accurate record of everything that takes place in the House. The motion was merely that the words be expunged from the RECORD. The Speaker will recall that quite frequently Members rise and ask unanimous consent that no reference to the proceedings be made in the Journal, but that did not take place yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entirely correct. Some of the most important transactions that have taken place in the House since I have been here were left out of the Journal by unanimous consent.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a patriotic address by my colleague, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a patriotic address by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a unanimous-consent request that after the reading of the Journal next Saturday I be allowed to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal and cleaning up of the business on the Speaker's table next Saturday he be allowed to address the House for not exceeding 30 minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, would the gentleman mind stating on what subject?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would rather not. I will state it to the gentleman privately, and will assure him publicly that it is a subject to which he will have no objection at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, this ought to be subject to other matters that may come up in the House.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Oh, certainly. If there is an important bill, I will not suggest it at all. There is a baseball game shortly after, and I anticipate the House will not want to work all day.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know about that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will state that I do not anticipate to talk about the ball game. I would like to advertise it a little right now, however.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes if not more. [Laughter.] Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, on last Friday notice was given that the contested-election case of Steele against Scott would be taken up.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield a moment? I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a patriotic address delivered by the Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a patriotic address made by the Secretary of State, the Hon. Robert Lansing.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve a right to object to the request that has been made. I tried to get recognition——

The SPEAKER. Go on.

Mr. DYER. I want to reserve the right to object because of this fact: The Government Printing Office now is unable to furnish to the Members of Congress important public documents pertaining to the conservation of wheat and things of that kind. A number of bulletins have been printed by the Department of Agriculture, scientific in their nature, and now we are unable to get them without great delay in the Printing Office, and the reason they give is because time is taken up and the machinery is taken up in printing speeches, mostly political speeches, in my judgment, to be sent through the country.

I understand that over 1,000,000 copies of one political speech have been printed and sent out from the Government Printing Office. Therefore for the present I shall object to any more speeches being inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. Why did not the gentleman object to all of them, then?

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not think the gentleman would object to the patriotic speech made by the Secretary of State being printed.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman did.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objected, and that is the end of it.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BEAND, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of important business.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF STEELE AGAINST SCOTT.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the contested-election case of Steele against Scott is fixed for to-day. I have no objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] proceeding for five minutes, with the understanding that that case is to be called up and to be proceeded with immediately after.

The SPEAKER. He has already got his five minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I rose before unanimous consent was announced. I have no objection, provided we can proceed with this case immediately after.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumes that these requests are through with for the day. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized for five minutes.

GERMAN SUBMARINES.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. During the discussion of the Army appropriation bill last week I called attention to the fact that rumors were current of German submarines hovering along the Atlantic coast, and I said then that it was possible that we would hear from them before long. I think those remarks were accepted with a grain of salt. I am not here this morning to say "I told you so," but I am here, through love and devotion to my country, to speak for what I believe is necessary to properly prepare it to assert and defend itself.

The attacking of our ships by German submarines, as reported this morning, brings home to us so directly the menace along our coast that no American, I am sure, can fail to understand the importance of it. No German submarine is ever likely to attack us in the Mississippi River or on the west coast, but it is possible for them to reach us on the Gulf coast. The attack will come—the first attack has come—along the Atlantic seaboard, just where it might be expected that it would come. It came on Sunday last, and since Sunday reports now indicate no less than 15 American vessels have gone to the bottom of the sea. The Secretary of the Navy officially reports six vessels lost. How many lives have gone as yet we are unable to say.

Now, gentlemen, I ask you squarely, are we prepared along the Atlantic seaboard for this foreign invasion? The visitation of these submarines is merely a skirmish. It may be that the purpose behind it is to strike terror into the hearts of the American people, and it may be that these attacks will inflame the American people so that they will rise up as one man to drive out the invader should he ever attempt to land on our shores. Whatever the purpose or the effect, we have problems ahead of us in the matter of preparation, and they are real and vital problems. I ask you, while we are attacking the enemy abroad are we prepared to meet him on our own shores? I have pleaded for preparation in the United States, and I again plead for this practical preparation of our inland waterways.

We study the map of Europe every morning. In the name of God and in the name of our country, why do we not study the map of our own country, the United States?

Here is our problem: Along the New Jersey coast, as shown here on the map before you, on Sunday last, most of this damnable work was done. Six vessels, at least, were sunk within 50 miles of that coast, between the port of New York and the port of Philadelphia. Much of our shipbuilding—most of it, in fact—is being done inside this coast. This shipbuilding, as we well know, is our great reliance in this war emergency. It is to carry our troops, our munitions, and supplies abroad.

The only way for these ships when completed to get to sea is down the Delaware River, down the Delaware Bay, past Cape May and Cape Henlopen. What would an alert enemy do who wanted to forestall the use of those ships? What would an enemy do who wanted to stop our transportation, stop the relief in troops and supplies to our soldiers abroad? Why, he would circle around the mouth of this bay [indicating], just as these arrow heads now point. If he was in sufficient force he might stop those vessels coming out, lie in wait for them, catch them, and sink them as fast as the Shipping Board could turn them out. Without the canal to Norfolk and Baltimore, without the canal to New York, there is no other way for our new ships to get out.

I have indicated time and time again that we should cut this channel through to the port of New York and have that additional entrance and exit; that we should get through here [indicating the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal] to Chesapeake Bay and have that additional entrance and exit. If we cut those canals through or improve the waterways already existing then ships built upon the Delaware River or in New York or at Norfolk may pass out at no less than four points and encircle the enemy at sea. These exits and entrances should be connected inland so that our vessels may go outside to help each other at will. Give us those cuts here and here [pointing to the cuts across New Jersey and Delaware and Maryland] and then we will have a passage from Hampton Roads through to New York and by way of the East River to Long Island Sound into the ocean here [indicating], and from there we can continue our inland strategy to the port of Boston. In all we will have one, two, three, four, five points along the Atlantic coast from Norfolk to Boston, every one of which should be available to pass vessels from navy yard to navy yard inside when the enemy is known to be outside.

But we can not do it now. We have failed to appropriate the paltry few million dollars necessary to make the 13-mile cut through the Maryland-Delaware peninsula, and this 31-mile cut over to New York Bay through the valleys of New Jersey.

I appeal to you Members of Congress who are interested in the welfare of your country to deal wisely with this great problem. We are sending billions of dollars abroad and we are beginning to send millions of men abroad; all the money we can raise is going into shipbuilding to help our forces on the other side. What if our ships are to be bottled up or sunk before they fairly reach the sea? We must heed the demand for ship construction, but we must also provide the facilities upon which our ships are to come and go and be protected. Surely we can not permit the enemy to stand 50 miles off our shore, as he did on Sunday, and laugh in the face of the American people. I beg of Congress to give serious consideration to this subject and to a resolution I have introduced requesting action on these canal propositions. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF STEELE AGAINST SCOTT.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, on last Friday notice was given that the contested-election case of Steele against Scott, from the eleventh district of Iowa, would be called up to-day. I do not know whether or not there is a desire to discuss this case. The report of the committee, so far as I know, reflects the unanimous judgment of the committee, after a careful investigation extending over a number of weeks. It is not necessary, as I understand, under the rules, to read this report. I feel, however, after discussing the matter with the committee, that it is due to the Members of the House to make a short statement in relation to the facts of this case, because the result is so extremely close, in a district polling more than 52,000 votes, and where the question of the unseating of the sitting Member or withholding from the contestant a seat in this House depends upon a change of 3 or 4 votes, I feel that it is due to the Members of the House, who will probably not have time to read this report, to make a short statement in relation to the work of this committee.

On the official returns from that district in the election of November, 1916, the contestee, the sitting Member, was returned by a majority of 131 votes. After the contest was filed in this case a recount was made in one precinct in Sioux City, Iowa, by the contestant, which showed, according to the recount made on his behalf, a change of 219 votes in his favor, and according to the recount made by the contestee a change of 205 votes, which on the recount of the contestant would have given him, if no further count had been made, a majority of 88; and upon the recount made by the contestee, if no further counting had been done, a majority of 74.

After recounting this precinct where this startling change had been made, the contestant identified and introduced in evidence the returns of the entire district. It is proper to say that in the notice of contest the count of every precinct in the district had been brought in question, the claim being made that certain votes had been counted for the contestee that should not have been counted for him, and that there had been a failure to count certain votes for the contestant that should have been counted for him.

Then upon taking testimony by the contestee it was found that in another precinct over in Buena Vista County practically the same condition prevailed, and upon counting less than 500 votes a gain was established in favor of the contestee of 80 votes on his recount and of 74 votes on the recount made by the contestant. Now, the parties recounted entirely the votes of 5 of the 13 counties in this district. They made no attempt to recount the votes in the other counties, and the result of the recount of these five counties, when tabulated with the vote of the other eight counties, showed that upon this recount the contestant claimed that he had a majority of 94 votes and the contestee claimed that he had a majority of 133 votes.

It was argued before the committee by the parties to the contest that this case might be settled by consideration of the two precincts where those glaring irregularities had developed, where there was apparently no excuse for the gain of more than 200 votes in one precinct for Mr. Steele and the gain of 80 in another precinct for Mr. Scott. But in this recount of five counties the committee found that they had disagreed in the recount of some 72 precincts. And to show you just what a difficult situation faced the committee, if you took the contestant's recount for this second precinct in Sioux City, in the precinct in Buena Vista County, the contestant had a majority of 14; and according to the claim of the contestee, based on his recount of the same precincts, he had a majority of 6. If you take the recount of the contestant at the precinct in Buena Vista County where contestee gained, and the recount of the contestee at second precinct in Sioux City, where contestant gained, the vote in the entire district, where over 52,000 votes were cast, will be a tie. But we found in other precincts where this recount had been made a change in one of 36 votes and in another a change of 31 votes. There was no dispute about that, and in the 72 precincts upon which they disagreed there were several hundred votes involved. So in going over the whole matter the committee decided that the only fair thing they could do, and the only manner in which they could get a result with which they could come before this House, backed by the judgment of the committee as well as its conscience, was to recount the 72 precincts where the parties to the recount had disagreed. There was no question as far as the record presented to us was concerned as to the vote in the other counties, because no attempt had been made to recount them and the official returns stood. Before the committee each side admitted, as I understood the argument, that it was doubtful as to what the result would be if those precincts were recounted, that it would come right down to a question of one or two votes. So a subcommittee was appointed, and we counted those 72 precincts, involving close to 20,000 ballots. In that recount there was not a disagreement except as to two votes, one that I myself contended that if it should be counted at all it should be counted for Mr. Steele, and the other which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], who was on the subcommittee, contended that if counted at all it should be counted for Mr. Scott. But the marking on those two ballots was very questionable. As to the others your committee had no trouble at all in reaching the conclusion that those votes ought to be counted.

Now, the differences where the large discrepancies occurred resulted from the careless manner pursued in counting the ballots, a system which we understood from the arguments of the counsel prevailed at all large precincts in the State of Iowa. They have the Australian ballot system there, but it developed before the committee that, there being three election judges and two clerks, instead of the judges all examining each ballot and calling it off to the clerks, who should keep a simultaneous record of the count, the ballots would be divided into two piles, and one judge would call off the ballots to one clerk from one pile and the other judge would call off the ballots to the other clerk from the other pile, and when they got through they would add the totals of the two.

It was evident that all the judges had seen no one ballot and that no one judge had seen all the ballots. So the system of counting the votes was absolutely in violation of the law, and we felt, as I stated, that the only fair way the committee could do would be to go in and examine the ballots in the precincts where these differences had occurred. This we did, with the result, as I have stated, that there was no disagreement except as to two ballots. In rejecting ballots on one side or the other there seemed to have been no well-established rule followed by either party. They have the Australian ballot there, but they have no emblem at the head of the column, and the voter would make a mark opposite the names of the candidates for President and Vice President on the Democratic or Republican ticket and then he would proceed down the column and mark the squares opposite the presidential electors on that ticket, and then on down and vote for his choice for Congressman. In other instances he would make just one large cross opposite the names of the candidates for President and Vice President, perhaps upon the Republican ticket or on the Democratic ticket, as the case might be. Then he would proceed down and vote for State officers and for Congressmen. Of course, tickets marked in that way were not marked in accordance with the law, and they had been rejected pro and con by the parties, as shown in the testimony taken in Iowa. But your committee had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion as to the intention of the voter, and the decisions of the courts of Iowa were very plain that these were not identifying marks, and so we counted them for the Member of Congress for whom they were marked.

There were a number of legal questions that came up. Among them was the vote of the soldiers of the National Guard on the Texas border. There Mr. Steele had a majority of 20. It was contended that the old statute passed in 1862 in the Civil War had been repealed by a revision of the code of that State, but your committee counted those votes. It was contended on the part of Mr. Scott that he should have 13 additional votes on account of ballots lost in additional precincts. We did not count those. In other words, counting the National Guard vote and counting every vote that we felt we had a legal right to count, the result of the tabulation left a majority in favor of the sitting Member, Mr. Scott.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the respective political parties were not designated at the head of the column?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; I did not say that; I said there was no emblem—no rooster, no elephant, no bull moose, or anything of that sort.

Mr. DENISON. There was a circle.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. There was the name of the candidate for President and Vice President at the head of the ticket, and down further were the presidential electors by name and the square in which the voter shall mark.

Mr. DENISON. Does the voter have to put a mark opposite each name, or can he vote the entire ticket by one mark at the head of the column?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Under the statutes of Iowa he must make a mark or a cross opposite each presidential elector.

Mr. DENISON. He can not make one mark and vote the straight ticket?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Some voters evidently thought they could do so. Under the recount there was no disagreement; perfect harmony prevailed, and under the record, as presented to the committee, there was no doubt that the contestant and the contestee each thought himself honestly elected. After this final sifting out of all disputed ballots and counting and crediting every legal ballot, there is a majority of 4 in favor of the contestee. This is the only result that can be reached from these ballots, for they have all been counted as cast, and we feel that if they had followed the decisions of the Supreme Court of Iowa, as laid down in the recent cases, in the original counting of these ballots this contest might not have come to Congress. Of course, lawyers representing clients do not always look at matters as judges do after the case gets before the court.

As I said, there were a number of legal questions that arose—the Texas-border vote and the lost ballots and some others not necessary to discuss. So after the most exhaustive investigation, which involved the counting and examination of many thousands of ballots, your committee has submitted a unanimous report.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman state to the House where these ballots were marked at the top where it said for President Woodrow Wilson and Vice President THOMAS R. MARSHALL, what did the returning board do with the ballots marked like that?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. As a general proposition they refused to count them. Some of them were marked opposite the name of Woodrow Wilson, and then coming down further to the presidential electors they were marked by cross, and also the same with reference to Hughes and Fairbanks and electors on that ticket.

Mr. ROSE. I would like to say that in all these ballots the committee were unanimous in counting them for the parties for whom they were marked. We were all satisfied that it was not a mark for identification, but merely surplusage, and all the ballots were counted for the candidates for which they intended to vote. The committee was unanimous in that.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, there has been no better evidence of the absence of partisanship in the present House of Representatives than the unanimous action of the Committee on Elections No. 3 in the contested-election case of Beakes against Bacon, and the unanimous action of this Committee on Elections No. 1 in the case of Steele against Scott.

I desire to add to what the chairman of the committee has said to the effect that throughout the consideration of this case only one motive has actuated the members of the committee, and that was the desire to determine just what actually were the facts in this election. While there were two interesting legal questions involved in the contest, it was not necessary for the committee to consider them, because, even admitting the claims of the contestant, Mr. Steele, on the facts as found by the subcommittee, Mr. Scott is still entitled to his seat.

Mr. Speaker, there has unfortunately arisen in this country for some time past a growing popular feeling in some quarters against our courts of justice, and I think that feeling has been due to the belief that in many cases our judicial tribunals have decided cases on technical grounds instead of on the real merits of the issues involved.

Our subcommittee of Committee on Elections No. 1, in this case composed of two Democrats—the chairman of the committee, Judge WILSON, and the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. POLK]—and one Republican Member, who happened to be myself, voted at the beginning that we would not throw out any ballots in this district in Iowa where the intention of the voter, so far as the election of Congressman was concerned, could be fairly determined. There were hundreds of disputed ballots, ballots where it was perfectly evident for whom the voter intended to vote for Congress; but because the voter had made a mark opposite Mr. Wilson's name or Mr. Hughes's name at the top of the ballot, or because the voter had made a diagonal mark or a check mark instead of a cross against the names of the candidates, these ballots were thrown out and rejected by one side or the other. We counted all such ballots where it could be fairly determined that the voter intended to vote either for Mr. Scott or Mr. Steele, as the case might be. And I hope and trust that the precedent in this regard which we have established in this case may be followed by future Committees on Elections of this House.

During the five or six weeks that our subcommittee was working, counting, as the chairman has said, over 20,000 ballots and being in session during the sessions of the House, day after day for more than six weeks, there were only two ballots over which there was any controversy in our subcommittee, and these were cases where there was a cross against one candidate for Congress and a single line against the other. It happens that there were two ballots of this kind, one of which I thought ought to be counted for Mr. Scott, and the other, a similar one, that my colleagues on the committee thought ought to be counted for Mr. Steele. Inasmuch, however, as they offset each other, and it did not make any difference in the result, it was not necessary even to report that slight minor difference to the full committee.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this House and the country ought to be congratulated upon the fact that in this great crisis members of these two committees on elections, where in the past there have been bitter partisan contests in which technicalities have been taken advantage of by one side or the other, have approached the matters in dispute with absolute fairness and with the sole desire to do absolute justice to the parties concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolutions be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 386.

First. That T. J. Steele was not elected a Representative in this Congress from the eleventh district of the State of Iowa and is not entitled to a seat herein.

Second. That George C. Scott was duly elected a Representative in this Congress from the eleventh district of the State of Iowa and is entitled to retain a seat herein.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT of Iowa. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I feel that it is incumbent upon me at this time to acknowledge my most high appreciation of the courtesies that have been extended to me at all times during this controversy by the Committee on Elections No. 1, and also to add to the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] my own appreciation of the high sense of duty that has been entertained and evinced by the Committee on Elections during the discharge of their duties in this matter. The House and the country are to be congratulated that the committees of this House in trying contested-election cases can and do rise above partisanship and respond to the great trust and responsibility reposed in them by the Constitution of the country in the discharge of this the highest of all official duties and functions. I want to bear additional witness to the fact that through this entire most arduous proceeding the subcommittee appointed, and to which the case was referred, has assumed an attitude above all thought of partisanship and has directed its attention to the ascertainment of the truth without thought of partiality. I think it fitting also to say at this time with respect to my opponent, Mr. Steele, that during the campaign out of which this contest grew, which was a long and a very sharp one, extending over a period of five months, in which each of us exerted himself to the utmost, not the slightest personal feeling was aroused at any time. [Applause.] Also that during this contest, extending over a period of more than a year, the most cordial relations have continued during the entire period between Mr. Steele and myself, and that immediately upon the report of this committee, as soon as the news was carried to Iowa on the wires, congratulations from Mr. Steele came back to myself. [Applause.]

I think it due to say this also: That it would be a splendid thing, especially during such times as we are now passing through, if all political contests could be carried on in the same spirit and culminate with the same good personal feeling. We are at this time engaged in the discharge of duties which do and ought to raise us above all thought of partisanship, and as the approaching campaign develops, while we may at times, in our zeal for our chosen candidates and political parties, seem to overstep the line temporarily, I believe the country will see in the campaign of 1918 one of the greatest exhibitions of patriotism and lack of undue partisanship which ever existed in this or any other country, and it is to be hoped that this will be the case. [Applause.]

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report (No. 621) from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 370.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 1553, entitled "An act to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes"; that there shall be not to exceed one hour of general debate, to be divided between those supporting and those opposing the bill. At the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be considered for amendments under the five-minute rule. After the bill shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendation as the committee may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be amended by inserting, after the word "hour," in line 9, the words "and one-half," so that an hour and one-half of general debate will be provided.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it provided in the resolution that the debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. POU. No.

Mr. WALSH. Would that not be a wise amendment?

Mr. POU. I do not believe that will be necessary. In order that there may be 20 minutes' debate on each side, I move the previous question.

Mr. FORDNEY. Before that is done, is the time to be divided between those in favor of the bill and those opposed to it?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Half on that side and half on this side?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Who is there on this side that wishes to control the time? Is the gentleman in favor of the bill?

Mr. POU. I personally am in favor of it; but, of course, the time upon this side will be under the control of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The question as to who would control the time of those opposing the bill will be determined by the Speaker unless some gentleman on the committee opposes the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. I only want to see to it that the time is divided equally between those in favor of it and those opposed to it. I suppose the members of the committee then will control the time.

Mr. POU. I presume so, if the committee is divided.

Mr. FLOOD. The committee is divided.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was not able to hear whether the gentleman said somebody was opposed to this bill.

Mr. POU. My information is there is some opposition to the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs if any member of the committee is opposed to the bill?

Mr. FLOOD. I understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] is opposed to the bill. Am I correct?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The arrangement is that those opposed to the bill shall have at least half the time?

Mr. POU. That is provided in the resolution.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman one more question. This is a war bill, of course?

Mr. POU. Well, some gentlemen consider it a great conservation measure. I do not think I myself should agree to the proposition that it is a war measure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was wondering what made it a war measure.

Mr. FLOOD. It is carrying into effect a treaty obligation we made with Great Britain some time ago, a treaty that was concluded by ratification and exchange in December, 1916.

Mr. POU. In order that the matter may be discussed——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it is a conservation measure it might mean we will have less food, less game food, at least.

Mr. FLOOD. No; we are protecting by this bill the game which kills the insect pests and protects the crops, so we will have a great deal more to eat than if we do not pass it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman going to explain that situation in his remarks?

Mr. FLOOD. I think the gentleman understands that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman can show how it will increase the grain supply by conserving our birds, perhaps that will be a good thing for the House to know.

Mr. FLOOD. All right.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. All this talk is out of order. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has 20 minutes——

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] will control the other 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Ohio has 20 minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I shall only consume a moment of the 20 minutes which I am permitted to control. As has been said, the purpose of this bill (S. 1553) is to carry into effect a treaty between this Nation and Canada providing for the protection of insect-destroying birds. This measure is considered a most important one by gentlemen who ought to know and who have made a long study of the question, some of them being the greatest bird specialists and bird experts in this country. They have said with great emphasis that this is a conservation measure and that it is of the highest importance to the people of the country. In any event, it would seem that this resolution affording the House opportunity to consider the measure should be adopted. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves 19 minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, this matter, as I see it, is simply to put into force a treaty between our Nation and the British Government on behalf of Canada. Canada having already taken the step to enforce the treaty, it seemed to us that we have been very derelict, in view of the fact that we initiated the effort which resulted finally in the treaty, and yet we have not taken any steps to put it into operation. Canada listened to our request and has already placed the law in operation, while we have not yet taken the necessary step, and for that reason it seems to me that a rule was justified in making it in order. I admit that while it is a sort of habit with us to-day to call everything a war measure, and it is to be expected that such a claim would be made, I think without doubt this is a war measure. I believe that the conservation of the bird life is a real conservation of food, and while some persons might think that is a little far-fetched I have a statement here of the annual loss to the United States caused by insects on farms, which is backed by the Bureau of Entomology, and this statement is to me quite startling: Cereals, $430,204,600; hay, $116,230,500; cotton, $140,631,100; tobacco, $16,900,800; vegetables, $199,412,600; sugar crop, $8,436,800; fruits, $141,264,300; farm forest products, $22,138,900; other crops, $29,649,300; or a total of $1,104,869,300. Then, in addition, natural-forest products, approximately estimated, $100,000,000; products in storage, $100,000,000; insect-bearing diseases to man, $150,000,000; direct and indirect damage to domestic animals, $100,000,000; or making a grand total of $1,544,869,300. Now, Mr. Speaker, the House has not hesitated on various appropriation bills to appropriate large sums to eliminate insects and other pests that destroy food products, whether it be in the field or the orchard, but if these figures which are given to us by the Bureau of Entomology are at all accurate there is something in the argument that this is a war measure for the preservation of our food products, as the food problem is one of our greatest military concerns in our program to end this war with victory.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman explain what effect the passage of this law will have upon the right of a State to legislate upon the subject of its game supply?

Mr. FESS. There has been some question of the constitutionality of the bill, and it has been somewhat opposed by some States on that suggestion, which, I think, is what my friend has in mind, that Federal control might prevent the State control of its own matters. I am not so sure but what that is true, that the Federal law will in a sense supersede the State law, which must be permitted in cases of treaties where they come into conflict. This being a migratory question that State laws can not possibly control, simply because not confined to any State, it seems to me that it is strictly a Federal function of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of protecting the birds. My admiration for our little friends of the air makes me unfriendly to the habit of killing off these winged visitors, whether game birds, migratory birds, or other species, if they are not nuisances.

The needs of the farmer call loudly for their protection, as suggested by the figures quoted. The food requirements, if considered from that standpoint, also demand their protection from the market hunter. These two considerations no one will doubt are subjects of legislative consideration. For these reasons this bill is backed by most of the States and many voluntary associations throughout the country. I here insert indorsements of significance:

INDORSEMENTS OF THE MIGRATORY-BIRD TREATY.

1. The executive committee of the National Association of Game and Fish Commissioners indorsed the treaty-enabling bill at a meeting held in Washington, D. C., on June 13, 1917. (Copy annexed.)
2. The National Association of Game and Fish Commissioners indorsed the treaty and bill at its annual convention held at St. Paul, Minn., in September, 1917. (Copy annexed.)
3. The National Grange in 1913 recommended the negotiation of the treaty. (Copy of resolution annexed.)
4. The American Forestry Association approved the treaty by resolution passed January 19, 1917.
5. The governor of Missouri approved the treaty-enabling bill in a telegram to the Secretary July 7, 1917.
6. The State game commissioners of nearly every State, including Illinois, Oklahoma, and Arkansas, have approved the Federal protection of migratory birds.
7. The National Association of Audubon Societies favors the enactment of this legislation.
8. The executive committee of the Missouri Fish and Game League indorsed the treaty by a resolution adopted March 4, 1918, and asserted its belief in the principle of Federal protection of migratory birds.
9. Twenty-four States have made the seasons on waterfowl under State laws conform with the seasons under the Federal regulations. These States are: Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, Idaho, Oregon, Washington, Tennessee, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Arizona, California, Nevada, Utah.

THE MISSOURI FISH AND GAME LEAGUE INDORSES THE BILL.

The migratory-bird law: The league believes in the principle of Federal protection of migratory birds and it indorses the treaty with Canada under which these birds are to be protected in both countries. It does not, however, believe that the present Federal shooting season is either necessary for the proper protection of migratory birds or as equally distributed as the reasonable ends of sport in this part of the country demand. With the support of the sportsmen of Missouri and the surrounding country the league will inaugurate a movement to extend the season to March 10, which is the last day upon which shooting is permitted by the international treaty.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF GAME AND FISH COMMISSIONERS.

At a meeting of the executive committee of the National Association of Game and Fish Commissioners held at Washington, D. C., on the 13th day of June, 1917, present, M. L. Alexander, Carlos Avery, John P. Woods, J. Quincy Ward, George H. Graham, and W. E. Barber, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas there is pending in Congress a bill (S. 1553; H. R. 2612) to give effect to the migratory-bird treaty between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory game and insectivorous birds in the United States and Canada; and

"Whereas the conservation and protection of the migratory insectivorous birds is so closely related to the conservation of the food, cotton, and timber crops of the country, and the migratory game birds constitute an important source of the food supply, the conservation of which is so necessary to the success of the United States and her allies in the war upon which we are now engaged: Therefore be it

"Resolved, It is the sense of the executive committee of the National Association of Game and Fish Commissioners that the said bill is and should be considered an important war measure, and we respectfully recommend the immediate passage of said bill by Congress as one of the most effective means of conserving the resources so necessary for the welfare of the country;

"Resolved, further, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, to each Member of Congress, and to the Secretary of Agriculture."

M. L. ALEXANDER,
President.
CARLOS AVERY,
Secretary.
JNO. P. WOODS,
Treasurer.
W. E. BARBER.
J. QUINCY WARD.
GEO. H. GRAHAM.

RESOLUTION PASSED AT 1913 CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL GRANGE.

Resolved, That the National Grange favors the negotiations of treaties with other nations, embodying the provisions of our own laws, or such treaties as shall be most favorable for preserving for all time the birds of this country and of this continent, and also the indispensable, useful, interesting, and beautiful birds of the world—this wealth in birds numbering 13,000 species:

Resolved. That the Secretary is hereby instructed to send this resolution to the President.

INDORSEMENT BY THE AMERICAN FORESTRY ASSOCIATION.

Resolved, That the American Forestry Association respectfully urges the present Congress to make effective, through the necessary legislative action, the recently ratified convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of useful migratory birds.

Speedy action is desirable in view of the increasing economic loss to all the people which must ensue if action be deferred until the next Congress.

Passed at annual meeting of association January 19, 1917.

[Resolution adopted at meeting of National Association of Game and Fish Commissioners held in St. Paul, Minn., Aug. 27, 28, 29, 1917.]

"Whereas there is pending in the Congress of the United States a bill known as the migratory bird treaty act, for the purpose of giving effect to the treaty ratified on December 6, 1916, between Great Britain and the United States; and

"Whereas these two Governments are allies in the great struggle now being waged to free the peoples of the world from the oppression of autocracy; and

"Whereas it is necessary to utilize every natural resource to the fullest extent for the purpose of accomplishing these ends; and

"Whereas the food supply of the world is one of the most important factors in the present struggle; and

"Whereas our migratory birds constitute one of the greatest agencies in the conservation of the food supply of the world, both directly and indirectly—

"1. Directly in that the migratory game birds furnish an important food for our people.

"2. Indirectly in that the migratory insectivorous birds make possible the growing of crops; and

"Whereas conservation in all of its phases is the most important element necessary for the success of this great world-wide struggle for democracy: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the National Association of Game and Fish Commissioners in convention assembled, That we urge upon Congress the early passage of the migratory bird treaty act as an important war measure; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this association and that the secretary send to each Member of Congress, to the President of the United States, and to the Secretary of Agriculture a copy of this resolution."

I hereby certify that the foregoing resolution is a true and correct copy of resolution introduced and adopted by the National Association of Game and Fish Commissioners in convention assembled, at St. Paul, Minn., August 27, 28, 29, 1917.

Secretary National Association of Game and Fish Commissioners.

[Extract from letter dated Dec. 31, 1917, chairman fish and game commission (Kentucky), Joseph G. Sachs, chairman.]

I am pleased to state that the number of wild fowl killed in our State during this year shows a considerable decrease over the past three years, which, I take it, is a result of the enactment of the migratory-bird law and the regulations thereunder prohibiting spring shooting, shipment, sale, and transportation of wild fowl, and while the Kentucky commission has differed with you in some of your regulations, especially that of jacksnipe, we think the benefit of the law, even where imperfectly enforced, is so evident that we have recommended to the governor in our biennial report the enactment of a law in Kentucky conforming to the Federal regulations.

Very truly, yours,

(Signed) JOS. G. SACHS.

President Wilson has expressed his approval of the measure.

Mr. W. L. McAtee, of the Biological Survey, says:

The number of birds in the United States is enormous and their potentialities for good or harm are correspondingly great. Investigation has shown, however, that most birds must be classed as beneficial, although in varying degrees. Only four or five species are consistently injurious. On a basis of numerous bird censuses it is practically certain that there are nearly 4,000,000,000 breeding birds in the United States each summer. A great majority of these are of migratory species and birds which are purely migratory in the United States, breeding in the northern part of North America, equal in number, if they do not surpass, the population of breeding birds. Estimating the value of each bird in the destruction of insects at 10 cents per year—a ridiculously low figure—and the value of the purely migratory species at one-sixth of that of the breeding migratory and resident species, it is certain that without their services the bill for insect damage in the country would be more than $444,000,000 greater than it now is. This amount is more than a third of the latest estimate of the total damage by insects.

MISSOURI INDORSEMENT.

[Telegram from Gov. F. D. Gardner to Secretary of Agriculture, July 7, 1917.]

Missouri is interested in the bill pending in Congress to make effective the bird treaty with Canada. There are special reasons why it should be speedily enacted. If I can assist, command me.

ILLINOIS INDORSEMENT.

[Letter, July 19, 1917, from Hon. Ralph F. Bradford, chief game and fish warden, Springfield, Ill.]

This division is not only in favor of the enforcement of the migratory-bird law, but is also in favor of all of the laws. I do not know that I will be an improvement over my predecessors, so far as enforcing the migratory-bird law is concerned, but I certainly will try to have it enforced, and after I have had the experience of seeing what I can do in that regard I can give you some very definite views whether or not it can be enforced in this State.

OKLAHOMA INDORSEMENT.

[Letter, May 30, 1916, from Hon. John Chenoweth, State game and fish warden, Oklahoma City, Okla.]

I am certainly in favor of the migratory-bird law.

ARKANSAS INDORSEMENT.

[Letter, May 29, 1916, from Hon. D. G. Beauchamp, chairman game and fish commission, Paragould, Ark.]

I am most assuredly heartily in favor of the migratory-bird law as a beneficial measure for the protection of the migratory birds and would very much dislike to see it abandoned, but would like to see the law passed on at an early date by the Supreme Court and declared constitutional and strictly enforced, with such minor modifications as might be necessary to meet the approval of the sportsmen and also conserve the birds.

The treaty which this bill proposes to enforce is as follows:

CONVENTION.

Whereas many species of birds in the course of their annual migrations traverse certain parts of the United States and the Dominion of Canada; and

Whereas many of these species are of great value as a source of food or in destroying insects which are injurious to forests and forage plants on the public domain, as well as to agricultural crops in both the United States and Canada, but are nevertheless in danger of extermination through lack of adequate protection during the nesting season or while on their way to and from their breeding grounds;

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India, being desirous of saving from indiscriminate slaughter and of insuring the preservation of such migratory birds as are either useful to man or are harmless, have resolved to adopt some uniform system of protection which shall effectively accomplish such objects, and to the end of concluding a convention for this purpose have appointed as their respective plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America, Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States; and

His Britannic Majesty, the Right Hon. Sir Cecil Arthur Spring Rice, G. C. V. O., K. C. M. G., etc., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary at Washington;

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed to and adopted the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting powers declare that the migratory birds included in the terms of this convention shall be as follows:

1. Migratory game birds:

(a) Anatidæ or waterfowl, including brant, wild ducks, geese, and swans.

(b) Gruidæ or cranes, including little brown, sandhill, and whooping cranes.

(c) Rallidæ or rails, including coots, gallinules, and sora and other rails.

(d) Limicolæ or shore birds, including avocets, curlew, dowitchers, godwits, knots, oyster catchers, phalaropes, plovers, sandpipers, snipe, tilts, surf birds, turnstones, willet, woodcock, and yellowlegs.

(e) Columbidæ or pigeons, including doves and wild pigeons.

2. Migratory insectivorous birds: Bobolinks, catbirds, chickadees, cuckoos, flickers, flycatchers, grosbeaks, humming birds, kinglets, martins, meadowlarks, nighthawks or bull bats, nut-hatches, orioles, robins, shrikes, swallows, swifts, tanagers, titmice, thrushes, vireos, warblers, wax-wings, whippoorwills, woodpeckers, and wrens, and all other perching birds which feed entirely or chiefly on insects.

3. Other migratory nongame birds: Auks, auklets, bitterns, fulmars, gannets, grebes, guillemots, gulls, herons, jaegers, loons, murres, petrels, puffins, shearwaters, and terns.

ARTICLE II.

The high contracting powers agree that, as an effective means of preserving migratory birds, there shall be established the following close seasons during which no hunting shall be done except for scientific or propagating purposes under permits issued by proper authorities:

1. The close season on migratory game birds shall be between March 10 and September 1, except that the close season on Limicolæ or shore birds in the maritime Provinces of Canada and in those States of the United States bordering on the Atlantic Ocean which are situated wholly or in part north of Chesapeake Bay shall be between February 1 and August 15, and that Indians may take at any time scoters for food but not for sale. The season for hunting shall be further restricted to such period, not exceeding three and one-half months, as the high contracting parties may severally deem appropriate and define by law or regulation.

2. The close season on migratory insectivorous birds shall continue throughout the year.

3. The close season on other migratory nongame birds shall continue throughout the year, except that Eskimos and Indians may take at any season auks, auklets, guillemots, murres, and puffins, and their eggs for food and their skins for clothing, but the birds and eggs so taken shall not be sold or offered for sale.

ARTICLE III.

The high contracting powers agree that during the period of 10 years next following the going into effect of this convention there shall be a continuous close season on the following migratory game birds, to wit:

Band-tailed pigeons, little brown, sandhill, and whooping cranes, swans, curlew, and all shore birds (except the black-breasted and golden plover, Wilson or jack snipe, woodcock, and the greater and lesser yellowlegs); provided that during such 10 years the close seasons on cranes, swans, and curlew in the Province of British Columbia shall be made by the proper authorities of that Province within the general dates and limitations elsewhere prescribed in this convention for the respective groups to which these birds belong.

ARTICLE IV.

The high contracting powers agree that special protection shall be given the wood duck and the eider duck either (1) by a close season extending over a period of at least five years, or (2) by the establishment of refuges, or (3) by such other regulations as may be deemed appropriate.

ARTICLE V.

The taking of nests or eggs of migratory game or insectivorous or nongame birds shall be prohibited, except for scientific or propagating purposes under such laws or regulations as the high contracting powers may severally deem appropriate.

ARTICLE VI.

The high contracting powers agree that the shipment or export of migratory birds or their eggs from any State or Province during the continuance of the close season in such State or Province, shall be prohibited except for scientific or propagating purposes, and the international traffic in any birds or eggs at such time captured, killed, taken, or shipped at any time contrary to the laws of the State or Province in which the same were captured, killed, taken, or shipped shall be likewise prohibited. Every package containing migratory birds or any parts thereof, or any eggs of migratory birds transported or offered for transportation from the Dominion of Canada into the United States or from the United States into the Dominion of Canada shall have the name and address of the shipper and an accurate statement of the contents clearly marked on the outside of such package.

ARTICLE VII.

Permits to kill any of the above-named birds which, under extraordinary conditions, may become seriously injurious to the agricultural or other interests in any particular community, may be issued by the proper authorities of the high contracting powers under suitable regulations prescribed therefor by them respectively, but such permits shall lapse or may be canceled at any time when, in the opinion of said authorities, the particular exigency has passed, and no birds killed under this article shall be shipped, sold, or offered for sale.

ARTICLE VIII.

The high contracting powers agree themselves to take, or propose to their respective appropriate law-making bodies, the necessary measures for insuring the execution of the present convention.

ARTICLE IX.

The present convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty. The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible and the convention shall take effect on the date of the exchange of the ratifications. It shall remain in force for 15 years, and in the event of neither of the high contracting powers having given notification, 12 months before the expiration of said period of 15 years, of its intention of terminating its operation, the convention shall continue to remain in force for one year, and so on from year to year.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention in duplicate and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done at Washington this 16th day of August, 1916.

[SEAL.] ROBERT LANSING.
[SEAL.] CECIL SPRING-RICE.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman remembers that we passed a bill here recently which prevented the sale or offering for sale of wild duck or wild geese in Washington. In other words, it closed out the use of game birds altogether. There we probably had jurisdiction, but my point is as to the right of the Federal Government to interfere with the laws of the State of Indiana, for instance.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. FLOOD. There is no doubt about the fact that this treaty and law which we will enact to enforce the treaty will supersede the State laws, but there is also no doubt about the fact that as a practical question it is not going to interfere with any of the State laws or regulations, because 38 of the States, through laws or regulations, have already agreed to provisions that correspond with the provisions of this treaty.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FLOOD. In a moment, I will.

All of the game associations of forty and odd States have signified their approval of this treaty and the law that we are about to enact to carry the treaty into effect. The legislation and regulations of 38 States already accord with this, so the suggestion I make is that it will not interfere with any of the State laws or regulations, because in a few months all the States will have acquiesced in it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Leaving out bluejays, and robins, and song birds, which we would all like to preserve, and applying this bill only to game birds, like ducks and geese and brant, will we be prevented in the various States from killing them hereafter for food?

Mr. FLOOD. I will give you a list of the birds that will not be affected by them.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, my time is running, is it not?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. FLOOD. There are a great many birds not migratory.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A wild goose, for instance——

Mr. FLOOD. That is a migratory bird.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to these gentlemen for debate?

Mr. FESS. A little while.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Getting down to brass tacks, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] will permit, men in the fall shoot wild ducks in the State of New Jersey subject to the game laws of that State. Will they be prevented from exercising their privilege under the laws of the State of New Jersey if this bill passes?

Mr. FLOOD. If the laws of the State of New Jersey conflict with this law they will be prevented from doing it. This law will prevail over the laws of the State of New Jersey as to migratory birds and not as to nonmigratory birds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then it means the cessation of duck hunting and goose hunting as heretofore?

Mr. FLOOD. It does not in New Jersey, because that law——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I suggest to the gentleman it does not mean migratory birds in the broad sense, but migratory birds covered by the language of the treaty. I think the distinction ought to be made all the way through.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] or the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. BLAND. In Indiana we did have spring and fall duck shooting, and had for many years, until the recent meddlesome law was passed. As I understand it, it will take away the privilege of shooting these ducks passing in the spring up through Indiana, while down in the swamps of Arkansas they can shoot all they want, although there is only three or five days difference in time. Is that correct?

Mr. FESS. I do not understand that that is correct.

Mr. BLAND. It will happen when this law goes into operation.

Mr. FESS. There are three and one-half months permitted——

Mr. BLAND. As I understand it, if the law of Arkansas permits those birds to be killed, say, in the month of February, they can be killed down there, although we can not kill them as they come across the State of Indiana? Is not that true under this law?

Mr. FESS. If they happen to come at that particular time, during the closed season, it is perhaps true. And the marksman ought not to be permitted to go where they are.

Mr. BLAND. That is the only crack we get at them. Do you not think we ought to have a right to get some of that food?

Mr. FESS. If there is no closed season in Arkansas, this bill makes a closed season.

Mr. BLAND. Let us see. Does this bill make a closed season if they do not nest in Arkansas? They feed there and nest in the North, and come South, and we go down there and shoot them.

Mr. FESS. As to the closed season, it is left to the authorities to specify the closed season.

Mr. BLAND. The State should do that? I want to know if this proposed law prevents ducks from being killed in Arkansas?

Mr. FESS. When the authorities here declare what the closed season shall be, that will cover Arkansas.

Mr. BLAND. That is very indefinite.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I promised time to other gentlemen under the rule, and gentlemen are entering the merits of the question here which they can discuss under the bill. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH). The gentleman has consumed 10 minutes.

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that the Department of Agriculture has completely prepared a schedule for all the States. The minute this bill becomes a law the Secretary of Agriculture will put those rules into effect that will establish in every locality in the United States an appropriate closed and open season, one that scientifically will do justice to all parts of the country and cut off the pot shooting that has been going on. And I will say now, and I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] will forbear with me as I say it, that there is one section of the country that has been the worst offender on this earth, and maybe they have not appreciated how serious it is, and that section has been Indiana, Kentucky, and Missouri.

That section has been Indiana, Kentucky, and Missouri. Why? Because they are in an intermediate position, the ducks going down and back. They have been killing them unceremoniously, and they have been performing acts that you and I would not stand for, I know, and the people in the gentleman's State would not stand for it if they knew the facts.

Mr. BLAND. I will say to the gentleman that the people of Indiana do not kill one duck to a hundred that are killed in the southern resorts. We rarely kill them. There are sections in our country where they do not know what duck meat tastes like.

Mr. PLATT. I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] that he is wrong about his own State. His State does not allow spring shooting of ducks, according to the synposis of State game laws that I have here.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that the recent legislatures did change our law, in some respects, at the request of the bird cranks and resort-visiting fellows.

Mr. PLATT. Nearly all of the States now conform to the migratory-bird law. If you allow spring shooting, you shoot ducks and geese as they are going to their breeding grounds, and under those circumstances every female bird killed means a loss of a nest and a loss of a considerable number of future birds. If you shoot them in the fall after they have hatched out their young, there are so many more birds to shoot. It is the testimony of the gamekeepers all over the United States—I have a great stack of them—that the number of ducks has increased considerably since the migratory bird act has been put into effect.

It has not been possible to enforce it completely, but it has done a lot of good already.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is it not a fact that sportsmen representing at least 500,000 members are behind this bill?

Mr. PLATT. I so understand.

Mr. BLAND. The sportsmen, so called, may be behind this bill, but the ordinary man out in the country can not go out and get a mess of ducks. That is the fact.

Mr. PLATT. Sportsmen all over the country are in favor of the enforcement of the law, which will increase the number of ducks and give every man who wants to shoot them a better opportunity.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the adoption of this rule, and I am in favor of the passage of the legislation.

I do not think there is any question about the great value to agriculture from the protection of insectivorous birds. That has been demonstrated beyond all doubt. I have observed the practical workings of the migratory-bird law that we have had on the statute books in the last few years, and it is my personal observation that it has already resulted in great good in affording more adequate protection to migratory wild fowl up to the present time.

For instance, in my home State of Kansas the great semi-annual flocks of wild ducks and wild geese that 25 years ago used to pass over our State in their annual migrations have perceptibly diminished year by year as a result of merciless slaughter, especially during the spring breeding season.

As a result of the discontinuance of spring shooting, now they are getting fairly plentiful with the protection recent laws have already afforded in the spring and breeding seasons. I have a farm out on the prairies of Kansas. On that farm I built a small artificial lake for the purpose of growing fish and getting a little duck shooting. Formerly we did not have much shooting in the fall. We used to shoot them in the spring. At that time the ducks would come up from the South. In migrating northward in the spring the wild duck seems to cling to the zone of the melting ice; consequently their spring food is scarce and they were poor and scrawny and almost unfit for food. The females were full of eggs. They were on their way up to Canada to rear their broods of young in the northern lakes and marshes. Their bodies were full of duck lice, and their flesh was really unfit for food, yet they were slaughtered in great numbers.

Now, since only a few years of protection, I noticed on my farm this last spring that we have had a great number of wild ducks on the pond. They are no longer shot at in the spring, and they become quite tame. We also had flocks of Canada geese that I had not noticed in our part of the country for years. One morning I saw six great white cranes or wild swans, a species of wild fowl that I had not seen in our country for 20 years. And the white and great brant again made their appearance, resting on the little lakes in their migration to the North, after an absence of many years.

These laws for the protection of migratory wild fowl and insectivorous birds are already producing beneficial results, and for that reason I want to see this bill to carry out our treaty stipulations with Canada put on the statute books to strengthen the law that we already have.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad to hear the gentleman's statement, because it is a very strong one and comes right from home. But how are the public to obtain food from these birds, which are increasing in numbers, as the gentleman indicates, and when?

Mr. ANTHONY. Because the birds return on their fall migration, frequenting much the same line of flight as when on their way going North, there is an open shooting season during the fall months in all the States. At that season, too, the birds are fat, in prime physical condition, and make the best food.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to know if we were to be deprived of that altogether.

Mr. ANTHONY. No. There are adequate open seasons. Those seasons, of course, do not please everyone now. There is a controversy throughout the country as to whether the zones are properly defined, but I have every confidence that any not now equitable eventually will be made so. It is my experience that the farmers are in favor of proper protection of the birds and the wild fowl, and to my knowledge, for the most part, the people who are against this bill are the market shooters, who want to go out and kill a lot of birds in the spring, when they ought not to kill them, and some so-called city sportsmen, who want spring shooting just to gratify a lust for slaughter. Most of the opposition to this measure will be from that class of shooters. I hope the rule and the bill will pass. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on adopting the rule.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF A FRENCH CITIZEN (S. DOC. NO. 231).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in relation to a claim presented by the Government of France against this Government on account of losses sustained by a French citizen in connection with the search for the body of Admiral John Paul Jones, which was undertaken by Gen. Horace Porter, formerly American ambassador to France, and I recommend that an appropriation be made to effect a settlement of this claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 4 June, 1918.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] to take the chair during the debate on this bird bill, and told him he would have 40 minutes in which to get his lunch; but the debate on the rule was shortened up, so he has not got back, and the Chair will ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] to preside until the return of Mr. KEATING, when he will be called to the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the Chair who is to control the time in opposition to this bill? It makes no special difference, except that several gentlemen have asked me.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Under the ordinary procedure here I suppose I would be in control of the time upon this side, but I am strongly in favor of this bill, and I think I ought to yield that honor to some one else.

The CHAIRMAN. The usual custom is for some one opposed to the bill to control the time in opposition.

Mr. FLOOD. The rule so provides. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the only member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs who is opposed to the bill is the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The point is to find out to whom gentlemen who want time in opposition should apply.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] will yield some time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] would like to have some time in opposition. How will he get it?

Mr. FLOOD. I ask unanimous consent that I may control 45 minutes of the time and that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] control the other 45 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Is not that provided in the rule?

Mr. FLOOD. It is not provided who shall be in charge of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule simply provides that some one in opposition to the bill shall have control of the time in opposition. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] asks unanimous consent that he control 45 minutes of the time and that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] control the other 45 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] if he will yield some time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND]?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds. It was concluded at Washington August 16, 1916. Insectivorous migratory birds as well as migratory game birds are embraced in the terms of the treaty. The protection of the insectivorous migratory birds is essential to the preservation of our cotton, grain, and timber crops, whilst the migratory game birds contribute materially to our food supply. The bill may well be considered a measure of importance as affecting the successful prosecution of the war in which we are now engaged.

These migratory birds nest in Canada and winter in the United States. Some nest on both sides of the line. It was deemed expedient and necessary that Canada assent to the convention and its terms. The Parliament of Canada gave its assent thereto the 29th of August, 1917.

The Senate has acted. It remains for the House to complete this most important and necessary legislation by passing Senate bill 1553, now being considered by the House, with the amendments recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which has given the bill full and careful consideration.

Its inception was in 1913, when Senator McLEAN, of Connecticut, suggested that President Wilson propose to other Governments negotiation to protect migratory birds.

President Wilson, whose sympathies were strongly in favor of such legislation, and whose judgment approved its utility, immediately acted. Great Britain did not hesitate, and the convention was held in this city, as stated.

The treaty is valid. It violates no fundamental principle of our Government. It was negotiated and concluded by the authorities having undisputed power to do so. It has been ratified by both Governments. The power to make treaties extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our Government and that of other nations.

One of the provisions of the migratory-bird treaty is that the two nations shall enact whatever legislation may be necessary to carry into effect its terms.

As this agreement is contained in the treaty, Congress must execute the contract by legislation to make it effective and enforceable by the courts.

The bill as reported has all essential requisites to enforce the treaty.

You will realize the very great importance of this bill as a conservation measure if you will consider the enormous extent of the destruction of our crops by insects. Few even of the best informed know the vast extent of the damage.

An editorial in the Washington Times of December 25, 1917, from which I quote, states that this destruction is $1,000,000,000 yearly. It costs the United States $5,000,000 yearly to feed its grasshoppers, sixty millions yearly to feed the chinch bug. The Hessian fly costs forty millions yearly; the cotton-boll weevil, eight millions yearly; the potato bug, eight millions yearly; the cabbage worm, five millions yearly.

The Times credits these facts to Mr. C. L. Marlatt, assistant chief of the Bureau of Entomology in the Department of Agriculture.

There can be no doubt of the comparative accuracy of these figures, given by a paper distinguished by its careful research and vouched for by an official whose duty it is to ascertain the truth with reference to these statistics as nearly as it may be possible so to do.

Nor is the injury inflicted by insects restricted to a financial loss, great as it is. They spread far and wide the germs of disease amongst cattle, whilst the lives of many thousands of our people are made useless to themselves and a grievous burden to others by the ravages of yellow fever and malaria, propagated by the mosquito.

The indiscriminate and wholesale slaughter of birds for many years past has been not only a blot upon our civilization, but also a serious blow to our agricultural resources, as appears from the estimated damage to our crops which I have mentioned.

Many of you will recollect—it has not been so many years ago—when immense flocks of wild pigeons darkened the skies in their flight, when the branches of trees upon which they lighted broke beneath their weight.

Where are they now? You will look for their coming in vain. Not one can be found within all the borders of this vast land of ours. Whither have they flown? The answer will be found in the avarice and brutality of man in their slaughter for sale and for sport, unrestricted by regulations of any kind.

Unless legislation is enacted for the protection of bird life with efficient regulations rigidly enforced, the birds of this country, so useful to all in their conservation of food by the destruction of insects and a source of happiness to thousands, aside from their utility, will join the wild pigeons in their last flight.

In the United States there are 1,200 different kinds of birds, a very large percentage of which feed upon insects. Save the birds which destroy the insects and an incalculable service will be rendered to our country by increasing its supply of food so imperatively needed to meet the necessities of the war in which we are now engaged and to the successful issue of which we have pledged our fortunes, our lives, and our honor, which pledge will never be forfeited so long as the Republic lives.

Pass this bill and you have contributed largely to the result so earnestly desired by all.

It is said by those opposed to the bill that it violates the Constitution, first, in that it delegates legislative power to the Secretary of Agriculture. The objection is unfounded. There is no such delegation of power in the bill. The same question arose as to the quarantine laws. The law of 1905 authorized the Secretary of Agriculture when he ascertained that a dangerous cattle disease existed in any locality to quarantine that locality, and that when quarantined it should be unlawful to move any cattle from that area interstate except in compliance with such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture might make prescribing the manner and method under which cattle might be transported.

The quarantine laws have been repeatedly sustained by the courts. The Secretary ascertains and declares facts upon which the act itself operates.

The same theory applies to the provision as to rivers and harbors which authorizes the Secretary of War to ascertain and declare the facts. In the Union Bridge case it would seem that the Supreme Court disposed of the same question beyond controversy so clearly that none could misunderstand.

The Secretary of Agriculture is the agent of Congress to ascertain the facts. Congress gives the right to hunt when consistent with the facts ascertained and declared by the Secretary, whose judgment is controlling subject to the limitations of the treaty. The Secretary of Agriculture would not legislate in any sense of the word. This bill was drafted, as your committee was informed, upon the same theory as the quarantine laws and the rivers and harbors provision. This is manifestly true, as will appear by reading the bill.

The present migratory-bird law has been declared unconstitutional by five courts—three Federal courts and two State supreme courts, Maine and Kansas—whilst it has been sustained by 15 courts. One of the cases decided by a Federal court was from the eastern district of Arkansas—Shauvers case. That case was removed to the Supreme Court of the United States and was argued in 1915. That court took it under advisement. When the case was called the Attorney General moved that the case be passed subject to be called up by an agreement of counsel. Is it not a fair and legitimate presumption that this action was so taken to give Congress the opportunity to enact a bill to carry out the treaty between the United States and Great Britain?

The bill deals with an international question. There is a marked distinction between the right of Congress to legislate for the protection of birds in the different States, in the absence of any treaty with another nation with reference to the same subject and affecting the interests of that other nation, and the right to so legislate after a treaty is made to carry it into effect.

The cases relied upon as bearing upon the present migratory-bird law and intended to show its violation of the Constitution, in that it interferes with the inherent right of the several States to regulate and control game laws, do not apply to this bill.

The full power of the United States to make treaties, with stipulations affecting matters within State control, and also to enforce said treaties by appropriate legislation, is recognized by many eminent authorities, both Federal and State.

It could not be otherwise, as the States are deprived of all power to make treaties by express constitutional limitations. It is only through the intervention of the Federal Government, exercised in their behalf, that the rights of the citizens of each State with foreign nations can be protected.

At the very commencement of the operation of constitutional power a conflict arose between State sovereignty and the right of the Federal Government to modify State laws under the treaty-making power.

Over 100 years ago this question was before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Ware against Hylton, reported in Third Dallas, page 199. This case has been the leading authority from that date, that a treaty made by the constituted authorities of the United States with regard to any matters, whether exclusively within the control of the States or not, was paramount to any State legislation. The point involved was whether the treaty of peace with Great Britain would override State statutes in regard to the collection and confiscation of antebellum debts owed by Americans to citizens of Great Britain.

The doctrine announced in Ware against Hylton was reiterated in Fairfax v. Hunter (U. S. Supreme Court, 7 Cranch, 603); also in Hopkirk v. Bell (U. S. Supreme Court, 3 Cranch); in Hunter v. Martin (U. S. Supreme Court, 4 Wheat.); in Haunstine v. Lynham (100 U. S. Supreme Court); in Chirac v. Chirac (U. S. Supreme Court, 2 Wheat.); in Geoffroy v. Riggs (133 U. S. Supreme Court; in Carneal v. Banks (U. S. Supreme Court, 10 Wheat., 189); in Hughes v. Edwards (U. S. Supreme Court. 9 Wheat., 489); and in other cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States which might be cited.

In Ware against Hylton it was held that the treaty of peace nullified all State laws by its own operation when in conflict with them.

In Hopkins against Bell the treaty was held to repeal the Virginia statute of limitations.

In Hunter against Martin it was held that in a case where the treaty was ratified after the rendition of a judgment in the circuit court, which was impeachable on no other ground than the effect of a treaty, the judgment was revoked on that ground.

To the same effect have been the decisions of the highest courts in many of the States.

The Supreme Court of Tennessee delivered an opinion recognizing the supremacy of treaties over State laws.

In Kentucky it has been decided that the law of the State must give way as soon as a treaty took effect.

The Supreme Court of Michigan adopted the same view as to the far-reaching power of treaties.

Likewise have the courts of New York, Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, and Massachusetts.

It is proper to state that there are numerous decisions by Federal and State courts to the contrary. But the overwhelming weight of authority is that State statutes must give way when in conflict with treaty stipulations.

These decisions are sustained by the support and concurrence of the illustrious names of John Marshall, Joseph Story, and other eminent jurists, including Justices Jay, Field, Bradley, Miller, Harlan Gray, and Fuller.

It has also been urged that the United States could not exercise its treaty-making power in regard to matters wholly within State jurisdiction to any greater extent than Congress could exercise its legislative powers.

It is sufficient to say in answer thereto that the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that the treaty-making power could regulate the descent of property as well as other matters under State jurisdiction, and that in so doing it can supersede all conflicting State laws which Congress, in the absence of treaty stipulation, could not possibly do by ordinary legislation.

When the importance of this bill is considered as affecting the interests of our entire country, one can not fail to pause and reflect upon the memorable words of Joseph Story:

> That had the framers of the Constitution done nothing else than to securely vest the treaty-making power in the Central Government they would be entitled to immortality and the unending gratitude of the American people.

[Applause.]

The constitutional objection most strongly urged against the bill is directed to section 5, which gives the power to employees of the Department of Agriculture, authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce its provisions, authority to search houses other than dwelling houses if they have reason to suspect that there is concealed therein any bird killed or captured contrary to the provisions of the treaty.

It has been said that Congress has not constitutional authority to authorize such search without warrant, and the provision in the fourth amendment is cited in support of this contention. It is respectfully submitted that this proposition can not be sustained.

In deference, however, to the universal sentiment which has ever prevailed throughout our country against search and seizure without a warrant and which is characteristic of every free people, your committee will offer an amendment to section 5 which will entirely remove the constitutional objection just stated. I will not therefore trespass upon your time by a discussion of its merits.

This bill should be enacted into law at once in the interest of our common country. Its constitutionality can be tested afterwards if desired or deemed necessary. The pathway is clear to the forum of the highest court in our land.

In the meanwhile let the boll weevil go to rest amidst the happy hunting grounds of his fathers in that great and splendid region of our land where he first saw the light. Let his onward march of destruction be halted forever, and few there will be, even where the doctrine of State rights is most highly cherished, who will lament his departure or criticize those who have hastened his funeral obsequies, as is intended by this act, and may his allies of the same vicious type likewise share his fate. [Applause.]

Let the song bird live to herald to the world its happy and joyous anthem proclaiming the goodness of God to all his creatures.

I yield to none in my reverence for the Constitution of our fathers, which has been and ever shall be the shield of the people against fanaticism, wrong, and oppression. But I do not wish an erroneous construction of its provisions to interfere with the essential advantages which will be derived from this bill. I have therefore endeavored as best I could to ascertain the truth as to its constitutionality from the opinions of the great judges who have illumined the judicial history of this land.

With very great respect for the opinions of others and speaking for myself alone, I am entirely satisfied that it violates no constitutional provision in any respect.

A supreme sense of duty, high above the selfishness of the commercial age in which we live, demands the passage of this bill.

Civilization, ever advancing along the world's pathway, pleads for humanity, for the birds, so helpless and yet so useful.

The farmers throughout our entire land, through their organizations, both National and State, with no dissenting voice express their approval.

Five millions of sportsmen entertain the same sentiment; very few, if any, to the contrary.

The boys and girls who journey from their country homes to the village schoolhouse, who halt their footsteps and linger on their way as the sweet message of the song bird comes to them from the fields and the hedges, look to you with appealing eyes, which seem to ask, "Why do you so long delay?" [Applause.]

The entire people of our land urge prompt and efficient legislation.

The era in which we live will be the most glorious epoch in the world's history. It will mark the downfall of the most ruthless system of cruelty, of greed, of nameless crimes known throughout all the ages. [Applause.]

To this mighty triumph of civilization, of justice, of humanity no nation will contribute more than this great Republic. Its children upon the battle fields of France will gild with a new and unfading luster the untarnished splendor of its flag. When they lie down at night to rest under the stars of a foreign sky they will be content and happy, undisturbed by the thought of to-morrow, if they know that no want shall come to those whom they have left at home.

Let us so act in all our legislation that they may realize that this great land will protect not only them but those whom they love.

May their dreams ever be of homes across whose thresholds the representatives of the American people will never allow the specter of want and famine to cast their baleful shadows.

If we fail in all else, let us be true to them.

Then shall each one of us have the approval of his own conscience, and the people of every race and every clime whose steadfast gaze is turned toward this Western Hemisphere will rise up and call us blessed. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman from North Carolina consumed?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. KEATING). Twenty-two minutes. The gentleman from Virginia has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. FLOOD. Has the gentleman from North Carolina consumed 25 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-two minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. He yields back the balance of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina yields back the balance of his time. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire recognition?

Mr. FLOOD. I ask that the gentleman from Alabama yield some time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the bill.

Mr. FLOOD. It was hoped that he would yield to you, however, after you made that statement——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not intend to occupy more than a minute or two, but it strikes me as well enough to say that unless we are careful all those in favor of the bill will have exhausted the time allotted that side before any of those opposed to it have spoken. I think it would be well to sandwich the arguments.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I submitted that to the chairman, and he took his own course.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama controls the time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say to the gentleman that about two minutes of his time have gone. Out of respect for him, I yielded to him first.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not think that two minutes of my time have gone.

Mr. FLOOD. I will give you five minutes of mine later.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have only a word to say.

I have spoken in previous Congresses in favor of the principle and policy embodied in this bill. At this time the President and the Secretary of Agriculture and other men prominent in the administration are urging the enactment of this measure into law to help carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between this country and Great Britain.

I was reminded a moment ago while listening to the eloquent speech of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN] when he mentioned wild pigeons that when a boy I often saw flocks of them flying from morning until late in the afternoon by the millions. As he said, the sky would be darkened. But these beautiful birds are gone. Hunters have helped to exterminate them. I remember well two hunters who used to come in with the boxes of their lumber wagons heaped to overflowing with dead pigeons. These found ready sale; pigeon potpie was a frequent and very popular dish.

But this game bird has been utterly destroyed. Only a few months ago the last wild pigeon known to be in existence was in the zoo in Cincinnati, the management of which institution had long offered a reward of $100 to any person who would produce a mate for it. But none ever was found. A few months ago the one in the zoo died—the last wild pigeon on the American Continent.

This bill, if enacted into law—and it ought promptly to be made a law—will, together with the legislation that is to be enacted in Canada and the treaty with Great Britain, prevent the extermination of other birds equally valuable for purposes of food and now fast disappearing. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman, to yield it to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin used three minutes, and yields back the balance of his time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not reserve his time. The time is out of his control.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have an understanding with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] that I am to yield back the remainder to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman yields back to me three minutes?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. When shall I yield that to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Whenever the gentleman wishes to speak.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, we have been entertained and charmed by the eloquence of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN]. If he had had a full house there would have been no question about the passage of this bill. It will pass in any event for that matter. I, as much as any man, am in favor of conserving wild life, of protecting the song birds, and I distinctly believe in protecting those birds that destroy insects. But I observe that the wild duck is mentioned as one of the species of birds that is to be protected by this legislation. Now, a wild duck is good for nothing in the world except for the table. It is essentially a food bird. They do not destroy insects. They are not song birds, but they are good for food only. So, if this bill is to be passed, and if they are to be protected for all time to come, they will multiply rapidly, as they do, and so far as I am able to determine will serve no useful purpose whatever.

Now, instead of the wild duck being an insect destroyer, it destroys the very thing we are trying to conserve and protect. In my State there are four or five counties where rice is grown in great quantities. This rice is harvested about the middle of October, and sometimes stays in the shock, like wheat, until the first of January. The wild ducks come there in great numbers and destroy the rice. The rice farmers have quite a time in getting rid of them. They do not destroy the boll weevil, as has been intimated. Wild ducks will not destroy a boll weevil, but they do consume vast quantities of rice.

Our State has passed wholesome laws on that subject of conserving wild birds. We do not allow the sportsmen to kill migratory wild fowl of any kind after sundown, when they nestle on the waters, but it does allow sportsmen to kill a reasonable number in the daytime. It does not permit these wild fowl to be shipped out of the State. I do not understand why sportsmen would want to protect wild ducks forever. The idea of a sportsman is to go out occasionally to kill a wild duck for his table, not for the purpose of shipping it out of the State, but for the purpose of using it himself or giving it to his friends.

Mr. FLOOD. At what time do they shoot wild ducks in the gentleman's State?

Mr. TILLMAN. They fly south from October to December. They pass back again in March. There are no insects for them to destroy at that time, but in the autumn they do destroy the grain. They linger each season for only a day or so as they pass. Judge Trieber, in the eastern district of Arkansas, held the migratory bird law to be unconstitutional. The idea of the proponents of this measure seems to be that, having gotten a treaty with Great Britain, this legislation will not then be unconstitutional. This treaty can not affect the constitutional question raised here. This legislation is a radical interference with the rights of the State.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, it is a bad idea to delegate to the Secretary of Agriculture the right to legislate, the right to pass drastic regulations, and the right to invoke a still more drastic enforcement of those regulations. I do not like the provision in this bill that will enable, unless it is corrected, an understrapper of the Department of Agriculture to search a man's premises without an affidavit or even to search his house with an affidavit. I do not want to see men not under bond, perhaps aliens to the State they are operating in, search houses for wild game in the way I have indicated.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Did I understand the gentleman to say something about protecting wild ducks forever?

Mr. TILLMAN. Under the provisions of this bill, if it passes, they will be protected for an indefinite period, provided the Secretary of Agriculture desires to see this done.

Mr. PLATT. You mean there will be no open season at all?

Mr. FLOOD. The bill provides for an open season.

Mr. PLATT. The treaty itself provides for that.

Mr. TILLMAN. When is the open season?

Mr. PLATT. In the fall.

Mr. TILLMAN. The season mentioned is from March 10 to September 1.

Mr. TEMPLE. That is the closed season, from March to September.

Mr. FLOOD. That gives you an open season after that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not think it necessarily does give an open season the way I interpret the bill. The Secretary of Agriculture by your bill, Mr. FLOOD, is invested with autocratic authority to close the duck season forever, if he chooses.

Mr. FLOOD. It certainly does, unless the authorities make a different closed season, which they can not do within three months and a half.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have mentioned some of the objections I have to the bill, again insisting that I favor game conservation, song-bird conservation, fish conservation, and all proper legislation on these subjects, but you have offered an unconstitutional measure, full of oppressive and drastic provisions. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I object to this bill both upon principle and upon grounds of policy. I object to it, first, because it is of more than doubtful constitutionality. It is fairly clear that the bill would not be constitutional except for the fact that it is proposed to enact it in carrying out a treaty. Without that treaty the bill is unconstitutional. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN] explained that to the House. We have a migratory-bird act already, and that act has been declared unconstitutional by a number of courts. Now, then, in order to get around the decision of these courts and to make something constitutional which otherwise would not be constitutional, the champions of this policy brought forward the plan of having a treaty negotiated with Great Britain, so that Congress might pass a law to carry out the treaty and thereby make such a law that might be constitutional. The real purpose of the treaty was to make constitutional a law which otherwise would not be constitutional. I am reluctant to believe that the police powers of a State may be taken away from it by the National Government by negotiating a treaty with a foreign country. I can not believe that what is otherwise unconstitutional as an unjustifiable invasion of powers reserved to the States may become constitutional merely because the Senate and the President of the United States, acting upon the part of this Government, shall negotiate and approve a treaty with a foreign country. According to the American system certain powers have been delegated by the States to the Federal Government; those powers certainly can not be extended by the negotiation of a foreign treaty.

I believe that when this bill is finally presented to the Supreme Court it will be held that the police powers of a State are not proper subject matter of a treaty which would take away those powers from the State and vest them in the Federal Government. I do not think that by joining in a treaty the Government of Great Britain can clothe our Government with constitutional functions which it does not otherwise enjoy. If it were possible to do such a thing, I should unhesitatingly oppose it.

Turning from that aspect of the question, I want to call attention to the fact that this treaty was negotiated for the purpose of making this law constitutional. I do not suppose it was ever imagined by anyone that the fact that we had negotiated such a treaty would be used as an argument for Congress passing a law which it had previously passed and which had been held to be beyond its power to pass.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN] in his very interesting address cited numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. As I understood the decisions cited by the gentleman from North Carolina, they referred to cases of contracts. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has examined those decisions generally which were cited by the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have not examined them recently, but I am under the impression that they do not relate to the police powers of the States.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was just what I was coming to. I want to say to the gentleman that I feel a very great deal of sympathy with the purposes of this bill, and I do not agree with the gentleman on the policy of it. The only thing that has given me trouble in thinking about it is the question of the constitutionality. I want to ask the gentleman, Does he distinguish as to the power of a treaty under the Constitution in reference to a contract and the force of a treaty under the Constitution in reference to the police power?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think such a distinction might well be made. So much for that aspect of the matter. Now, let us consider the policy back of this bill. We are all idealists. I am sure there is no heart in this Chamber that did not respond to the eloquent words of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN] upon the song birds. We all love to hear them sing. But as he spoke I thought of myself as a barefoot boy on my way to school listening to the birds sing, and perhaps stopping on the side of the road to see if I could find a bird's nest in a hollow rail or a stump; and I think if I should search my conscience diligently I might perhaps remember some time when I found a bird's nest, and perhaps took out a little speckled egg and carried it with me to school to show it to the other boys. I think perhaps there may be some such incident in the memory of almost every boy who has been raised in the country. I can remember taking an old single-barreled muzzle-loading shotgun and going out hunting for squirrels or quail or whatever else I could find, all the way up to bears. I can not remember that I found anything much to shoot at beyond a sapsucker or something like that. A boy rarely finds any game. Usually he has not got a fancy bird dog, and he is rarely very dangerous to game if he does find it. But I think I can remember at some time perhaps killing a robin or a dove. I may have upon my soul the guilt of some such atrocious and bloodcurdling offense if I have not succeeded in wiping it out by a long life of remorse.

But, Mr. Chairman, much as I love the song birds, I would not be willing to allow a thoughtless boy that may rob a bird's nest or may kill a robin to be haled before a court, sent to jail, or fined the heavy fine provided in this bill. I would like to see the song birds protected, but I am not willing to see our country infested by a lot of game wardens, appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture or somebody else having no responsibility to the people, snooping and spying around people's houses, swearing out warrants, haling boys to court, and interfering with the local affairs of our people.

Practically every State in this Union has reasonable game laws. Those States that have not got them are enacting them as time goes by, and in reality there is very little occasion for this bill. Its provisions are entirely too harsh as they apply to thoughtless offenders and to those who would not seriously interfere with the purpose of it.

But laying that also aside and assuming that no kind of punishment is too severe for the boy who robs a bird's nest, I call attention to the fact that this bill does not protect game birds. Instead of being called a bill for the protection of game birds, it ought to be named "a bill for the protection of game-bird hunters." The real purpose of this bill, so far as it applies to the game birds, is not to protect the birds, is not to give them life, but to fix it so that the ragged boys, the people far away in the country who have not got bird dogs—to fix it so that the common people of the country can not get their fair share of the game and so that only those who are able to afford game preserves and fancy equipment for hunting and all the paraphernalia that goes with it—these 5,000 sportsmen that Maj. STEDMAN speaks about—can get the game. It is for the protection of these sportsmen. It is a sportsmen's bill, not a boy's bill; it is not a farmer's bill. So far as game birds are concerned, it is not a bill that is intended for a moment to promote the interests of the plain people or those who may be interested in taking game in a small way. It is for the benefit of the man who takes his periodical hunt, with his splendid equipment, and who comes home with all the game he can carry, the man for whom you have to have a limit to the quantity of game he may kill. That is the kind of man that the game end of this bill is intended to protect. But they hitch it up with song-bird protection, with the protection of insectiverous birds, in order to get the support of the farmers, who want these birds to live. They hitch it up with other things that are innocent, so as to get the eloquent tribute and support of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN]. These fancy bird hunters hitch up their end of the bill, the game-bird end, with insectiverous-bird protection in order to benefit themselves and to provide a source of pleasure and amusement for themselves.

It is not for the protection of game birds; it is to preserve them for the exclusive benefit and pleasure of selfish professional hunters.

I would vote for a bill that I regarded as constitutional which would forbid the killing at any time of any kind of insectivorous birds. I would vote for a bill to protect the song birds. I would vote for a bill to protect the farming people to the utmost in saving those birds that destroy harmful insects. But when it comes to protecting bird hunters, the owners of game preserves, and the man who takes an occasional hunting spree into the woods, and protecting them at the expense of the boys in the country and the common man with the old-fashioned gun who kills a duck or some other bird occasionally, I am unwilling to do it.

This bill ought not to be adopted. It puts it within the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to forbid the killing of game birds as much as the killing of song or insectiverous birds. They are put on the same level. When you kill any kind of bird hereafter you will kill it by permission of the Secretary of Agriculture or some subordinate official, and the regulations will be enforced by a petty game warden whom you had no part in selecting, who may come from some distant community to tell you how to run your little local affairs. That is the purpose of the bill; it is what the bill does. If the Secretary of Agriculture does not want you to do so, you will never kill another duck or any bird protected by this bill, whether it is a game bird or not. Therefore it seems to me that we ought not to adopt the bill. It is too far-reaching. We now have many Federal officials bothering with our local affairs. And yet these men are now dealing with important matters; they are not engaged in searching barns and kitchens for a few bird feathers, to find out whether we have broken the game laws.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I merely ask for information, because the gentleman is on the committee; but, prompted by the statement he has made—if the Secretary of Agriculture saw fit to do so he could prevent anybody from killing a game bird—could the Secretary of Agriculture by regulation annul or make void the provisions of the treaty?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; not annul it or make it void; but the bill provides that it shall be unlawful to take any bird or have in possession any portion of a bird except in accordance with regulations adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture. If he adopts such regulations, you can not kill a bird or have any part of a bird in your possession. That is all there is to that. The treaty provides that "the high contracting parties agree that as an effective means of preserving migratory birds there shall be established the following close seasons, during which no hunting shall be done except for scientific or propagating purposes under permits issued by proper authorities." Then it goes on to provide what close seasons are, but the treaty does not provide that there shall be any "open season." The treaty does not provide that there shall be any time when the killing shall be lawful. The treaty is ineffective without legislation to back it up. There can be no close season without the legislation to put the treaty into effect. The treaty provides for no open season, and therefore the Secretary of Agriculture can make a close season all the year round, and no doubt he will do it as far as some birds are concerned.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. In regard to the gentleman's argument concerning the constitutionality of the bill, if the treaty is silent as to the close season then would an order of the Secretary of Agriculture making all the year a close season be constitutional?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I take it that such a regulation would be no more unconstitutional than the rest of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Texas covers the thought I had in mind, that if we admit the validity of the gentleman's argument, that only by force of treaty can we give validity to the act under the Constitution, then could we by regulation go beyond that time which is expressly fixed in the treaty as to closed seasons?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The treaty does not provide that there shall be any open season. The general purpose of the treaty is the protection of these birds, and I take it that it would be entirely legitimate for the Secretary of Agriculture to provide for a close season longer than that provided in the treaty.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Not if it rests on the treaty.

Mr. FLOOD. No; not at all.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I did not yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLOOD. I ask the gentleman to yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am yielding to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The thought I had in mind is that the treaty provides for a close season during which the migratory game birds shall be protected between March 10 and September 1, except the close season of certain islands, and so on. Now, then, if the validity of this legislation in so far as it affects game birds rests on the treaty, then the legislation could not go further than the treaty itself.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Not further than the treaty, but further than this provision of the treaty. The general purpose of the treaty is to protect migratory birds, and if further provision is necessary the Secretary of Agriculture would not be confined to this one paragraph of the treaty. The treaty is broad in scope, and many things are included in it. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, there are some features of this bill to which I think exceptions can properly be taken. While of course the House has no prerogative to object to the Senate of the United States ratifying treaties that may be entered into upon any subject, I think there are grave doubts as to the wisdom of seeking to control the birds of the air by entering into a treaty with a foreign power. The law will be the regulation promulgated by the Department of Agriculture. It will not be this act necessarily. We have under the migratory-bird law the regulations that the department issued dividing up the country into zones and saying within what times birds may be killed. I simply want to direct the attention of the committee to the situation that existed in certain sections of New England in the past winter, which, as you know, was particularly severe. Along the seacoast the bays and the sounds were frozen solidly with ice. The birds could not come in close to the shore to feed. The inhabitants could not shoot those birds, and yet those birds were seeking to find a feeding ground and would be found dead of starvation or cold upon the ice along the shores. At the same time one island within the district which I attempt to represent, the island of Nantucket, was frozen up and there was no communication with the mainland and no supply of meat could be procured. These birds were dropping from cold or starvation around the shores, and yet the inhabitants were not permitted to shoot them for their own consumption. In our section of the country it has come to be looked upon as one of the cardinal rights of the inhabitants to take fish and fowl along the shore for their own tables.

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, if these birds were starving to death they would be rather poor eating.

Mr. WALSH. They were starving to death and dead of cold, but there were plenty of birds that might have been shot by going out on the ice or along the shore that would not be in that condition. They come to feed on the shellfish along the shore, and even though they may have been dying of cold or starvation sea fowl with a little flesh upon their bones could have been used for the various dishes that the inhabitants of that section know so well how to prepare, and they would not have been deprived of this food. As I was about to say, in the New England section the inhabitants have until recent years, comparatively recent years, been accustomed to being permitted to shoot and fish in order to provide food for themselves, but you can not get the department down here to let down on their regulations for that purpose.

As the gentleman from Minnesota so well said earlier in the day, they have this matter on a scientific basis. We all desire to see bird life conserved and the fisheries conserved, but they ought to inject a little commen sense and reason into some of the regulations. A different situation exists in the Western States, because these birds are only available for shooting as they are passing back and forth, while along the New England coast the birds nest off the shore, and miles and miles offshore you will see great flocks of them in the water, hundreds of thousands; but when a cold winter occurs, during a portion of the close season, these people who are in need of food are not permitted under the regulations to kill them. I would not favor letting down the regulations to people who are not residents of the towns or the counties, to permit them to come in and shoot these birds; neither am I in favor of removing all restrictions, because Massachusetts and most New England States have enacted protective laws to conserve fowl and fish. I would confine it, and I think the department could formulate regulations which would permit the inhabitants of the towns to shoot for their own use a certain number of birds every week.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman know what kind of birds they were?

Mr. WALSH. Some of them were ducks and some of them they called coots.

Mr. PLATT. When everything was frozen up? What time of year was it?

Mr. WALSH. February.

Mr. PLATT. Ducks in January or February?

Mr. WALSH. I would not say that they were black ducks, but they were called ducks. I know I have several letters, and they refer to them as ducks—shelldrakes and coots and various other birds—but they called them by the common name of duck or edible wild fowl.

Mr. PLATT. But they were not all ducks.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, I imagine that they were not under the scientific Latin definition given in the treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt in my own mind that this bill is as invalid, from a constitutional standpoint, as was the Weeks-McLean migratory-bird law. The courts of our country have uniformly held, as I understand, and in the One hundred and sixty-first United States Report, Chief Justice White held that the matter of the regulation of game was entirely a State matter. That rule has never been departed from, and to-day there is pending in the Supreme Court a case entitled United States against Shauver, in which the question of the constitutionality of that act is involved. It has been delayed and postponed and a reargument has been ordered because, I believe, of the feeling by the law officers of the Government that the act is unconstitutional, and, therefore, no decision has ever been had of that case. We are now called upon to legislate along the same lines that are now under question in the Supreme Court. I differ with those who say that because this is an act to make effective a treaty, that therefore this might be constitutional while the other might not be. If the regulation of game is a State function, it is unconstitutional for the Congress of the United States to take that function away from the States. I would like to ask some lawyer in the House to tell me how the country can effect a treaty with some other country which would be unconstitutional if made into a direct law? In other words, how can we make a treaty and do an unconstitutional thing by it? I do not believe we can. It does not appeal to me as a correct legal proposition.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If the gentleman has a short question; I only have five minutes and I want to go to another matter.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact, and ask him if it is not true, that two and perhaps three district courts of the United States have already decided that this law is unconstitutional?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They have; three of them; three United States district courts have held the act to be unconstitutional and, as I said, the matter is now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, and I believe the law officers of the Government—I mean the Attorney General's department—believe that it is unconstitutional, because the case is not being tried but is being postponed. But that is not the principal objection I have to this law. I want to say to you that I do not believe there is a man in this House who thinks any more of the bird life of the country than I do. I drew the act passed by this House the other day relating to the prohibition of the sale of wild game in this District, which I thought to be a shameful thing, and a bill which I hope will speedily become the law.

But here is the proposition, gentlemen. You are giving to a department of the Government the right to legislate about things, and to do it without notice under a regulation that can be changed overnight, that may be oppressive, and in many instances will be oppressive. Let me illustrate that. Recently there was a new regulation adopted by the Department of Agriculture to this effect: They changed the regulation as to the closing and opening hours of shooting, and made it possible, and it is possible now under that regulation, to begin shooting ducks half an hour before sunrise. You gentlemen who have stood out on the blind know that is simply licensing somebody to slaughter ducks. They rise about sunrise——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Why is that? I do not understand.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It has been changed by regulation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Why is that licensing the slaughter of ducks to say a man can begin shooting half an hour before sunrise?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They are giving you a privilege that is not given by the law of the gentleman's own State and my State, and perhaps any other State of the Union. You are giving a license to go to where the ducks roost and spend the night, and shoot them before they get up.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not believe the gentleman has ever hunted ducks in his life.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have killed thousands.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman every State in the Union, as far as I know——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I can not yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That permission is not given in contravention of the State law?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is given in contravention of the State law. I can not yield further. In my own State of Illinois we have a sunrise and sunset law, as in most of the States. The regulation of the United States Government now provides that you can shoot them half an hour before sunrise. They passed that regulation without any consideration by the people of the country. There is no publication required of it. Who is there in this Government who knows about these regulations except those who made them? I dare say when I said this there were hardly half a dozen men in this House who knew there was such a regulation as I have quoted, and yet it is to-day one of those regulations the violation of which inflicts a penalty of $500 upon the person so violating it, and which may result in imprisonment in jail. I submit, gentlemen of the House, there ought to be a law of some kind passed prohibiting spring shooting. There ought to be a law prohibiting the shooting of birds going to their nests. There ought to be written into the law the length of the season, when it opens and when it closes, and it ought not to be left to some department to determine this without notice to the people. That is the principal thing I object to in this act. If these gentlemen will go back and draft an act and provide in it an open and closed season, and bring it in here, there will probably not be a voice raised, I dare say, in this House against it; but the trouble is that regulations can be made subject to changes without notice to the people of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am glad to have the privilege of considering one bill that is not claimed to be a war measure. I think it is generally conceded here that this is not a war measure. If it has anything to do with this war, it must be with the aviation. I believe that this kind of legislation is indefensible. There is a lot of sentiment about it. You will hear of the song of the bird, and a whole lot about the boy coming home from school hearing the whistle of the song birds, but, after all, we are bringing up a very dangerous precedent and bringing a great hardship to a certain class of people. I am like one gentleman who has preceded me. I think there is something behind this bill more than the soft-hearted fellow who loves the song of the bird, more than the fellow who wants to speak from a full heart about the love of nature. The fellow who has the money and can get on a train and go down to a duck-shooting resort is the fellow who wants this bill passed, and he is the fellow who is fighting for it, and if it passes he is the fellow who will go to the Secretary of Agriculture for a rule to be adopted favoring the resort, and the fellow down in Indiana who has no lake, but who has a river running down through his county, and who has a muzzle-loading shotgun and wants to go and kill a couple of ducks for his table, will not get to see the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture will say, "Why, in Indiana when these ducks fly over this poor fellow he must not shoot."

As a result, we will not get to kill them as they come or as they go. At present in Indiana the State law generously gives our fellows the right to kill ducks as they fly down South in the fall. There are no lakes there. The way we kill ducks in my part of Indiana is by going in a boat down the river when it is swollen in the spring of the year, and drift under the willows, and when the ducks come out of the willows we get a pair occasionally. In the fall, when the river is low, they can see you 4 miles away. So far as the goose is concerned, she does not need any law to protect her. She does not need any law to protect her any more than the bears of the Rocky Mountains need protection. They protect themselves. An insectiverous bird is not related to ducks and geese, and ought not to be confused with the provisions of this bill.

Why, the ducks down our way in the fall of the year go into the cornfields and eat the corn and wallow it down, and after they have been in the cornfield you would think that hogs had been in there. And you now hear much about his being an insectiverous bird. He devours our crops, saves his body, and goes down South for somebody that has permission to shoot 50 ducks a day in some of the duck-shooting resorts. In Florida they say you can kill 300 a year. I can go down there and spend three days and kill 300 ducks. I could not kill 300 ducks in Indiana if I hunted several entire seasons.

Mr. FLOOD. Will not this prevent that very thing?

Mr. BLAND. I do not think so. Because a man that has the ear of the Secretary of Agriculture is a man that is interested in saving these ducks as they cross the continent, because he has a resort in which to kill them, and the boys with double-barreled guns out in my State will not be there to talk with him. You will find men taking themselves to the Southland from the North in November, December, and January, and getting their dozens and dozens of ducks, while our boys are not permitted to kill one as it goes through Indiana. And somebody was unkind enough to say that that boy was a game hog or a pot shooter. How are you going to pot shoot ducks on an Indiana river any more than when they are in the bayous and swamps of their winter homes?

I am opposed to this bill because it is unfair. It is proposed to give one section of this country the right to kill ducks and geese and not give the same right to other people who should have the same God-given privilege. I say that it is sectionalism. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] opposes this bill. I am surprised that he does so. Down in his State, if I remember it correctly, he can kill 25 ducks a day from November 1 to January 31, and that is the open season down there. That is when the ducks are down there.

But they are not up our way, then; they are down in the South, and you can just go out and pot shoot them if you want to. And that is why a good many of the fellows are for this bill, namely, because they want to go down there where they will be sure to find them. I am not charging that the southern fellow wants this law worse than the northern duck-hunting sport. They ordinarily both want it. I want our boys over in Indiana to get one little shot at these birds as they go past. They are not very plentiful, and we do not get many of them. As to this pot-shooting story in Indiana, forget about it, because it does not happen.

Now, gentlemen, I have a table prepared here, and I wish to insert it in the RECORD, and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks:

Open season for ducks.

Alabama	Nov. 1 to Jan. 31
Arizona	Oct. 16 to Jan. 31
Arkansas	Nov. 1 to Jan. 31
California	Oct. 16 to Jan. 31
Florida	Nov. 20 to Jan. 31
Georgia	Nov. 1 to Jan. 31
Louisiana	Nov. 1 to Jan. 31
Mississippi	Nov. 1 to Jan. 31
New Mexico	Oct. 16 to Jan. 31
North Carolina	Nov. 1 to Jan. 31
South Carolina	Nov. 1 to Jan. 31
Texas	Nov. 1 to Jan. 31

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAND. I have prepared a table here of the States where these ducks winter. I realize that some of them go on to Central and South America. A great many of them stay down there all winter, and you will find them there during the entire winter, depending, of course, on the harshness of the winter and the kind of bird.

Do not confuse the arguments and sentiments about the insect bird and the song bird with the goose and the duck. They go down there and stay all winter in some of those States. And they have an open season there. The gentlemen managing this bill say that this law is for the purpose of keeping people from killing them. What are you going to do with them if you do not kill them and let them be eaten? What do you want to save them for if you do not use them for food in time of war? They do not eat insects. You can not hand me that. It is the hunter from the North who goes South who wants this law passed. And I am glad to say that my predecessors in Congress fought this kind of bill. I know you will pass it, but you will not put it over the people of southern Indiana without having a protest from their Representatives. Our people have the natural right to go out and kill those ducks when they come through, and you have no right to stop them. When you attempt to do it, you are contravening their constitutional rights. I know that you will say that the courts have held to the contrary, and that they will do it again, but I know that some of the courts have held that this kind of legislation is unconstitutional.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I know the gentleman is in earnest about this. I wish to say to the gentleman that the reports that came to us from the investigation we made during the consideration of this bill all agreed that the greatest amount of pot shooting in the country came from the district the gentleman is trying to defend.

Mr. BLAND. I am not responsible for the gentleman's misinformation, but that is not the fact.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I thought I would give the gentleman an opportunity to clear up the charge.

Mr. BLAND. There is nothing to clear up. Let us for a moment consider the idea of pot shooting in Indiana. You go down to Florida, where the ducks winter, and they absolutely darken the sky, and you can go out and shoot until your gun gets so hot that you can not hold it. But go down the Indiana rivers in the fall or spring, and you may see 12 in a flock. You will not get your gun hot there. How are you going to do any pot shooting there? The gentleman has been misinformed. The pot shooting comes in those sections where they have the right to kill 300 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. And I yield to the gentleman two minutes, the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I have spoken on this subject of birds several times before and feel a diffidence about going over exactly the same ground, and I will endeavor not to do so. It seems to me that some of the gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to this bill have proven themselves ornithologists in the sense that they have been able to discover a great number of mare's-nests in the bill. Now, of course, it is utter nonsense to talk about the little boy going to school with birds' eggs in his hands to show the scholars. He would come under the provision of the bill in regard to providing eggs for scientific purposes. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] tells about the flocks of ducks off the coast of Massachusetts last January, when everything was frozen up tight and they were nearly starved to death for lack of food. I am not familiar with all the various species of ducks, but I venture to say that there was not a real duck within 500 miles of the coast of Massachusetts at that time. On the other hand, I think they must have been scoters or some species of sea bird from the far north. The ducks at that time were on the lower Chesapeake and farther South. They had not come North yet. They do not come North until the water opens up and the food that they are accustomed to is provided.

Gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to this measure are evidently entirely unfamiliar with birds and do not realize the fact that if Canada wanted to she could destroy practically all the ducks and geese. She has not done so. We have asked Canada for a treaty in order that we may be sure that Canada will protect the ducks in their breeding grounds, which is the most important place in which to protect them. They are more easily killed in their breeding grounds than anywhere else. Canada has agreed to the treaty, has passed an enabling act to put the treaty into effect, and has formulated regulations which are now in effect, in full confidence that we will do the same.

It is futile to claim that birds flying over a specified territory or resting for a day or two are anybody's property. They belong, if anywhere, to the places where the nests are. Nearly all the States already have enacted State laws which conform practically to the terms of this treaty, and already the beneficial results of these laws in increasing game has been recognized, so that there is no reason why there should be any trouble about it.

Besides the game birds—and I am interested personally more in song birds and insectivorous birds—there are a great many birds which nest in Canada and stop only temporarily in this country and go on down through to South America. Some go very far south. Indeed there is one, the Arctic tern, that makes a migration of 11,000 miles, from the Arctic to the Antarctic Ocean. There is another bird, the golden plover, that nests in the far north, and on its southward migration flies from Nova Scotia to the northern shores of South America direct, making a flight of 2,400 miles without a stop. Some of those birds also fly from Alaska to the Hawaiian Islands, a distance of 2,000 miles, with no place possible where they can stop. The golden plover that go down the east coast are sometimes driven onto the shores of the Atlantic in storms, and a few can take refuge in Bermuda, but those that fly from Alaska south must go to the Hawaiian Islands without a stop. I saw a few of them in the Hawaiian Islands myself last winter.

I commend this little department pamphlet on bird migration by Prof. Cook. It is very interesting. It contains maps showing the routes of many of the birds. There is a corps of voluntary reporters connected with the department who record and report the dates of arrival of the birds in all parts of the United States and Canada. These dates are plotted and mapped by the Biological Survey, showing just when the birds arrive at certain places. It is from that information, obtained by the Biological Survey, that they are able to define the zones so as to make the right regulations to apply to each section of the country. If we should undertake to enact a law here fixing the open season, we would have to fix it somewhat differently for the different States, and that would be subject to tremendous criticism. It is much better to have it done by regulation, based on hearings and the information in the possession of the survey. I hope the bill will be passed without amendment as it comes to us from the Committee on Foreign Relations. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. FLOOD. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That unless and except as permitted by regulations made as hereinafter provided, it shall be unlawful to hunt, take, capture, kill, attempt to take, capture, or kill, possess, offer for sale, sell, offer to purchase, purchase, deliver for shipment, ship, cause to be shipped, deliver for transportation, transport, cause to be transported, carry, or cause to be carried by any means whatever, receive for shipment, transportation or carriage, or export, at any time or in any manner, any migratory bird, included in the terms of the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded August 16, 1916, or any part, nest, or egg of any such bird.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I fear that in some particulars the discussion has gone astray. Some gentlemen have been speaking as if it were a question as to whether this treaty should go into effect. The treaty has already gone into effect and is even now a part of the law of the land. I hardly need cite Article VI of the Constitution, which says that—

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

This treaty is in force. It went into force, according to the terms of the treaty, on the day that ratifications were exchanged. I see one gentleman shaking his head. It may be necessary for me to read a sentence from Article IX of the treaty:

The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible, and the convention shall take effect on the date of the exchange of the ratifications.

The ratifications have been exchanged. The treaty is in effect and is binding on the judges in every State of the Union, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. That being the case, how much legislation is necessary in order that the provisions of the treaty may be actually enforced? That is a question that has been discussed from time to time in both Houses of Congress.

As long ago as 1816 the question came up as to what legislation might be necessary in certain cases to put into actual operation treaties which legally were already in effect. Of course, if any treaty requires the appropriation of money, the act appropriating money must pass both Houses. There are certain other treaty provisions that may require action by both Houses. But if it were true that all provisions of every treaty require action by both Houses, then the House as well as the Senate would be a part of the treaty-making power. But the House is not a part of the treaty-making power. Treaties become the supreme law of the land when they are negotiated by the Executive and ratified by the Senate. It is true, as I have already said, that when appropriations are required by a treaty, and in certain other cases as well, it is necessary for the House to pass an act appropriating money or an act providing whatever legislative aid may be required for the fulfilment of the treaty obligation. That question was discussed in connection with the treaty between the United States and Great Britain which had been signed on the 5th of July, 1815. There was a dispute between the two Houses, and the disagreeing votes went to conference. The House conferees made a report, a part of which I wish to read. Let me say in parentheses that in those days the reports of the conferees to the two Houses were not necessarily identical. I shall read a portion of the report of the House conferees, made on February 19, 1816. In discussing the question as to whether legislation by Congress was necessary to make the treaty effective the committee reported as follows:

In the performance of this duty the committee of the House of Representatives are inclined to hope that it will sufficiently appear that there is no irreconcilable difference between the two branches of the Legislature.

They are persuaded that the House of Representativs does not assert the pretention that no treaty can be made without their assent, nor do they contend that in all cases legislative aid is indispensably necessary, either to give validity to a treaty or to carry it into execution. On the contrary, they are believed to admit that to some, nay, many, treaties no legislative sanction is required, no legislative aid is necessary.

On the other hand, the committee are not less satisfied that it is by no means the intention of the Senate to assert the treaty-making power to be in all cases independent of the legislative authority. So far from it that they are believed to acknowledge the necessity of legislative enactment to carry into execution all treaties which contain stipulations requiring appropriations or which might bind the Nation to lay taxes, to raise armies, to support navies, to grant subsidies, to create States, or to cede territory, if, indeed, this power exists in the Government at all. In some or all of these cases, and probably in many others, it is conceived to be admitted that the legislative body must act in order to give effect and operation to a treaty; and if in any case it be necessary, it may confidently be asserted that there is no difference of principle between the two Houses; the difference is only in the application of the principle. For if, as has been stated, the House of Representatives contend that their aid is only in some cases necessary, and if the Senate admit that in some cases it is necessary, the inference is irresistible that the only question in each case that presents itself is whether it be one of the cases in which legislative provision is requisite for preserving the national faith or not.

The treaty for the protection of migratory birds does undoubtedly require legislative provision to preserve the national faith. The treaty has gone into effect and is a part of the supreme law of the land, but there is as yet no penalty for the violation of this law and Congress has not as yet empowered the proper authorities to issue the regulations provided for in Article VII of the treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TEMPLE. I shall drop that point at once and proceed to another. The question has been raised as to whether the bill now under discussion, or even the treaty itself, is constitutional. I should like to read a single sentence from Charles Henry Butler's great work on the treaty-making power of the United States. Mr. Butler says:

The power to legislate in regard to all matters affected by treaty stipulations and relations is coextensive with the treaty-making power, and acts of Congress enforcing such stipulations, which in the absence of treaty regulations would be unconstitutional as infringing upon the powers reserved to the States, are constitutional and can be enforced, even though they may conflict with State laws and provisions of State constitutions.

If the power to legislate in regard to all matters affected by treaty stipulations is, as Mr. Butler says, coextensive with the treaty-making power, then a law to make the treaty operative can not be unconstitutional unless the treaty itself is unconstitutional. There are doubtless limits to the treaty-making power, but no case has yet arisen in which a treaty has been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

It has been said that the police power is a right reserved by the States and has not been delegated to the General Government; that in its lawful exercise the States are absolutely sovereign, and that such exercise can not be disturbed by any treaty stipulations. It is argued that as the laws for the protection of game birds are such an exercise of the police power, the enactment of such laws by the National Government would be unconstitutional, and even treaty stipulations could not bring them within the jurisdiction of Congress.

On the contrary, the Supreme Court has held that the United States, in the exercise of its treaty-making power, may in certain circumstances enforce laws prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in territory which, but for the treaty, would be in this matter subject only to the police power of a State.

I refer to the case of the United States against Forty-three Gallons of Whisky, reported in Ninety-third United States, 188.

The whisky had been seized in Crookston, Polk County, Minn., under the act of Congress, 1864, which prohibited the possession of spirituous liquors in Indian country. The place where the liquor was seized was not Indian country, and had not been Indian country in 1864, when the act was passed. It was situated in the district which had been ceded to the United States in the treaty of October 3, 1863, between the United States and the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians. Article 7 of the treaty is as follows:

The laws of the United States now in force, or that may hereafter be enacted, prohibiting the introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the Indian country, shall be in full force and effect throughout the country hereby ceded until otherwise directed by Congress or the President of the United States.

The district court of the United States declined jurisdiction, and the question of jurisdiction was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States.

It was contended that the treaty which made the law applicable to this territory was invalid so far as it attempted to extend to an organized county of Minnesota certain United States laws applicable only to Indian country. This contention was based on the ground that a treaty which provides regulations which the Federal Government can not constitutionally impose is to that extent without validity or binding force.

The Supreme Court decided otherwise and held that it is competent for the United States, in the exercise of its treaty-making power, to stipulate in a treaty with an Indian tribe that within the territory ceded by the treaty laws of the United State prohibiting the introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the Indian country shall be in full force and effect in spite of the fact that the said territory has ceased to be Indian country and has become a part of an organized county of a State.

This applies not only to laws in force at the time the treaty was signed but also to laws that might afterwards be enacted. They, too, would be in full force and effect within the limits of the district covered by the treaty, though in that district, but for the treaty, the laws of the United States for the control of Indian country would not be operative.

The case that was referred to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S., p. 258), is also in point, as showing the wide scope of the treaty-making power. The court said:

The treaty-making power extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our Government and that of other nations. It, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited, except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or all of its departments and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and that of the States.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to propound an inquiry right there.

Mr. TEMPLE. I will yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Suppose Canada and the United States, through the proper officers, made a treaty providing that no person should vote at any municipal State or county election unless he had $10,000.

Mr. TEMPLE. If the gentleman will permit me to read the remainder of the paragraph——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Suppose such a treaty was negotiated, would it be good?

Mr. TEMPLE. I will read the remainder of the paragraph:

It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent. But, with these exceptions, it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In other words, it must be a proper and legitimate matter of negotiation between the Governments?

Mr. TEMPLE. Certainly. It seems to me that this is a proper and legitimate matter of negotiation between the Governments. The birds dealt with are of three classes—migratory game birds, migratory insectivorous birds, and migratory nongame birds. These nest in one place and live a part of the year in another place. They cross the international boundary line, and if they are to be protected at all it requires international action to do it. It seems to me that this is a very fit subject for negotiation between the two Governments whose boundary these birds cross, and we need not be afraid that legislation needed to make the treaty fully operative will be unconstitutional.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill, known as the migratory-bird bill. I voted for the bill passed in the Sixty-second Congress, and I may say that that bill was largely enforced in the State of Maryland and the people have been loyal and never raised the question of constitutionality of the act.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; I can not yield. The ducks in the State of Maryland have increased largely from the enforcement of the Federal law. In my State we had until the 1st of this month game laws for every county in the State, and only until the last legislature convened were we able to procure a State-wide game law. The difficulty in enforcing State-wide game laws and county game laws is that it is almost impossible to carry out their provisions on account of the friendships that exist between the local authorities and the people who break the laws. They are hard to enforce on account of the political considerations that exist between the people in the county or the State and those in authority practically preventing the carrying out of the local game laws or at least nullifying its provisions. We all know that it is practically impossible to have your own friends arrested for violation of the game law. It is almost impossible to get the witness to so testify as will enable the judge to render a verdict against the accused. It is very difficult for us to carry out such local State and game laws. With a law of this kind, where the Federal Government has a hand in the control of it, everybody has a high regard and a deep consideration of the law and everybody has a fear of violating it. I feel satisfied that with this law, if enacted, we will have no difficulty in carrying it out and that the protection granted will largely increase the game throughout the whole country.

We have on the Potomac this state of affairs. The boundary of the State of Maryland goes to the south shore of the Potomac River. In 1816 very able and distinguished Virginians got the Maryland authorities to agree that the fishing rights should be equal in the river to inhabitants of both States, and from 1816 until two years ago it was absolutely impossible to get Virginia and Maryland to concur in adequate legislation to protect the oyster and fish industry of the Potomac River. Here are two States, the most friendly that they could possibly be, and yet it took over 100 years to get together to protect the oyster industry, and when they did get together the oyster industry had practically expired and was no more.

In my State we have endeavored to protect the fish. The eastern shore of my State and a part of the western shore controls the State, certainly controls the politics of the State, and it is absolutely impossible to get proper protection for fish and oysters in the Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries.

Take shad, the shad is one of the very best fish which we have and certainly the best fish on the Atlantic seaboard, and yet we can not protect the shad. To-day the shad is almost extinct in the upper waters of my State. They once visited the upper sections of the bay and way up into the Susquehanna River to spawn, and the Government had fish hatcheries there. The fish have been taken in such large quantities by the Virginia fishermen at the mouth of the bay that they do not reach the Susquehanna any more. A shad to get into the Susquehanna for spawning purposes would have to have a very accurate compass to get past the nets in the lower Potomac River. The shad is therefore rapidly decreasing and its abundance and cheapness are things of memory only.

The main trouble is due to the great number of large nets that, by the grace of the War Department, are permitted to be stretched at many points, and in which each year shad and other fish are caught by the hundreds of thousands, the result being that each year the number reaching the spawning grounds becomes less and less. Of course, if this is allowed to go on indefinitely the time will come when there will be no shad at all in the Potomac, Susquehanna, Delaware, and other rivers that formerly yielded such great supplies.

Several years ago the Secretary of War had practically made up his mind to have the nets pretty well cleaned out of the Virginia waters. That is where the worst trouble is. But the late Representative WILLIAM A. JONES, of the first Virginia district, yielding to the pleadings of the fishermen, managed to bring sufficient influence to bear to have the order held up. He had a great number of constituents interested in the business. So long as they could make money hauling in shad and selling the roe at fancy figures to canneries up North those thrifty Virginia fishermen did not consider it worth their while to worry, even if what they were doing meant eventually that the people of Baltimore and other cities and towns would not be able to buy shad in the markets.

There used to be an almost unlimited supply of fresh herring during the spring season in the markets of Baltimore and other cities in this section of the country. Not so these days. The charge is freely made that the men who are operating the big nets have been catching herring in untold numbers, the roe is extracted and canned, the oil is pressed out of the fish, and the rest is used for fertilizer. Fifteen or sixteen years ago fresh roe herring—large, fat, and plump ones—could be bought for 25 or 30 cents a dozen. In recent years practically no roe herring are offered for sale. The few that are to be had are the small melts, for which outrageous prices are demanded.

Several months ago the Food Administration urged people to eat more fish in order to save meats for the soldiers who are to fight the Germans in Europe. The Food Administrator received so many complaints from consumers about how the fish dealers had boosted prices that he and his assistants decided to make an investigation. He discovered that the retail dealers were reaping profits of from 400 to 800 per cent over what they paid for certain kinds of fish at wholesale.

It has been estimated that a billion dollars is a low estimate of the loss to this country by virtue of the rapid extermination of bird life. We note on every hand large increases of insect life, which is rapidly destroying many trees of the forest, rendering crops less easy to raise, and doing the farmer an immense injury in both labor and loss of production. The bird life of the country was for years one of its greatest assets, and had we protected it as we should have done it would not be so greatly depleted, and, without legislation, soon to become a thing of the past.

We have enacted legislation for the protection of our forests, the conservation of our coal supply, and the preservation of many of the great resources of the country. Certainly it is high time for bird protection, not only as an enjoyment to all the people but a benefit which can not be derived in any other possible manner.

So I say the only possible way by which we can protect game life, by which we can increase the game of the country and protect the song and insectivorous birds, is by a national law. We will never do it in any other way. We have tried it in every other way and have absolutely failed on all occasions. For that reason I am particularly anxious that this bill should pass and that we should take part in protecting the bird interests of the country, and I hope that before long Congress will find some way of protecting likewise the fishing interests of this country as well. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I agree with those who have said that the constitutional powers conferred upon the President and the Senate in the negotiation of treaties would reach to any question such as here is to be considered. I agree entirely with the proposition that in so far as it is proper to carry out the terms of a treaty all the necessary powers are given to Congress to carry them out. I agree entirely with the statement that it is necessary for the House of Representatives in instances such as this to join in legislation that shall carry into effect the terms of the treaty. However, I differ from the gentlemen who say that because now we have made a treaty that therefore Congress can pass any law that they may deem necessary for the purpose of carrying out any of the provisions regarding the migration of birds, for instance, as in this bill.

The Supreme Court of the United States has clearly indicated the limit of the action of Congress with regard to the enforcement of treaties. It extends to all of those things that do not raise a constitutional question, that do not affect the rights of the Federal Government or the rights of the States. This rule was expressly laid down in the decision that was quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE]. It does not extend to those questions affecting the relations of the States to the General Government. It can not take from the States the powers that are theirs under the Constitution. That being true, then we have not removed and will not remove by the passage of this act the constitutional difficulty, because the constitutional difficulty regarding the present law, and which will remain in this law if it is passed, is the question as to whether the General Government has any right to legislate whatever regarding migratory birds or fishes. The power to legislate concerning game has been from the first exercised by the States and has been confirmed by the courts down to the present day. This bill if passed will take that power away from the States and confer it upon an official of the General Government. Therefore if we commit to the General Government a question that belongs to the jurisdiction of the States, it is an interference with the constitutional rights of the States. We are, therefore, not going to get rid of this constitutional question by this legislation. It will still remain. I do not know what the Supreme Court of the United States will say eventually regarding this proposition, but it is not removed, by any means. It remains, and if the Supreme Court shall follow out the almost unbroken line of authorities, that the control of the wild game, of the birds, and the fishes lies with the States, then this law will be declared unconstitutional, just the same as the United States courts up to the present time have declared the present law unconstitutional.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it the gentleman's opinion that a treaty could not confer upon Congress the right to legislate on a subject affecting the police powers as heretofore have been exercised and possessed by the States?

Mr. TOWNER. I can not answer that question, because it is too general, but this is what I do say—that it can not interfere with the powers belonging under the Constitution to the States.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think that is involved, if the gentleman will permit. I would like to get the gentleman's viewpoint, because this is a very close question, in my judgment. I am wondering if, by treaty, we can not confer upon Congress the right to legislate upon a subject that is within the power of a State; for instance, this is not a question of taking away from the State a right guaranteed to it by the Constitution as against the Federal Government. There is nothing in the Constitution that speaks about the control of game or the police powers, and by reason of the fact that the Constitution does not give to Congress general police powers, the States have assumed them, and the Supreme Court has sustained the States in that. Is it not possible to give to the Federal Government the right to control those powers?

Mr. TOWNER. I will say this to the gentleman, that it might be proper if legislation that would not interfere with the constitutional rights of the Government or the States were enacted, but I do not think a treaty could give the power to Congress to legislate in a case where the effect of the legislation would be to deprive the States of their constitutional powers.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I care little about this long legal discussion as to the effect of the treaty and at this time what the Supreme Court has done and what the Supreme Court may do, because it seems to me a clear waste of time. This bill should be passed after being properly amended. Section 5 must be properly amended and other slight changes made. I can imagine 40 years ago or 60 years ago the same kind of arguments were made in regard to the protection of the wild game of the West. The buffalo, that was valuable to this country and would be valuable to-day, has been destroyed. The antelope that traversed those plains and mountains of the West by the thousands and tens of thousands, and which could have been sustained there to-day, were ruthlessly destroyed, just like the wild birds are being destroyed to-day, and I suppose the same discussion as to the matter of constitutionality was indulged in by Members of Congress, making fine-spun distinction as to whether or not this would apply there or that would apply to some other case.

But the game is being destroyed just the same; there is no distinction. The same way here to-day. We will waste our time, we will discuss legal features of it, and we all know that the wild game of this country has been and is being destroyed ruthlessly, recklessly, and criminally, and something ought to be done.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield at the present time, if the gentleman will excuse me. One condition is presented by this statement:

Not very many years ago vast numbers of waterfowl and shore birds nested within the limits of the United States, especially in the far West, but the extension of agriculture, and particularly the draining on a large scale of swamps and meadows, together with improved firearms and a vast increase in the number of sportsmen, have so altered conditions that comparatively few migratory game birds nest within our limits. The greater part of the supply still remaining, the value of which must be estimated at many millions of dollars, breed largely in the Canadian Provinces and consist of birds that winter within or to the south of the United States and journey back and forth in autumn and spring across our territory.

That a very great number of people in the United States are personally interested in the protection of our migratory wild birds is evidenced by the fact that there are about 5,000,000 sportsmen in this country, and their number is steadily increasing. These men are all dependent upon the continuance of our supply of wild fowl for their sport, and a very large number of them are in consequence taking an active interest in the present treaty. In addition, the value of the proper protection of our migratory insectivorous birds is of the deepest interest to farmers for the practical assistance they give in destroying insects injurious to crops. Furthermore, millions of people in the United States are deeply interested in the conservation and increase of our bird life from an esthetic viewpoint, as well as on account of their practical utility. As a result the number of persons who approve and are deeply interested in the conclusion and enforcement of the present treaty includes many millions. There is no question but that the Federal migratory-bird law and the present treaty for the protection of migratory wild fowl now being negotiated between the United States and Canada are conservation measures of prime importance.

Those who have traveled over the Western States can realize the actual facts in reference to this condition. The swamps that used to extend miles and miles up and down our rivers as the game birds came in the spring and returned in the fall are dried up now. The improvement of guns have been such that they can be reached in all places, and they are slaughtered promiscuously, many of them for the market and shipped away, but many are destroyed just simply for the fun of shooting. The argument is made that this bill is for the sportsman and against the barefoot boy in the country with his old muzzle-loading shotgun. Let me tell you that the boy of this country does not use any muzzle-loading gun. He has the best up-to-date repeating shotgun that the market can afford [applause], and the boy of 10 to 15 years of age can kill more game than the best sportsman—he will beat him 9 times out of 10. So if this is against the boy, there is not anything in it. So the question is whether you are going to protect the wild life of this country, whether you are going to permit these birds to be protected so that they may assist in that way in the protection of the crops, as well as to keep the supply of game birds on hand that the various people throughout the country may have some use of them. There are plenty of places yet, there are plenty of reservations being maintained by the Government, and there are places where they can be provided for:

The treaty is valid. It was negotiated and concluded by the authorities having undisputed power to do so. It has been ratified by both Governments.

The bill as reported has all essential requisites to enforce the treaty.

Its passage is demanded by a sense of patriotic duty to our entire country. By preventing the indiscriminate slaughter of birds which destroy insects which feed upon our crops and damage them to the extent of many millions of dollars, it will thus contribute immensely to enlarging and making more secure the crops so necessary to the support and maintenance of the brave men sent to the battle field by this Republic, to preserve the honor of its flag, and to protect the lives of its citizens wherever engaged in lawful pursuits.

This bill, or one like unto it in all essential features, is demanded by practically all the farmers in our lands, through their different organizations, State and National.

There are approximately 5,000,000 sportsmen in this country who urge prompt action to protect the migratory birds.

Not alone the utility of this measure appeals to many others than farmers and sportsmen, but thousands upon thousands of people—men, women, and children—who have happy memories of their homes made brighter and more attractive by the annual visitation of the robin, the catbird, and other insectivorous birds embraced within the treaty, earnestly request the passage of the bill.

The sentiment of approval is practically universal.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment—they can have some care and protection and this promiscuous slaughter can be prevented. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BLAND. California has an open season from November 1 to January 23.

Mr. RAKER. It depends upon what kind——

Mr. BLAND (continuing). And ducks are there the entire season.

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. BLAND. Are they not there the entire season——

Mr. RAKER. California protects its ducks, and intends to protect the wild life of the game so that we will get the highest use of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request, that I may revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel like leaving this discussion exactly in the form it was left when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] had concluded. Ever since this matter has been before the Committee on Foreign Affairs the constitutional question has been to me the most important one to consider. I am frank to say I think the matter is not at all free from doubt, but I do think the weight of opinion should be on the side of constitutionality, and certainly the purposes of the bill are eminently to be approved. Now, it seems to me the clear assumption must be that by a treaty we can not confer upon Congress authority to legislate on any subject that is exclusively retained to the States by the Constitution; or, to put it the opposite way, we can not by a treaty take from the State any right that the State affirmatively possesses under the Constitution. Or we can not by a treaty confer upon Congress that which is forbidden to Congress by the Constitution, but we can by a treaty, it seems to me, without doubt confer upon Congress power to legislate on a subject which is of national importance which is not prohibited by the Constitution and which is not given specifically to the States by the Constitution. The subject of migratory birds is not in the Constitution, the subject of police power is not in the Constitution, and neither were contemplated by the framers of the Constitution when the wording of that instrument was formed. As a matter of fact, when a country is new the game and fish question is never the important one. There is plenty for the boy who has a gun and rod and for the man of superior intelligence, opportunity, and skill, but as the community becomes thickly settled the question of game and fish becomes important if they are to be preserved at all, and all society has learned without exception that unless it throws safeguards and protection around fish and game they soon will disappear and cease to bless or aid mankind. Now, the subject of migratory birds and the subject of game and fish heretofore has generally been recognized by the Government as belonging to the State, they taking charge of that field in the exercise of the police power of the State. Here, however, we find a situation that the State can not adequately handle. The migratory bird is one that goes from State to State and nation to nation, and it can be reached only, first, by international cooperation, and, secondly, by national legislation covering all States alike. So it seems to me but fair and reasonable inference of all the constitutional considerations that this is a proper subject of the treaty-making power of this Government, and when it has been taken care of by the treaty it then becomes proper for the Congress of the United States by proper legislation to carry out the provisions of the treaty. The jurisdiction is not one specifically reserved to the States by the Constitution; not one specifically forbidden to the Congress by the Constitution; hence is one of the general powers or jurisdictions possessed by the States, and one therefore that may become the subject of the treaty-making power of the National Government, and when a treaty is made legislation by Congress may follow to carry out the terms of that treaty.

Now, I think if the gentleman from Ohio will read carefully the provisions of this bill he will agree with me that they are designed simply to carry out the provisions of the treaty. It is true, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated, that the treaty is in force, but the treaty as it stands in force is valueless because rules and regulations are necessary in order that the treaty may be effective. Consequently this legislation or something similar to it must be enacted. The query then resolves itself to one of whether or not the legislation here goes beyond that which is in the treaty. It seems to me it does not. It seems to me a fair construction of the terms of this bill is that it simply carries out the terms of the treaty, and the terms of the treaty are such as are legitimately within the treaty-making power of the Government. And I think this legislation is on an entirely different footing from that of the migratory-bird bill that has been the subject of some court construction within recent years. The advisability of this legislation can not for a moment be doubted. Many States of the Union, recognizing the importance of protecting the game and fish, have legislated wisely, while some have not. It is most lamentable that some sections of the country have been dead to common decency in the subject of protecting the game that flies across their country. Some sections seem to think that all the birds that fly in the air and all the fish that swim through streams, going from State to State, belong to the little spot where they happen to be found at that time. They do not at all. They are the common possession of humanity and should be allowed to go as nature intended they should go—through the air and along the streams, to benefit and bless mankind. And they will disappear absolutely unless protected in the way this bill aims to protect them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That subject to the provisions and in order to carry out the purposes of the convention, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed, from time to time, having due regard to the zones of temperature and to the distribution, abundance, economic value, breeding habits, and times and lines of migratory flights of such birds, to determine when, to what extent, if at all, and by what means, it is compatible with the terms of the convention to allow hunting, taking, capture, killing, possession, sale, purchase, shipment, transportation, carriage, or export of any such bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, and to adopt suitable regulations permitting and governing the same, in accordance with such determinations, which regulations shall become effective when approved by the President.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs if he has any information as to whether or not the regulations which were put into effect, and which were promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture under the migratory-bird law which is now in force, will be the same regulations that will be put into effect under this bill? That is, will the same zone, or the same classification, or the same season, be incorporated into these regulations that are now in the existing regulations of the department?

Mr. FLOOD. We did not go into detail about that with the gentleman who appeared before the committee, but the general understanding that I got was that so far as the open and closed season and the zones are concerned the regulations will be the same. This is a more far-reaching measure than the present law, and there will be other regulations that are not in the present regulations.

Mr. WALSH. Did the gentleman get any information as to what other regulations might be incorporated into the regulations of the department?

Mr. FLOOD. Just the regulations——

Mr. WALSH. To conform to the treaty?

Mr. FLOOD. To conform to the treaty and the bill.

Mr. WALSH. As I recall it, under the existing regulations, before any change or modification can be secured, the department down here requires some 60 or 90 days to elapse. Now, does not the gentleman think in case of emergency, of great shortage of food, that the department ought to be empowered to suspend the regulations and to permit the householder to shoot one or two birds a week for his own use?

Mr. FLOOD. That is a regulation merely that provides for notice of 60 or 90 days. It is not a law.

Mr. WALSH. I doubt if under the language of this act the department could make such a regulation unless authority is carried herein.

Mr. FLOOD. You mean could make a regulation to give 60 days' notice of changing a regulation?

Mr. WALSH. No. This act prevents people from killing. Now, could they make a regulation under this act to permit that to be done in times of stress or emergency or food shortage?

Mr. FLOOD. Not within the closed season; not within the time specified as the closed season.

Mr. WALSH. Could not such a provision be written into this act?

Mr. FLOOD. No; it could not, because it is in the treaty—the dates of the closed season are fixed by treaty.

Mr. WALSH. The treaty says, under article 7, that "permits to kill any of the above-named birds which under ordinary conditions," and then it says, "may become seriously injurious to the agricultural or other interests in any particular community, may be issued," and so forth. While they would not be seriously injurious to the agricultural or other interests, the prohibition of killing them might be injurious and detrimental to the human family in lessening the supply of food.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think there could be a change of the closed season on migratory birds, which is fixed in the treaty between March 10 and September 1, except that the season for hunting might be further restricted. I do not think it could be enlarged.

Mr. WALSH. They certainly could shoot the birds during the closed season for scientific purposes.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. That is provided for.

Mr. WALSH. In article 7 it says they can issue permits to kill them under extraordinary conditions which affect the agricultural interests.

Mr. FLOOD. That is provided for in the treaty. But when you come to kill them for food purposes you must restrict it to the time fixed in the treaty.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 21, after the word "determinations," strike out the balance of line 21 and line 22 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Such regulations shall thereupon be submitted to the President, and, if approved by him, shall, within 30 days thereafter, be laid before both Houses of Congress, if the same be then in session, or, if not then in session, within 30 days after the first day of the next session thereof. Such regulations shall thereafter become effective and shall be printed under proper caption in the next succeeding volume of the Statutes at Large."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I mentioned when I was discussing this matter in the general debate, that I thought one of the principal defects of this bill was the fact that sufficient notice was not given to the public at large of these regulations in consideration of the drastic penalties that were provided by the act.

If this act passes—and I presume it will, in spite of any protests to the contrary—there ought to be some safety provision so that there might be adequate publication of the provisions of these regulations from time to time. The provision which I have asked to have inserted as an amendment is copied almost verbatim from a similar act passed in Canada. I have in my hand a certified copy of the Canadian act, which I got from the Department of State, and I submit it herewith, calling special attention to Article IV of the act and the following provision, subsection 3:

[Bill 92, as passed by the House of Commons, 21 July, 1917. 7th sess. 12th Par., 7–8 George V, 1917. The House of Commons of Canada.]

An act respecting a certain convention between His Majesty and the United States of America for the protection of migratory birds in Canada and the United States.

Whereas on the 16th day of August, 1916, a convention was signed at Washington respecting the protection of certain migratory birds in Canada and the United States, and ratifications were exchanged at Washington on the 7th day of December, 1916; and

Whereas it is expedient that the said convention should receive the sanction of the Parliament of Canada and that legislation be passed for insuring the execution of the said convention: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. This act may be cited as "The migratory birds convention act."

2. The said convention of the 16th day of August, 1916, which is set forth in the schedule of this act, is hereby sanctioned, ratified, and confirmed.

3. In this act and in any regulation made thereunder, unless the context otherwise requires (a) "close season" means the period during which any species of migratory game, migratory insectivorous, or migratory nongame bird is protected by this act or any regulation made under this act; (b) "migratory game birds" means Anatidæ, or waterfowl, including brant, wild ducks, geese and swans; Gruidæ, or cranes, including little brown, sandhill, and whooping cranes; Rallidæ, or rails, including coots, gallinules and sora, and other rails; Limicolæ, or shorebirds, including avocets, curlew, dowitchers, godwits, knots, oyster catchers, phalaropes, plovers, sandpipers, snipe, stilts, surf birds, turnstones, willet, woodcock, and yellowlegs; Columbidæ, or pigeons, including doves and wild pigeons; (c) "migratory insectivorous birds" means bobolinks, catbirds, chickadees, cuckoos, flickers, flycatchers, grosbeaks, humming birds, kinglets, martins, meadowlarks, nighthawks or bull bats, nuthatchers, orioles, robins, shrikes, swallows, swifts, tanagers, titmice, thrushes, vireos, warblers, waxwings, whippoorwills, woodpeckers, and wrens, and all other perching birds which feed entirely or chiefly on insects; (d) "migratory nongame birds" means auks, auklets, bitterns, fulmars, gannets, grebes, guillemots, gulls, herons, jaegers, loons, murrers, petrels, puffins, shearwaters, and terns; (e) "minister" means the minister of the interior; (f) "regulation" means any regulation made under the provisions of section 4 of this act.

4. (1) The governor in council may make such regulations as are deemed expedient to protect the migratory game, migratory insectivorous, and migratory nongame birds which inhabit Canada during the whole or any part of the year.

(2) Subject to the provisions of the said convention, such regulations may provide (a) the periods in each year or the number of years during which any such migratory game, migratory insectivorous, or migratory nongame birds shall not be killed, captured, injured, taken, molested, or sold, or their nests or eggs injured, destroyed, taken or molested; (b) for the granting of permits to kill or take migratory game, migratory insectivorous and migratory nongame birds, or their nests or eggs; (c) for the prohibition of the shipment or export of migratory game, migratory insectivorous, or migratory nongame birds or their eggs from any province during the close season in such province, and the conditions upon which international traffic in such birds shall be carried on; (d) for the prohibition of the killing, capturing, taking, injuring, or molesting of migratory game, migratory insectivorous or migratory nongame birds, or the taking, injuring, destruction, or molestation of their nests or eggs, within any prescribed area; (e) for any other purpose which may be deemed expedient for carrying out the intentions of this act and the said convention, whether such other regulations are of the kind enumerated in this section or not.

(3) A regulation shall take effect from the date of the publication thereof in the Canada Gazette, or from the date specified for such purpose in any regulation, and such regulation shall have the same force and effect as if enacted herein and shall be printed in the prefix in the next succeeding issue of the Dominion Statutes and shall also be laid before both Houses of Parliament within 15 days after the publication thereof if Parliament is then sitting, and if Parliament is not then sitting, within 15 days after the opening of the next session thereof.

5. (1) The minister may appoint game officers for carrying out this act and the regulations and may authorize such game officers to exercise the powers of justice of the peace or the powers of a police constable. Such persons shall hold office during pleasure and shall have, for the purposes of this act and the said convention, such other powers and duties as may be defined by this act and the regulations.

(2) Every game officer who is authorized by the minister to exercise the powers of a justice of the peace or of a police constable shall, for all the purposes of this act and the regulations, be ex officio a justice of the peace or a police constable, as the case may be, within the district within which he is authorized to act.

(3) Every such game officer shall take and subscribe an oath in the form following, that is to say:

"I, A. B., a _____ of _____ do solemnly swear that to the best of my judgment I will faithfully, honestly, and impartially fulfill, execute, and perform the office and duties of such _____ according to the true intent and meaning of the migratory birds convention act and the regulations made thereunder. So help me God."

6. No one without lawful excuse, the proof whereof shall lie on him, shall buy, sell, or have in his possession any bird, nest, or egg, or portion thereof during the time when the capturing, killing, or taking of such bird, nest, or egg is prohibited by law.

7. All guns, ammunition boats, skiffs, canoes, punts, and vessels of every description, teams, wagons, and other outfits, decoys and appliances of every kind, used in violation of or for the purpose of violating this act or any regulation, and any bird, nest, or egg taken, caught, killed, or had in possession in violation of this act or any regulation may be seized and confiscated upon view by any game officer appointed under this act or taken and removed by any person for delivery to any game officer or justice of the peace.

8. Any game officer appointed under this act who violates this act or any regulation, or who aids, abets, or connives at any violation of this act or of any regulation, shall be liable, upon summary conviction before any recorder, commissioner of police, judge of the sessions of the peace, police stipendiary, or district magistrate or any two justices of the peace to a penalty not exceeding $500 and costs or six months' imprisonment and not less than $100 and costs or three months' imprisonment.

9. Any person who assaults, obstructs, or interferes with any game officer or peace officer in the discharge of any duty under the provisions of this act, or of any regulations, shall be guilty of a violation of this act.

10. Any person who willfully refuses to furnish information or willfully furnishes false information to a game officer or peace officer respecting a violation of this act or of any regulations, the existence of or the place of concealment of any bird, nest, or egg, or any portion thereof captured, killed, or taken in violation of this act or of any regulation shall be guilty of a violation of this act.

11. Any game officer or peace officer may enter any place or premises in which he has reason to believe there exists migratory game, or migratory insectivorous, or migratory nongame birds, nests, or eggs, or any parts thereof, in respect of which a breach of this act or of the regulations may have been committed, and may open and examine any trunk, box, bag, parcel, or receptacle which he has reason to suspect and does suspect contains any such bird, nest, or egg, or any part thereof.

12. Every person who violates any provision of this act or any regulation shall, for each offense, be liable upon summary conviction to a fine of not more than $100 and not less than $10, or to imprisonment for a term of not exceeding six months or to both fine and imprisonment.

I have substituted "30 days" in order to give more time. Now, the idea of my proposition is this, Mr. Chairman: If these matters are laid before Congress in the way of a report by the department that has this matter in charge it will require no action by Congress, and every individual Member of Congress will have notice of these regulations. They will be printed, no doubt, in the Journal or the RECORD covering this proceeding, and every Member of Congress will know that such a regulation has been put in force, and he can advise his constituents if there are inquiries about the matter.

In addition, if the matter is noted in the next volume of the Statutes at Large there would be notice to the country, the same as in the case of any other statute that has become effective throughout the United States. I think this provision ought to be adopted.

Mr. FLOOD. What is that the gentleman is reading from?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. From the Canadian act.

Mr. FLOOD. Putting this treaty into effect?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes. I have it here.

Mr. FLOOD. And the provisions go into effect when?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. This act was the act of the 21st of July, 1917, bill No. 92 in the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. FLOOD. When does that go into effect?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think that is in effect now.

Mr. FLOOD. This provision that the gentleman read did not delay its going into effect?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No. It simply provides for a method of publication. This is the act itself that puts into effect the provisions of the treaty in Canada that I am quoting from, and it is a similar provision that I insist ought to go into our act that we are passing now, if it is going to be passed.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact of that matter of publication, and that the consent of the various parts of Canada was sought to be obtained before the passage of this act through the Canadian Parliament—a thing which I dare say has not been attempted to be done in the United States. The statement has been made by the chairman of the committee that the game departments in many of the States of the Union have been talked to about this matter, and that they have consented, to some extent, to it. I think that so far as any action by the States themselves in concerned, there has been nothing of the kind attempted here. I want to quote to the House from the debates of the House of Commons in Canada some small portions of what the argument was there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. What is the date of the act the gentleman is quoting from?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. July 21, 1917.

Mr. PLATT. The Canadian act is the act of August 29, 1917. I have it here.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have a certified copy here from the Secretary of State, printed with Mr. Lansing's certificate attached. I insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. MILLER of Michigan. Are the 10 additional minutes desired for the purpose of discussing the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; in connection with the publication feature.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will not the gentleman modify that and make it five minutes?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If I can quote what I wanted to quote, all right. But I have tried to get more time in the general debate and could not.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Many of us who were anxious to take part in the general debate did not talk at all. We do not want to restrict the gentleman from reading anything.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will try to read it in a shorter time.

This bill came up in the House of Commons in Canada first on the 21st of June, 1917. I have obtained, at considerable trouble, the debates that were had in the Canadian House and Senate at that time. I want to quote what Mr. Roche, who offered the bill and stood sponsor for it, said in the House of Commons when he introduced it. He said:

This bill is the result of a treaty that was entered into between His Majesty and the United States Government a few months ago for the better protection of migratory birds. It was found that migratory birds, both game birds and insectivorous birds, that migrate from the United States to Canada, and vice versa, have become very much reduced in numbers owing to the laxness and nonenforcement of game laws, and because some of the States, as well as some of the Provinces of Canada, had not sufficiently effective game laws. It was therefore decided that the only possible way in which these birds could be properly protected was by a treaty between the two countries. Such a treaty was entered into which has been assented to by the various States that have jurisdiction over the game laws in the United States, and by the various Provinces that have jurisdiction over the game laws in Canada.

You see what he is stating to the House of Commons, that these treaty provisions had been agreed to by the various States of the Union.

Mr. PLATT. That is true, as the gentleman knows. Nearly all the States have passed this exact provision.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I know better. I know that it has never been proposed in my State at all. It has never been proposed in the State of Indiana or in the State of Iowa, to my knowledge.

Mr. PLATT. Has the gentleman ever seen that statement covering all the game laws of the various States?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not yield further. I read:

There is to-day a bill before Congress giving effect to the treaty so far as the United States is concerned, and this bill takes similar action with regard to Canada.

I want to quote again from the proceedings in the house on the 21st of July. Mr. Roche, quoting from page 3805, says:

The draft of the treaty was submitted to all the provincial legislatures and approved. The treaty itself, after it was signed, and the bill were also submitted to the provincial legislatures.

He means the provincial legislatures of Canada. That act was submitted to the provincial legislatures in Canada, every one of them, and has been approved. It has not been done in this country. I read further:

Some of the provincial legislatures have adopted legislation approving the steps taken in this respect and have passed their game acts in accordance with the conditions of the treaty. Others have promised to do so at the next session.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier took part in the debate, and discussed this legislation; and on page 3806 of the House of Commons debate I find a quotation from a letter written by Mr. Loggie, deputy commissioner of lands and mines of the Province of New Brunswick, as follows:

It appears that the laws now in force in this Province for the protection of birds and game embrace almost everything included in the convention proposed, and very little change would be required if a convention were adopted.

I note—

Says the minister—

that the constitutionality of the act of March 4, 1913, passed by the United States Congress was doubtful; whether this question has been settled by the courts I do not know. A similar difficulty will be found in legislating in Canada. The laws upon this subject come within the jurisdiction of the different Provinces.

But in Canada they submitted them to the Provinces before this act was passed by the Canadian House and Senate.

I come now to the debates of the Canadian Senate, and I call attention to what was said there.

Mr. FLOOD. Does the gentleman say it was submitted to all of the Provinces of Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman says so in the debate.

Mr. FLOOD. Some of the Provinces of Canada had not acted upon it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But they had promised to act upon it.

Mr. FLOOD. All of the Provinces had not approved.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It had been submitted to them, and some had acted and some had promised to act. Now I call attention to the proceedings of the Senate of Canada, and I quote from the senate debate of July 26, 1917, on page 371:

Hon. Sir James Lougheed moved the second reading of bill 92, an act respecting a certain convention between His Majesty and the United States of America for the protection of migratory birds in Canada and the United States. He said—

I wish gentlemen would notice what he said—

He said: "According to the title of the bill, its purpose is the protection of migratory birds in Canada and the United States. That is the subject matter of a convention between the Governments of the United States and Canada. The subject matter was, I understand, submitted by the United States authorities to the different State governments, and likewise by this Government to the different provincial governments. Consequently there is an explicit arrangement among the different States of the Union and the different Provinces of Canada, who exercise authority in matters of game protection, that this convention should be ratified by the Governments of the United States and Canada."

I tell you, gentlemen, this bill is not getting the consideration here that it got in Canada, nor is it getting consideration by the States of this Union.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. The gentleman knows that the speaker whom he quoted as saying these things in the Canadian Parliament was wrong when he said this matter had been submitted to the States of our Union.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Does the gentleman know that he was right when he said it had been submitted to the Provinces of Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think he would have a better chance to know whereof he spoke as to Canada than he would as to the United States, because he was a member of the Canadian Senate and presumably spoke with due knowledge of what he had in mind.

Now, to resume my argument about this amendment, I think it should be adopted. If this bill is to pass, there ought to be some provision made at least to notify the people of the States of this Union what the provisions of this act are. It will be a simple safety provision, it is true, printed in the Statutes at Large that lawyers have in their libraries, and by reference thereto they can find what the regulations are. It will be submitted to the Senate and House not for action, but at least for reference, and in view of the fact that it has never been submitted to the various States of the Union, as I think it should have been, and as it should be before becoming effective, I think this amendment of mine ought to be adopted and this provision written into the bill.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not adopt this amendment. It is somewhat different from the provision of the Canadian law, and it may delay the time when this law and the regulations promulgated under it will go into operation. Congress may not be in session and the regulations will lie here until Congress meets again. That was not the case with the Canadian statute.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will agree to 15 days or 10 days or anything.

Mr. FLOOD. That will do no good if Congress is not in session. Why not let these regulations go into effect? Many of them are in effect now, and have been in effect for some years, and this is simply an effort to delay the enactment of this law and the enforcement of the regulations which the Department of Agriculture adopts under this law. The gentleman says the States have not been consulted and that the people have not been notified. Ratifications of this treaty were exchanged on the 7th of December, 1916. The people all over the country know about this treaty and this law. Since the 7th of December, 1916, the game departments of 40 States in this Union have approved this treaty and approved this legislation, and the Game Wardens' Association of the country has approved it. They certainly will take the trouble to let the people of their States know of these regulations as soon as they go into effect. I do not think there is any danger of the people being surprised in this matter. I know there is no danger of the Department of Agriculture undertaking suddenly to enforce regulations and penalties under those regulations. The spirit of the Department of Agriculture from the very beginning of this character of legislation has been to try to agree with the State game officials and the State authorities, and I am assured by these gentlemen that that is going to be their future purpose. They are not going to undertake to put into effect a drastic regulation and punish people under it until they give an opportunity to the people to acquaint themselves with the regulations. The present regulations provide that before there shall be a change there shall be, I believe, 90 days' notice given to the country. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. As a matter of fact, these regulations will be published in a farm bulletin, which every Member of Congress can get and send to his constituents, will they not?

Mr. FLOOD. They will all be published by the game department of every State, and there is no doubt that the people will be informed about it. This amendment would only obstruct the act.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman states that these regulations have been approved by the game departments of the various States?

Mr. FLOOD. I said this bill and this treaty had been approved.

Mr. WALSH. How long since the game departments had legislative functions?

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from Illinois alluded to the Provinces and the States consenting. The consent referred to is the consent of the game departments of the States. None of them indorsed this legislation by State legislative enactment, and neither has this been done in the Canadian Provinces.

Mr. WALSH. You substitute them for the legislature.

Mr. FLOOD. No, I do not; but that is what they mean by the consent here spoken of.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Virginia a question, not upon the bill but upon the treaty, if he will permit. I direct the gentleman's attention to article 3:

The high contracting powers agree that during the period of 10 years next following the going into effect of this convention there shall be a continuous close season on the following migratory game birds, to wit:

Band-tailed pigeons, little brown, sandhill, and whooping cranes, swans, curlew, and all shore birds (except the black-breasted and golden plover, Wilson or jack snipe, woodcock, and the greater and lesser yellowlegs).

After the parenthesis there is this proviso:

Provided, That during such 10 years the close seasons on cranes, swans, and curlew in the Province of British Columbia shall be made by the proper authorities of that Province within the general dates and limitations elsewhere prescribed in this convention for the respective groups to which these birds belong.

Does the gentleman happen to know why that Province was singled out?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 22, after the word "President," insert the following: "Provided, however, That no regulation or rule shall be made by the Secretary of Agriculture which will not give at least two months' open season for ducks and geese during flight, either in the spring or fall, if permitted by State law."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, the old-time advocate of the doctrine of State rights must take to his heels when such a law as this comes along. It certainly goes further than any piece of legislation that I know of, at least any coming before this Congress, either this or the last session. You take away the last vestige of the rights of the States on the question at hand. This law will permit one man who may be a bug on some subjects, who may be a one-idea man, to absolutely determine in every State of this Union when they can hunt and when they can not hunt. It is a dangerous precedent.

Mr. FLOOD. What time does the gentleman state the migratory ducks go through Indiana?

Mr. BLAND. Spring and fall.

Mr. FLOOD. What time under the State law do you shoot them?

Mr. BLAND. At present we kill them in the fall.

Mr. FLOOD. What time in the fall?

Mr. BLAND. From November to January.

Mr. FLOOD. That is the time they pass through?

Mr. BLAND. No; not always, and unfortunately you can not kill them when the water is low. You want to float down the river to kill ducks in my district when the water is high; the ducks are in the willows and you can get near them, and when the water is low the ducks are in the middle of the river, and they can see a long distance. Therefore we want to kill ducks in the spring when the water is high. I want this law defeated for the benefit of the boy who wants to kill a few ducks each year. He is as much entitled to them as the rich fellow who can go south.

Mr. FLOOD. Does the State law permit the spring killing of ducks?

Mr. BLAND. I think the propaganda spoken of here succeeded in a recent legislature in having the game warden recommend the passing of a law preventing the spring shooting of ducks. Our game warden is appointed and not elected.

Mr. FLOOD. And the legislature passed it?

Mr. BLAND. I am not sure, but think so.

If you men pass this law, you put it in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture to say that we shall have neither a spring nor a fall season.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes further.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. And this gentleman in whom you are putting this power to determine whether anyone shall have the right to kill ducks or geese in Indiana may act upon such misinformation as the gentleman from Minnesota gave me a while ago when he said that over in Indiana and Illinois and Kentucky the boys were guilty of pot shooting—so much so as to make this law necessary. I resent that as a slander upon those States, and I would like to see the evidence. In the first place, anyone who knows about the situation, or anybody that gives it careful thought, or anybody that takes time to inquire, would know that there is not the opportunity for pot shooting there that there is elsewhere, and as I said a moment ago——

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Not now. As I said a moment ago, you have the opportunity to pot shoot most where there are the most ducks, and the laws of Florida permit you to kill 300 ducks in a season, and you can go down there and spend three days and kill 100 ducks in a day, and if you do that you sure have the chance to do some pot shooting.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. BLAND. Not now. Do you want to refuse us the right to shoot them as they fly over in order to give you fellows an opportunity to load up your guns and go down to Florida and spend your money and time and bring back 300 ducks? I am for the little duck hunter at home rather than the big duck hunter who can go where the poor fellow can not go. He needs the meat more and enjoys the sport just as much.

Mr. FOCHT. And in addition to that they allow them to fly over Pennsylvania and Indiana and go south where they allow them to shoot them, as you can not drive them out of that State.

Mr. BLAND. Talk about this being a food measure! That is all rabbit tracks. There is no such thing as food conservation about it, as applied to the Middle West, where you only get a chance to shoot at one or two of them, and this law will never be used to prevent killing big bags in the duck's winter quarters. There is something wrong about this. They ring in all the fellows who are interested in the redbirds and the woodpeckers, and so forth, to talk about the beautiful songs of birds at eventide, when all they are driving at is to stop the shooting of ducks and geese as they fly over the Middle West in order to save them for the resorts.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I want to ask for information whether the administration of the game warden in Indiana for the preservation of game is satisfactory and a success.

Mr. BLAND. The last account I have of the game warden of Indiana he was a good Democratic friend of mine, and I think he is the same fellow yet.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Then he ought to be a good one.

Mr. BLAND. And he administers the laws as they are on the statute books, and he sometimes gives information to the legislature that is very valuable, but oftentimes, in my opinion, he is affected by this propaganda which is being carried on around here by these resort fellows, and he gives the legislature the wrong advice.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am not talking about his legislation. Is his administration meeting with the approbation of the people of Indiana who want the game preserved?

Mr. BLAND. The law that this Congress passed sometime ago does not meet the approbation of the people of Indiana, and they are up in arms about it. If I remember correctly, my predecessor voted and spoke against it, and he was right. Last fall we could not shoot ducks, by reason of some understanding about the Federal law, and, believe me, the people of Indiana were much dissatisfied, and they will hold responsible any man, especially from the Northwest, who votes in favor of permitting any one man to determine whether we shall kill duck in the spring and the fall. This amendment that I propose says that we shall have either spring or fall shooting during two months, if the State law permits. We are willing to abide by the decision of the State law, and if we don't like it we will repeal it.

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. MAYS. I have the provisions of the Indiana State law in respect to shooting ducks, and find that the gentleman may shoot ducks from September 16 to December 31. Is not that sufficient time.

Mr. BLAND. That does not permit any spring season——

Mr. MAYS. By the gentleman's own laws——

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman want me to answer the question?

Mr. MAYS. To answer the question.

Mr. BLAND. I will answer the question which he asked me. We only have about two weeks of fall shooting and sometimes shorter than that, depending upon how cold it gets up North, driving them South.

The climate determines the length of flight in the fall, and sometimes we have only a week, and sometimes the ducks do not stop at all, and all this open season from September to December does not do us any good unless it extends to the spring season.

Mr. MAYS. The laws of the gentleman's own State do not permit him to shoot ducks in the spring.

Mr. BLAND. I have answered that statement several times.

Mr. MAYS. Then the gentleman is against the laws of his own State.

Mr. BLAND. I am criticizing the proposed law that will permit some one to close both the spring and the fall shooting, and that is what this law does.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment does not seem to me to accomplish anything from the reading of the amendment and the explanation of the gentleman from Indiana. It seems to me to be the result of an organized filibuster against this bill. The gentleman has heard it stated here several times that we can not pass a law under this treaty that will lessen the restrictions of a State law. He proposes an amendment the purpose of which is to violate a State law by permitting a lot of people to shoot ducks in the spring.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman will yield, I am quite sure the gentleman does not mean to say that my amendment does that. It simply says the Secretary shall not adopt any rule that goes against the law that permits in Indiana both an open season—either in the spring or fall. That is different from the gentleman's statement——

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman says this prevents it both fall and spring——

Mr. BLAND. It might do so if the Secretary thought proper——

Mr. FLOOD. So far as Indiana is concerned, then, the amendment would have no effect, because Indiana only has a shooting season in the fall for ducks from September 16 to December 31.

Mr. BLAND. No; the gentleman is incorrect there, if the gentleman will pardon me. The gentleman stated, so far as the amendment was concerned the amendment would have no effect. It would prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from adopting a rule closing both the spring and fall seasons.

Mr. FLOOD. The Secretary of Agriculture has no idea of doing that.

Mr. BLAND. He has power to do it; that is what I am objecting to.

Mr. FLOOD. He has no power to do it under this treaty. The treaty fixes the close season; therefore it leaves the rest of it the open season. The Secretary of Agriculture can limit to a great extent the open season, but he can not make a close season as to ducks. He is bound to have three and one-half months, and the open season for ducks is fixed by the treaty, so that the amendment would accomplish nothing so far as Indiana is concerned, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman finally in his speech contradicted what he originally said by saying that the effect of the amendment would be to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to do something that he would not otherwise do.

Mr. FLOOD. I was not discussing the amendment; I was discussing the treaty.

Mr. BLAND. Well, it permits him to have a close season both spring and fall——

Mr. FLOOD. It does not do any such thing; the treaty provides——

Mr. BLAND. I mean the law; I suspect the gentleman is right.

Mr. FLOOD. The law can not violate the treaty.

Mr. BLAND. Read section 3.

Mr. FLOOD. It has to be in accord with the treaty, and the Secretary of Agriculture can not adopt a regulation in violation of that treaty.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I assume the object of this measure is, if possible, to conserve the game of this country. That is the ultimate purpose. So far as Pennsylvania is concerned, we need no such law. As chairman of the fish and game committee of the State Legislature of Pennsylvania many years ago I had the honor to be the author of the first piece of State legislation, I believe, in the United States which went to the extent of preventing the shipment of game out of the State. This measure allows hunters to shoot but one deer and one wild turkey a year, and does not allow them to ship under any circumstances game from the State. Now, while there may be States that need further protection, and while I would like to vote for this bill because it has certainly in view the accomplishment of that purpose, I do not like this method, gentlemen, when I know what we have done in Pennsylvania through the instrumentality of our own legislature, and I am here to say to you that I reject and resent the statement that any Secretary of Agriculture has any more common sense about making a game law for Pennsylvania, Indiana, Virginia, or Maryland than the legislatures which represent the people themselves. [Applause.] I found many cranks and people utterly lacking in common sense who had little conception of the habits of birds, of their migratory habits, calling themselves experts. There was one in Pennsylvania at the time we had this beneficent law passed, and he opposed my bill. If you go to McCalls Ferry, you will see a sample of what one fish "expert" of Pennsylvania did when he built a fishway there which no shad could ever go over unless he had wings. It was the same thing at Clarks Ferry, above Harrisburg. Another fishway was built there that stands high in the air, presumably to allow shad to go north. Now, I have not heard any gentleman dwell upon this point, that in migration these birds pass over the States of Maryland, Indiana, and so forth, going north, where they gather them in up in that country, and in the fall, when they go south, they get them at the other end, and thus we are not allowed to take our toll out at all in their migration. It is evident to my mind that this bill is not designed so much to protect the insectivorous birds and benefit the huntsman of the masses as it is to facilitate the incursions of the exclusive hunting clubs.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. At the time they are north, of which the gentleman speaks, it is the close season, always.

Mr. FOCHT. They are not allowed——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota (continuing). And they are protected every hour during the time the gentleman mentions.

Mr. FOCHT. Who is to determine that?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Heretofore it has been by the State authorities, and by this it will be by cooperation between the State and Nation.

Mr. FOCHT. I would rather by far have the people themselves determine the open and close season than the uncertainty of the judgment of any single man who may become the Secretary of Agriculture.

In other words, it gets back to me that if there was anything that I really gave you gentlemen of the South credit for and that was anywhere near consistent, it was the upholding of the sovereignty of the State, but you are departing from it again and again, and here you are submitting this question to one man, who may be a crank on this particular subject. No one can answer and tell me why the States of Pennsylvania, New York, Indiana, and Ohio, through their legislatures, can not better regulate the open season for game than the possibly prejudiced Secretary of Agriculture. We have the cock robin protected in Pennsylvania, but he goes down to Florida, Georgia, and South Carolina and is slaughtered by the tens of millions for food.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] in his argument wants to leave it to the States, and takes some of us gentlemen down the road for not standing for State rights, and he says that this obliterates that proposition. If that is true, the gentleman ought to be for it, because he has been against State rights for many years.

Mr. FOCHT. Oh, no; I was against secession and treason and not against the right of State sovereignty. I was against your going out of the Union.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I was for State rights as expounded by the Federal Constitution, a thing evidently the gentleman knows nothing of. I want to show you the folly of his argument as to leaving it to the States. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] admits that the game warden in his State is not enforcing the law. I am from a State that has a State warden, and I say it without State pride, that does enforce the law. I am across the river from the State of the gentleman from Indiana, and the topography of my district is the same as that of southern Indiana, so that if we carry out the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], there are pot shooters in the gentleman's district in Indiana shooting all they can, while in my State, where the law is absolutely enforced, they are not allowed to shoot. That is the consistency of the laws of the two States.

Mr. BLAND. Where does the gentleman get the information that they do not enforce the law in Indiana?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I got it by my question to him, in answering which he intimated that they were not enforcing the law. I asked the gentleman, "Are they enforcing it in your State"——

Mr. BLAND. We are enforcing that law, but we have had to obey this Federal law.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If they are enforcing it, you ought to be for it, because the State wardens of practically every State in this Union have indorsed this bill. The game warden of Kentucky was before the committee. He is one of the strongest game wardens in the United States, as every member of the Foreign Affairs Committee will admit. He was against the bill as originally drawn, that the Audubon Society was for, because he said the game wardens were not taken into consideration in the enforcement of the same, and he said if you did not give the game wardens some part in the enforcement of this law it would never be enforced. Since the committee of the House has amended it I have received a letter from him, in which he says he is much in favor of it, because it does give the game wardens the right under these rules and regulations to see that it is enforced, and therefore it will be a complete success; and the State wardens in convention assembled in Detroit—and I have a copy of the resolutions here—have unanimously indorsed it; and therefore this contention between the Audubon Society and the game wardens, as it existed in the original bill, has been obliterated by reason of the amendment in this bill proposed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House. If you want the pothunters to disregard this solemn treaty we made with Canada and kill these migratory birds and stop their propagation, then you want to vote against this bill. If you want this law enforced and these birds not only propagated but protected, give the game wardens under this bill the power and the right to administer this law; and when you do it they will be protected like they are in Kentucky, whether it is enforced in Indiana or not. I hope the gentleman from Indiana is right when he says that they are enforcing it there, because we are together so far as the enforcement is concerned.

We have fall shooting in Kentucky. We had more duck shooting there last season than in any other season in the State; and the game warden says in this letter that if you will leave it to the game wardens they will enforce it and have open shooting enough for everybody. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, one of the favorite arguments of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] and one not entirely conclusive, to my mind, is to say to the gentlemen upon the other side that they have not read the bill. He has used that argument to-day and he has used it on different occasions. In view of the frequency with which the gentleman is inclined to make that statement, I suggest that whether or not the gentleman has read the treaty to which he has made reference, that he read it again in order that he may get the terms of it correct. He stated a moment ago that the treaty provided that there should be three months and a half of open season. On the contrary, it provided that there should not be to exceed three months and a half open season, which is a very different proposition. So far as the treaty is concerned there may be no open season whatever. In fact, the Secretary of Agriculture may make it as short as he desires, but it can not exceed three and a half months. For that reason I think the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana ought to be adopted. Under it the open season could not be less than three months.

But I did not rise to speak upon that feature so much as upon another matter which has been brought up here, and that is the question of State rights, which generally crops out when bills of this kind are brought before the House. It is a singular feature of this discussion that gentlemen upon the other side, many of whom were so insistent when the child-labor bill was before the House that some of the rights of the States were going to be violated by the provisions of that bill and opposed it on that ground, are now most enthusiastically in favor of the rights of the States being thrown to the winds when it comes to the preservation of birds. The purpose is perhaps commendable, but consistency is lacking.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But when the children were concerned their rights were not so important as those of the States. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. AYRES. Was not the same thing shown on that side of the House as well as on this side when it came up on the question of woman suffrage?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is in error. That was not a matter of State rights. It was a question of the rights of the ladies rather than of the rights of the States.

Mr. AYRES. Was not that argument used on both sides of the aisle?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think it was. I did not hear it on this side. Most of us supported the amendment.

Mr. AYRES. I think it was.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not so particularly concerned about the general principle of State rights being preserved as I am about the substantial rights of the States being preserved. If those rights were preserved by the regulations made by the Department of Agriculture in this matter, I would not have any opposition to this bill. But, as gentlemen have very well said, here is one man that is given the whole authority to determine just how much shooting shall be done in each State. Apparently he takes no counsel from the States themselves. They have nothing to say about it. I know of no instance where such an autocratic power has been given in any other matter, and I know of no other kind of legislation where we would think of creating one. Why it should be done in this particular instance I do not understand.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] has offered this amendment, which limits the powers of the Secretary of Agriculture to a slight degree.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With pleasure.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Just how valuable would this bill be if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana should be adopted?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What substantial difference does it make? I do not think the gentleman has it in mind correctly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It destroys the bill absolutely, completely, entirely, and perfectly.

Mr. BLAND. It only applies to ducks and geese. You have been talking about birds and insect feeders.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Minnesota has a peculiar understanding of the amendment. The amendment, as I read it—and the gentleman from Indiana will correct me if I am in error—simply provides in effect that there shall be an open season for at least two months.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman's amendment provides that before any rules or regulations can be adopted they must be acquiesced in by the respective States.

Mr. BLAND. That is not in the amendment at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Really I shall have to ask our friends who are supporting the bill, not only to read the treaty, but to listen, just a little occasionally, to the reading of the amendments. The gentleman is talking about something else altogether.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Acknowledging the facetiousness of the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa, I beg to state that in the confusion and babel of voices incident to the discussion of this bill I think I distinctly heard a provision read in one amendment requiring the submission of these rules and regulations to the States, and providing that no rule or regulation should be adopted contrary to State laws.

Mr. BLAND. I think the gentleman's recollection as to that is as erroneous as his recollection about pothunters in Indiana.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What the gentleman heard was part of another amendment. How correctly his remarks apply to it I will not undertake to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, but I wish to make a few observations on the bill, as a whole.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, and ordinarily I would content myself with registering my vote for it. I live in eastern North Carolina, where there are numerous sounds and rivers upon which there is an abundance of game. In fact, in my congressional district is the section tributary to what is known as the Currituck Sound, where the finest duck in the United States prevails, formerly in abundance, but in later years in diminishing numbers. I refer to the canvas-back duck. There they come to their greatest splendor and perfection and their most luscious condition. Hunters from all over the United States, who are genuine sportsmen and not pothunters, repair to that section during the winter season. I see before me the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON], who spent a short time there during the recent winter.

Now, this migratory game law, which has been in effect during the past few years, has met with some opposition among the people of my district and of eastern North Carolina. When its enforcement first began there was considerable discontent and many protests. Gradually, as its wisdom has been impressed more and more upon substantial citizens of that section, its critics have decreased and its friends have correspondingly increased.

Nevertheless even now it is not received with entire favor, and for that reason I desire to say just a brief word in advocacy of this legislation.

Everyone will admit the necessity of preserving these migratory game and nongame birds and migratory insectivorous birds. How may they be conserved? How may we prevent their wholesale destruction, which in a few years may cause them to become extinct, just as many animals and other birds have become extinct? May the State of North Carolina by its laws effect it, or the State of Indiana? No single State may do so. Perhaps it is not too broad a statement to say that even the United States could not do so, because it so happens that these birds in their migration go between Canada and the United States, and it has become evident that if we are to have any effective law which shall preserve these valuable birds that serve such a useful and necessary purpose it must be through the joint action of both countries.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLAND. I should like to ask the gentleman a couple of questions. As I understand, the gentleman has in his district, or in his part of the country, some of the best fall and winter duck shooting in the United States. Is not that true?

Mr. SMALL. Perhaps so.

Mr. BLAND. And people there can kill them in November, December, and January, and that is your open season, is it not? And that is why you want to stop us from killing them elsewhere, so that your people can get them down there. Is not that true?

Mr. SMALL. I do not concede that to be the situation. I submit that if wise regulations are made applicable to game conditions in eastern North Carolina, likewise they will be made applicable to the State of Indiana and to every other State, and I can not concede that these regulations will discriminate against the State of Indiana or any other section.

So, Mr. Chairman, it is evident that if we are to preserve these insectivorous birds and these game birds, the necessity of which is so obvious that it is unnecessary to argue it, we must adopt some effective means of doing so. I submit that this is the only effective method which has ever been devised, and I think it is not going too far to say, which will be devised.

What are some of the objections to it? Gentlemen say that it is reposing in agencies of the Government the power to make regulations which by reason of this legislation become the law of the land. Is there any other practicable method?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Congress, even with the wisest advice which it can garner, can not enact legislation applicable even to existing conditions, to say nothing of conditions that may arise from time to time. And there is nothing in experience which justifies us in shrinking with fear from the resulting regulations which may be promulgated. We have had regulations in force for several years, written from time to time, and instances of alleged injustice under those regulations have been called to my attention. When I investigated them with an open mind and a desire to determine what the best interest of those birds demanded, as well as the interest of my own people, very seldom have I been able to find any substantial ground for criticism. And if in the future in the making of these regulations any injustice, sectional or otherwise, should be perpetrated, Congress still has the power to set aside those regulations or to take away the right to make them. It remains absolutely within the power of Congress to control.

Something has been said about State rights. I flatter myself that when it comes to the preservation of the essential rights of the States, I have a record perhaps as good as that of any Member of this honorable body. But we are not violating any essential rights. In fact, we are trying to provide a law the purpose of which may not be effected by the law of any State in the Union. The fact that we are adopting the only method for carrying into effect a solemn treaty made between the United States and the Kingdom of Great Britain is of itself an argument of the impotency of the States to effectuate the purpose which this law is intended to carry out.

How can you take away an essential right of the State when the purpose to be accomplished by the exercise of the so-called State rights will be nugatory and accomplish nothing? The gentlemen are straining at a gnat. There are some essential rights in the States—rights which involve local self-government—which involve absolute sovereignty, which preserve the integrity of the States, and for such rights gentlemen of this body and the citizens of the country ought to stand; but we disparage the essential rights of the States when we cite such a law as this as one which violates them.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, suppose some of the States have a law that is satisfactory to the people, with which they are absolutely satisfied, which is well enforced, and suppose this law should conflict with that State law, which law will control?

Mr. SMALL. According to the terms of this law, the law of Congress would prevail.

Mr. BOOHER. Then, all of the gentleman's argument about preserving the rights of the States to legislate on that proposition fails.

Mr. SMALL. But the gentleman forgets that if any State makes any law regarding migratory game, if the purpose of the law is to preserve, to conserve game, it does not accomplish this purpose. This does accomplish the purpose and, therefore, it does not violate any right which the people of the States ought, under the authority of their sovereignty, to exercise.

Mr. BOOHER. It absolutely destroys their law, does it not, if it conflicts with the regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. SMALL. If my friend thinks that a repetition of his statement strengthens it, I will agree with it again.

Mr. BOOHER. I was not making the same statement the second time. What I want to get at is the opinion of the gentleman as to whether or not the State has a right to legislate on this proposition; and if it has, and the law conflicts with the regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture, then the State law falls, does it not?

Mr. SMALL. Of necessity under this law, if it is to be effective, it must prevail over the State law if there is a conflict between the State and Federal law. I think it is a wise piece of legislation in the interest of the country and ought to be enacted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words, for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. I noticed that the bobolinks under article 1 of the convention are classed with the migratory insectivorous birds. In the North the bobolink is a bird of beautiful plumage, a bird of song, but when he migrates to my section he becomes a dark color and a game bird, known as the reedbird, and its flesh is highly flavored. I want to know if article 7 of the convention is so elastic as to permit the shooting of these birds? In the early autumn our State law permits the privilege of shooting those birds for a limited period.

Mr. FLOOD. Does he seriously injure any agricultural interests in the gentleman's community?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. No. In the North he is an insectivorous bird, but with us he feeds on seeds and not on grain, and is like the robin in that respect. The robin is an insectivorous bird in the North and in the South feeds on grain, and is shot there by the thousands.

Mr. FLOOD. Does he destroy the gentleman's grain?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. No; but he eats seeds more than he does grain. He does not destroy any of our grains or products, but there are a great many of them in my section, on account of the rivers and the streams, where reeds grow extensively, on which he feeds and lives; thus the name "reedbird."

Mr. FLOOD. Do you object to their being protected?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. They are protected by the State, with the exception of an open season of a few days.

Mr. FLOOD. Do you object to their protection under this law?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I object to their being protected as a game bird. I do not see why they should not be classed as a game bird with us.

Mr. FLOOD. If it is injurious to any interests in the gentleman's community, they could permit them to be killed.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. On the Jersey coast and on the Delaware River there are a great many of them in the fall of the year.

Mr. FLOOD. Unless they are injurious to agriculture or the interests of the community——

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. They do not injure any interests in our district.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not see how under this treaty there could be any change in the provision.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Under article 7, which is rather elastic, permits may be obtained to kill the birds named in the treaty, but only for food and not to be offered for sale.

Mr. FLOOD. Article 7 reads as follows:

Permits to kill any of the above-named birds which, under extraordinary conditions, may become seriously injurious to the agricultural or other interests in any particular community, may be issued by the proper authorities of the high contracting powers under suitable regulations prescribed therefor by them respectively, but such permits shall lapse, or may be canceled, at any time when, in the opinion of said authorities, the particular exigency has passed, and no birds killed under this article shall be shipped, sold, or offered for sale.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. He is well noted there, and has been for years and years, as a food bird entirely. He changes his color, and he is not a song bird with us.

Mr. FLOOD. From the construction the gentleman puts on it, the section would apply to the bobolinks in his district.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The bobolink is not known in my section of the State, but when he migrates there his local name is "reedbird."

Mr. FLOOD. I do not see how we can amend. His status is fixed by the treaty. There is no way to amend it.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. There is no way of amending the convention, but I was hoping that article 7 could be construed as permitting us to shoot the reedbird.

Mr. FLOOD. That is permitted if he is injurious.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. But he is not injurious.

Mr. FLOOD. Then I do not see how article 7 applies.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful to ship, transport, or carry, by any means whatever, from one State, Territory, or District to or through another State, Territory, or District, or to or through a foreign country, any bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, or carried at any time contrary to the laws of the State, Territory, or District in which it was captured, killed, or taken, or from which it was shipped, transported, or carried. It shall be unlawful to import any bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, or carried contrary to the laws of any Province of the Dominion of Canada in which the same was captured, killed, or taken, or from which it was shipped, transported, or carried.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question, and that is as to whether he intends to try to complete the bill so far as section 5 is concerned to-night?

Mr. FLOOD. We would like to do so; yes, that is what we intended to do.

Mr. RAKER. The only thing in my mind was, it seems to me, that there ought to be quite a good attendance in the House in the discussion of this section 5, for this reason: It is so fundamental and to my mind it seems to overthrow every principle of civil and criminal jurisdiction that has ever been known, and I wondered whether or not the committee intended to ask the adoption of this section. I just want to call the attention to this for just a moment:

That any employee of the Department of Agriculture, authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provision of this act, shall have power—

Now, think of it; stop right there; without oath, without bond, without responsibility, when no State in the Union has ever permitted a police officer to go out and arrest its citizens without at least giving an oath and giving a bond that when the citizen has been invaded or his personal liberty has been jeopardized and he has been taken into custody that he may have some remedy, but here it is thrown wide open that any employee—well, I am for the purposes of this bill—but here is a section I can not conceive how this can be permitted to be enacted into law. Let me read just a little further. Without bond, without oath, without responsibility, without knowledge——

Mr. FLOOD. I thought the gentleman was reading.

Mr. RAKER. Read and you will find this provision——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly permit the section to be read? We have not reached that section yet.

Mr. RAKER. I do not know whether it ought to be read or not. I have only five minutes, and this gives me an opportunity—it gives him authority "to arrest any person committing a violation of this act in his presence or view and to take such person immediately for examination or trial before an officer or court of competent jurisdiction."

No relief to the man who has been arrested. If it is found he has been falsely imprisoned, or the facts do not exist that the employee of the Department of Agriculture claims to exist, no remedy on earth is afforded. Now, again:

Shall have power to execute any warrant or other process issued by an officer or court of competent jurisdiction for the enforcement of the provisions of this act.

That power is given to the appointees of a department to use the United States marshal power; the power of the sheriff of the country is turned over to this officer, of the constable and chief of police; every other police officer in the land, Federal and State, county and municipal, is given to an appointee, without oath, without responsibility. Now, I will read again.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. Just let me read this.

Mr. FESS. We all have read it. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. All right; I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Suppose that a man exercises that power and takes in charge a man that violated this law.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The man who was authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture is a Federal officer. If he could not take the evidence which is the bird killed, as evidence of the violation of the law, but he must get a warrant first before he can arrest him, how far would the enforcement of this law go? Suppose you and I were men who killed a bird and my friend MILLER here is the man who would take us in charge, if he has to wait until he gets authority——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I ask that I may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS (continuing). You and I will be two witnesses against one. It seems to me it is absolutely necessary to give this authority in order to make the law effective.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman has confounded the distinction I am trying to make. Any peace officer may arrest a man under the law, when the person arrested is committing an act in his presence, without a warrant of arrest. That is as it should be. But he is an officer; he has taken an oath; he has given a bond. But suppose the very man you name, that has no responsibility, arrests you, and, as a matter of fact, you did not have the bird, you did not do the killing, would have nothing to do with it—and you have the right to sue him for false imprisonment and damages—what remedy have you got?

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In just a moment.

Mr. FESS. When he is authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture then he is in the form of an official officer to exercise this, because he could not do this until he is authorized by the Secretary.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no. He might be authorized, but what does the authorization mean to the man who has been arrested unlawfully and illegally so far as his remedies are concerned as an American citizen. Whom will he sue?

Mr. FESS. It means a respect for the law.

Mr. RAKER. Whom will he sue if he is arrested and put in jail for three weeks? Nobody can respond.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Suppose the gentleman is illegally and improperly, as would be the case, arrested by a policeman on the street who thinks he has seen him committing a misdemeanor, what redress has the gentleman?

Mr. RAKER. If I can prove that he is lying I have an opportunity to sue him and his bondsmen and get relief.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He has no bondsmen. The gentleman can sue him, and would not that be the exact situation in this case?

Mr. RAKER. He is an officer that they can turn out, and they can put another fellow in.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman would have an action against the officer.

Mr. RAKER. This is not an officer.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Against the man, then.

Mr. RAKER. Now, again. This says, "And shall have authority without warrant to search any place." Now, just think of that!

Mr. FLOOD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. RAKER. I am not quite through.

Mr. FLOOD. I want to make a suggestion. The gentleman has not been here during the discussion.

Mr. RAKER. I beg your pardon. I have been here all the day, from the time the gavel sounded and the Chaplain began his prayer, up to the present time.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman, then, did not hear what was said.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I did.

Mr. FLOOD. I said, to reach the point I was going to offer an amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I appreciate that.

Mr. FLOOD. What is the good of discussing this, then?

Mr. RAKER. I want to show to the committee that this committee that had the matter in charge reported that you could search a man's premises without a warrant, and they know that it was so unjustified and so un-American that they came in and asked to strike it out——

Mr. FLOOD. And if the committee is so un-American and so unjustified, perhaps the whole bill ought to be repealed. Does the gentleman agree with that?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman agrees with the gentleman about that particular point. The only object he has in discussing this is to lambast the committee.

Mr. RAKER. Do you think that because a committee brings in a bill here and anybody criticizes the bill, you are lambasting it?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. RAKER. Is it possible in this House that a bill is above amendment or a committee is above the suggestion that they made a mistake?

Mr. FLOOD. Not at all; and I did not say that.

Mr. RAKER. If that is so, then Congress ought to adjourn and turn everything over to the committees.

Mr. FLOOD. Not at all. I said the gentlemen of the committee were in accord on that proposition.

Mr. RAKER. I know that.

Mr. FLOOD. Then what is the use of discussing it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] has the floor, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] must not interrupt him without his consent.

Mr. RAKER. He did not. There is no complaint about that. As to the question of lambasting, you can not get over that, because the calling of the attention of the House to important matters is not lambasting. And I hope the distingushed gentleman from Virginia will not permit such a thing as this.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point that the gentleman is not addressing himself to his motion.

Mr. RAKER. I will now.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then, will you kindly yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more. I am in earnest on this. It ought to be defeated.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Wait until we get to the next section.

Mr. RAKER. Give me five minutes now, and then I will not bother further.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman is addressing himself to a paragraph that has not been read yet, and inasmuch as he can talk later, I shall have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota objects.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That employees of the Department of Agriculture authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act shall, with respect thereto, have the same powers as are conferred by law on marshals with respect to executing the laws of the United States. That any warrant necessary to the enforcement of the provisions of this act, or any regulation made thereunder, shall be issued by the several judges of the courts established under the laws of the United States, and the United States commissioners within their respective jurisdictions, upon proper oath or affirmation showing probable cause for the issuance of such warrants. All birds, or parts, nests, or eggs thereof, captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, carried, or possessed contrary to the provisions of this act or of any regulations made pursuant thereto shall, when found, be seized by any such employee, or by any marshal or deputy marshal, and, upon conviction of the offender or upon judgment of a court of the United States that the same were captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, carried, or possessed contrary to the provisions of this act or of any regulation made pursuant thereto, shall be forfeited to the United States and disposed of as directed by the court having jurisdiction.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 3, strike out lines 11 and 22, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 5. That any employee of the Department of Agriculture authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act shall have power, without warrant, to arrest any person committing a violation of this act in his presence or view and to take such person immediately for examination or trial before an officer or court of competent jurisdiction; shall have power to execute any warrant or other process issued by an officer or court of competent jurisdiction for the enforcement of the provisions of this act; and shall have authority, without warrant, to search any place other than a dwelling, and, with warrant, to search any dwelling, if he shall have reason to suspect that there is concealed therein any bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, which has been captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, or carried, or which is possessed contrary to the provisions of this act or of any regulation made pursuant thereto. The several judges of the courts established under the laws of the United States and United States commissioners may, within their respective jurisdictions, upon proper oath or affirmation showing probable cause, issue warrants in all such cases."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FLOOD to the committee amendment: Page 4, line 7, strike out the word "without," and insert in lieu thereof the word "with." Page 4, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "other than a dwelling, and, with warrant, to search any dwelling."

Mr. DOOLITTLE and Mr. MILLER of Minnesota rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I do not claim any priority of right in recognition because I am a member of the committee, but I want to arrange, if I can, as to the division of time for the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is a member of the committee and is recognized.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This section, I apprehend, is going to attract the most vital discussion of any part of the bill. I do not think the chairman of the committee was correctly advised when he stated that the committee as a whole, at least, was not approving the amendment as originally proposed. I most heartily favor it, and I think by all means the House should adopt it as originally proposed. The gentleman in charge of the bill and others on the committee have shown a desire to modify it.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is right about that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can we not arrange for the time of debate, so that we can get a vote?

Mr. FLOOD. What would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Twenty minutes to a side. That would be 40 minutes. We should be able to accommodate all those who desire to discuss the bill.

Mr. FLOOD. That is just in reference to this amendment?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think 20 minutes on a side would be sufficient for the discussion of a provision giving such drastic powers to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from Minnesota suggested, as I understood, that there should be 20 minutes to a side to the two amendments I shall offer. The section now reads, "and shall have authority, without warrant, to search any place other than a dwelling." I propose an amendment so that it would read, "and shall have authority with warrant to search any place." That is the amendment that the gentleman had reference to with respect to the agreement for 20 minutes to a side.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all discussion on this amendment and all amendments and modifications of it shall close in 40 minutes; 20 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] to be utilized by those who are in favor of the amendment, and 20 minutes to be controlled by myself to be utilized by those who are opposed to any change.

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, that takes in part of section 5?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; but it would not preclude any other amendment.

Mr. RAKER. If this amendment were adopted it would take out section 5?

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is talking about the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am talking about the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia to the committee amendment.

Mr. RAKER. That is the amendment to the amendment, and not the amendment to section 5?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Then there will be an opportunity to discuss the amendment to section 5?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Undoubtedly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the debate on the amendment to the amendment be limited to 40 minutes, 20 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia and 20 minutes by the gentleman from Minnesota, the time of the gentleman from Virginia to be given to those who are in favor of the proposed amendment and that of the gentleman from Minnesota to those who are opposed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I wish to offer, to strike out the entire section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment would not be affected by this agreement.

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to make an inquiry of the gentleman in charge of the bill. If there is to be 40 minutes debate on this paragraph, that will take it up to 5 minutes to 6 o'clock. I should like to know if the gentleman expects to finish the bill this afternoon?

Mr. FLOOD. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will pardon me, there are some indications of a desire to call the roll on this bill. I merely want to add that to the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas that the debate will run until 6 o'clock.

Mr. FLOOD. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that all who desire to offer amendments to section 5 offer them this afternoon, and then I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. RAKER. The only trouble is, supposing one of these amendments is allowed, and then it is desired to offer another amendment, that would be cut off by this agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request for unanimous consent of the gentleman from Minnesota. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE].

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to digress for five minutes from the immediate subject before the House. It is not very often that I think it behooves Members of Congress to bring up on the floor of the House matters that appear in newspapers as editorial comment; but the clipping I have in my hand is so grossly unfair and unjust by innuendo to the former parliamentary clerk of this House, the worthy and distinguished Speaker's son, that I feel that Members on both sides will be glad of the opportunity to vindicate Lieut. Col. Bennett C. Clark from the aspersions and the insinuations which have been made in this little squib which I wish to read to the House. It is printed in the Recorder, a paper published at Westmoreland, in Pottawatomie County, Kans., which county I have the honor to represent here as a part of the fourth district of Kansas. I am informed that the item was framed in Washington as a piece of partisan propaganda and sent broadcast over the country. The editorial reads as follows:

> Bennett Clark, son of Speaker Champ Clark, was appointed a lieutenant last August, and has risen already to lieutenant colonel. That is coming up pretty rapidly, even for a "deserving Democrat."

Gentlemen, I believe we can say with one accord, we who have known Bennett Clark, that this young man has won his spurs. I believe the gentlemen on the Republican side of the House will not for a moment countenance the statement, or believe it, that Bennett Clark received his commission through any political pull. I believe you will agree with me that this young man went into the training camp the same as other young men and that he received his commission by reason of the hard work that he did and the merit of his efforts. I am going to read the military history of Bennett C. Clark, and let the country judge the truthfulness of the newspaper sneer.

He attended the Officers' Training School at Fort Myer for three months. He entered the first day possible and was recommended by those in authority as one of 3 senior captains out of 2,500 young men. This recommendation to the Secretary of War was in the last days of July, 1917—the commissions to be delivered August 13. In the meantime, without request, he was unanimously elected lieutenant colonel of the Sixth Missouri National Guard, now part of the One hundred and fortieth United States Infantry. No unit of that regiment came from the Speaker's congressional district. He was elected lieutenant colonel because first and last, one way and another, he had been much drilled. August 13, along with his fellow students at Fort Myer he received his captain's commission and declined it for the reason that he was already in the service as a lieutenant colonel.

The truth is that he was determined to hold on to his captain's commission, won on merit at Fort Myer, and to decline the lieutenant colonelcy in the National Guard, and only accepted it after five major generals advised him to do so.

President Wilson duly accepted his declination of the captaincy in a formal bulletin.

When the Sixth Missouri was merged with the Third Missouri to make the One hundred and fortieth United States Infantry, the military authorities at Camp Doniphan, without suggestion or request from either Lieut. Col. Clark or his father, the Speaker of the House, made young Clark lieutenant colonel of the One hundred and fortieth Infantry.

After several months' further work at Camp Doniphan, Lieut. Col. Clark, with the other officers of his regiment, went to Fort Sam Houston, at San Antonio, Tex., to attend a field officers' training school. At the close of several weeks' strenuous work there the officers were given a stiff examination, which Clark passed with flying colors, as he has passed every examination, whether in high school, university, law school, or for admission to the bar.

And I may say at this point, gentlemen, that Bennett Clark is a chip off the old block, Speaker CHAMP CLARK. [Applause.] I believe the record will show that Speaker CLARK, when he graduated from the university, graduated with the record grade of 99.8 per cent, which, if I am correctly informed, is the highest grade ever given to a graduate of an American university.

On the occasion of Bennett Clark's admission to the bar he stood first in a class of 161 in taking the Missouri State bar examination.

It was said that the officer in command at the training school suggested that Clark be given 100 as his grade for the work performed. I do not know whether this is true or not; but it happens that in the school there were 18 officers who failed to make the most satisfactory showing. Clark was selected by the higher officers to represent these men in their effort to secure the issuance of their commissions. His work was so successful that 16 of the 18 were commissioned. He then hurried back to Camp Doniphan, but at the railroad station the officers presented him with the best watch that could be purchased in San Antonio.

Then upon crossing the Atlantic to France he was detailed to conduct an officers' training school aboard ship, which he did.

Gentlemen, I submit to you that there never was a case more meritorious, and that anyone who would insinuate that Bennett Clark received his commission by reason of favoritism, persuasion, or suggestion on the part of anybody is stating what is not the fact. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that it be extended for five minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DYER. I just wanted to state that——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the chairman of the committee that I have an amendment that I desire to offer, but I would rather not be prejudiced by trying to offer it to-night.

Mr. FLOOD. Then I shall move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to withhold that for a moment until I can yield one minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. FLOOD. Very well.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I want to add a word to what has been so well and truthfully said concerning Lieut. Col. Bennett C. Clark of my State. The entire people of Missouri, including the officers and men who are in the service, appreciate and admire the ability and courage of Bennett Clark. They all know that what he is comes from his sole merit and worth. Missouri soldiers who have served with him in the camps in that State and in Oklahoma unite in saying that he is a soldier every inch of him, and one of the most efficient officers that they have had to deal with. His superior officers say the same. So what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE] has said, while handsome of him, is not needed so far as we of Missouri are concerned, because we know that Lieut. Col. Bennett Clark is all true and a yard wide, and is an honor to that great State and its people in the splendid patriotic service he is now rendering. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KEATING, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1553 and had come to no resolution thereon.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION OF THE SOLDIER.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the disposition of the bill S. 1553, now under consideration, it may be in order to consider the bill H. R. 12212, the soldiers' vocational rehabilitation bill, not to interfere with the appropriation bill or conference reports or, of course, Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that immediately following the bill now under consideration it shall be in order to consider the soldiers' vocational rehabilitation bill, not to interfere with privileged matters. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does that mean that the bird bill goes over until Thursday?

The SPEAKER. It seems so.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is the desire of the Committee on Education, the chairman of which is unavoidably absent, to consider the Senate bill instead of the House bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I rather think the program is to consider the House bill and when that is reported to lay the Senate bill before the House and strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the House bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This matter has been discussed with me to some extent as a member of the Committee on Rules, but the gentleman is probably better informed than I. At some time it is desired to substitute the Senate bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the purpose of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD on the bird bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has already that permission now.

Mr. RAKER. Not on this last portion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table on Friday next I be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes on the subject of platinum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that on Friday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the matters on the Speaker's table, he be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes on the subject of platinum. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state whether that request excludes also the consideration of conference reports? It is expected that the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill may be in Thursday or Friday.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I do not desire to interfere with conference reports.

The SPEAKER. The way the request is put it will come ahead of conference reports.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wondered if the gentleman knew that next Saturday we are to have one or two speakers after the reading of the Journal, and if it would be just as convenient for him to make his remarks on Saturday?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I prefer to make them as soon as possible.

Mr. WALSH. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman modify his request so it will not interfere with the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I have done that.

The SPEAKER. Not to interfere with the conference reports. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed the bill to standardize screw threads, with amendments. I desire to ask unanimous consent to take that bill from the Speaker's table, to agree to the conference asked, and that the conferees be named.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10852) with Senate amendments, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and to agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I have the attention of the gentleman from Ohio? Will the gentleman kindly repeat the subject to which the bill refers?

Mr. ASHBROOK. The standardization of screw threads.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 10852) to provide for the appointment of a commission to standardize screw threads.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ASHBROOK, Mr. SLAYDEN, and Mr. ROBERTS.

DISPLAY OF WORK OF CANADIAN INVALID SOLDIERS' COMMISSION.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to speak for one-half a minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, to-night in the majority room of the House Office Building is to be displayed from 10,000 to 12,000 feet of film representing the work of the Canadian Invalid Soldiers' Commission in the rehabilitation of wounded soldiers since the war opened. This is through the courtesy of this commission in Canada. I simply make the announcement that we would be very glad to have Members of the House, if it is possible, be present and witness that display. I have seen the picture myself, and it is quite remarkable, and it is worth seeing, indicating the character of this work.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 5, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of Commerce submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the Department of Commerce for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1146); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, together with a report of a special board of officers of the Corps of Engineers on a preliminary examination of the Florida East Coast Canal, from St. Johns River to Key West, with reference to the desirability of purchasing said canal by the United States, with reference to the use of such a waterway for commercial, military, and naval purposes (H. Doc. No. 1147); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:
